We are all aware that Poland's economy has been in bad shape for some time. However, many may not be aware of the continued decline in Poland's economic situation since the imposition of martial law last year. The perpetuation of Poland's failing economy becomes all the more important when one considers that the stated rationale for the December crackdown was to return calm and a healthy economy to Poland.

Poland's economy is plagued by poor organization, shoddy workmanship and waste, a fall in exports, severely curtailed imports of raw materials, and a steep decline in the nation's standard of living.

The prices of food and many other goods were increased as much as fourfold at the beginning of this year, while wages have been frozen. Many people cannot even afford to buy their monthly food ration, creating a flourishing black market in unused ration coupons.

After dropping 2 percent in 1980, the total output of Poland's factories and mines fell 14 percent last year and roughly 8.5 percent during the first 6 months of 1982. The output of many key consumer goods is down 20 to 40 percent from last year.

Supplies of processed feed for livestock are now down 55 percent. Poland is unable to purchase the grain needed to keep livestock and poultry at normal production levels. This could lead to random slaughtering and worsening meat shortages. This pattern is one that is alarmingly similar to one we see in the U.S.S.R.

Poland's Parliamentary Planning Commission has noted that "despite the concerted efforts of the political leadership, the Government, and society, the recession has not been halted." It was announced that overall industrial production in the first half of 1982 was 6 percent lower than the same period last year.

An outstanding debt of nearly $26 billion still cripples the Polish nation, costing them $3.5 billion each year in servicing costs. Overall, the Poles owe $10 billion in 1982 debts alone. Western creditor banks are currently negotiating with the Poles on when these debts and the interest will be repaid. It is now quite evident that the Poles, Western bankers, and the U.S. Government all drastically overextended themselves during the 1970's in terms of loan policy.

It is clear that Soviet-style communism has failed to provide the Polish people with a decent standard of living since its inception on July 22, 1944. The spread of despair has increased due to the failure of the Central Government to turn around the economy after the institution of martial law.

Since they have crushed any real influence Solidarity had over economic planning, the junta is solely to blame for the economic mess Poland is in. If the Polish people are less than excited about their "National Day," it is because of the government's insistence on tight adherence to a rigid, unappropriate economic system.

How the Polish public have reacted to this year's "National Day" festivities remains unclear. However, it is doubtful that the regime has allowed their subjects to express their longstanding distaste for the Russians and their brand of socialism.

I am most pleased that General Jaruzelski has approved the release of some political prisoners and has lightened restrictions on individual freedoms in an effort to placate public opinion at home and in the West. Unfortunately, over 600 persons will still remain in jail. However, it is my belief that the Soviets will not allow any real loosening of the repressive grip the junta has over the Polish people. Recent statements in Izvestia and Pravda have strongly urged continued tight control. Condemnations of the Catholic Church's large role in Polish society have become heated, with Moscow rejecting the visit of Pope Paul IV this August. In the past, what Moscow has "suggested" has become policy in Warsaw. Therefore, I am not optimistic about the possibilities for further reform in Poland this summer.

Nevertheless, it is my strong hope that General Jaruzelski will have the courage to ignore Soviet ostracism and sit down with the leaders of the Catholic Church and Solidarity in a spirit of unity to decide the economic and political future of Poland. I will be watching the development of plans to form a "National Committee for Rebirth" with great interest.

If church officials and moderate members of Solidarity are allowed to participate in this body, it can forge a popular, flexible economic program for Poland's future. If not, this body could become an instrument for the continued suppression of the interests of Polish workers and society in general.

The underground leaders of solidarity have recognized the need for calm and cooperation. They have called on their membership to observe a moratorium on antigovernment protests for the rest of this month and have challenged the authorities to return the gesture by renewing dialog with the suspended trade union.

Now, as Poland experiences a day which symbolizes despair, disappointment, and shattered dreams it is my hope that the American people and the U.S. Government will continue to support the aspirations of the Polish people. President Reagan has maintained a firm policy of refusing to allow U.S. participation in the construction of the Soviet pipeline. The President has rejected the concept of continuing to make loans to Poland and has stated that Western banks should keep up the pressure on Poland to repay her debts. All these efforts are designed to convince the Government of Poland that we are seriously concerned about the repression of free trade unions, the abuse of human rights, and the continuation of martial law in Poland. The President's policies deserve our support. We must continue to do all we can to urge a peaceful solution of the Polish crisis by all interested parties inside Poland.●

TESTIMONY OF MARK B. FELDMAN ON S. 708, BUSINESS ACCOUNTING AND FOREIGN TRADE SIMPLIFICATION ACT

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, one of the ways in which the current Foreign Corrupt Practices Act has made it difficult for U.S. companies to do business overseas is the negative way in which the act is perceived by foreign governments.

During the Senate Banking Committee hearings on S. 708 we heard the testimony of Mr. Mark B. Feldman, a former deputy legal adviser with the Department of State with extensive experience in dealing with the problem of questionable corporate payments to foreign government officials. Mr. Feldman's perspective on the international implications of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act is very instructive and I ask that his testimony before the Senate Banking Committee on May 21, 1981, be inserted into the RECORD following my statement.

STATEMENT OF MARK B. FELDMAN

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee: I appreciate the opportunity to testify this morning in support of S. 708, a measure introduced by Senator Chafee and several other Senators to amend and clarify the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977. At the outset I wish to make clear that I am speaking this morning only for myself. Having resigned from the Department of State last Friday, I no longer can speak for the Government. Nor am I speaking for the law firm I joined on Monday or for any client.

If my views are of interest to this Committee, it is because I have been the action officer in the Department of State on matters relating to questionable corporate payments abroad since the first disclosures in 1975. Over the past six years, I have participated in the various interagency efforts to develop a policy response to this problem. I have worked closely with officials from the Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission to try to minimize the foreign policy problems arising out of payments investigations, and I have represented the United States in its vigorous but futile efforts to develop an international agreement to control bribery and extortion involving foreign officials in international commercial transactions.

As I have stated many times in the past, corruption of foreign officials involved in international commerce is an evil of serious practical as well as moral concern to the United States. Bribery and extortion involving foreign officials distorts international trade and investment; it weakens friendly governments in foreign countries important to U.S. interests; and it undermines public confidence in the free enterprise system and in other established values and institutions.

It has been important that the United States take the lead domestically and internationally to try to deal with this problem. I believe we have been successful in disciplining American companies from contributing to the corruption which is endemic in so many societies around the world. However, experience has demonstrated that some of our measures have overshot the mark; that the United States should not seek to impose its values on other countries at the expense of all other U.S. interests in those countries; and that the international community is not yet prepared to join with the United States in a meaningful international response to this problem. While much good has been done, the United States has paid a price for its unilateral legislation, zealous enforcement programs and unrealistic diplomatic objectives. This Committee will serve the national interest well by reviewing the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act to see what should be preserved and what should be revised.

This morning I will address myself to the prohibition of bribery in Sections 103 and 104 of the Act. Others, more expert than I, will address the accounting provisions and the proper role for the Securities and Exchange Commission under this statute. In the short time available to me, I would like to discuss some of the problems for United States trade and U.S. foreign relations and to describe to you the obstacles to international action on this issue.

As to trade, I have no doubt that U.S. exports have been damaged by the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. It is difficult to quantify the impact of various legal disincentives for U.S. exports, but the Task Force on export promotion established by President Carter concluded that, next to U.S. tax policy, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act constitutes the most serious legal disincentive for U.S. exports at this time.

The fact that it is difficult to document the loss of business due to bribery by U.S. competitors does not make the concern any less real. To me the most convincing evidence is the determination with which our major trading partners have resisted U.S. efforts to establish international controls over bribery and extortion involving foreign officials. Some of our closest allies have told us privately that payments are necessary in certain foreign markets and that their economies are not strong enough to risk the loss of business in those markets by curtailing payments by their companies. In other quarters abroad, I believe there is a cynical satisfaction that United States legal restrictions make their products more competitive with ours in third countries.

There is a serious question whether the adverse trade consequences of the FCPA are due to its prohibition of bribery of foreign officials or whether they stem primarily from ambiguities in the law, from certain overbroad provisions, and from over-zealous enforcement policy. I do not know the answer to that question, but I am convinced that uncertainties in the law and enforcement policies have cast a shadow over the foreign operations of U.S. business far longer than Congress intended when it adopted the FCPA.

In my view, the most serious of these uncertainties and policies relate to (1) so-called "facilitating" payments to foreign officials and (2) the regulation of activities of commercial agents in foreign countries. S. 708 addresses both of these difficulties and deals with them effectively.

FACILITATING PAYMENTS

Section 5(b) of the bill would provide that criminal penalties shall not apply to any payment to a foreign official which is customary in the country where made and the purpose of which is to facilitate or expedite performance by the foreign official of his official duties. This provision merely spells out the intent of Congress in adopting the FCPA in the first place, but it is critical that this intent be made explicit because of uncertainties that have arisen in the enforcement of the law.

When corporate payments abroad became a subject of serious discussion in the Executive Branch and in the Congress, it was generally recognized that new U.S. legislation on this subject should not cover "grease payments". For example, both Senator Frank Church and Secretary of Commerce Elliott Richardson took the position in 1976 that "grease payment" should be excluded from any payments legislation. (See Remarks of Senator Church, Congressional Record, S 19800, November 12, 1975; letter from Secretary of Commerce Richardson to Senator William Proxmire, June 11, 1976.)

The reason was evident. In a great many developing countries civil servants are poorly paid, and it is a customary practice to provide them gratuities. The name varies from country to country but the idea is the same. Such payments may be required to process papers, to clear goods through customs, or even to make an overseas phone call. Whatever the moral validity of this practice, it would be impossible to do business in large areas of the world without such payments.

The FCPA as drafted had a very narrow focus. It was intended to prevent bribes made to foreign officials to obtain, to retain, or to direct business to any person. (e.g., section 104(a), FCPA, 18 U.S.C. 78 dd-2.) The evil to which the statute was directed was the payment of large sums to government officials to obtain contracts that might have been awarded to competitors on the merits. The Act was not intended to police the myriad small payments which are a matter of everyday life in many countries.

This intent is unmistakable in the Act's definition of "foreign official" which expressly excludes employees "whose duties are essentially ministerial or clerical." (e.g., Section 104 (d) (2)). Indeed, when the language of the FCPA is compared with other bills considered by the Congress, it is clear the bribery provisions of the Act apply only to the competition for business; they were not meant to apply, for example, to the numerous local regulations applicable to foreign investments that present so many opportunities for extortion and bribery.

Despite this clear legislative focus, enforcement officials have made it known they are not sure that grease payments are excluded from the Act. At times they have implied that any payment made in connection with a contract or investment could be classified as being for the purpose of obtaining or retaining business.

A case often cited is the hypothetical—or not so hypothetical—situation where a customs official, who fails to receive his accustomed gratuity, ignores a shipment of perishable goods lying in the harbor. The frantic company official in the field must then decide whether to lose the shipment or to risk violating the law. I recall one seminar on the Act where a member of the bar expressed doubts he could advise his client that a facilitating payment to save the shipment would not violate the law. One enforcement official told me privately he thought the attorney guilty of timidity, but the Justice official present did not share that view. S. 708 should put this question to rest.

AGENTS FEES

I turn next, to the question of agents fees. The FCPA punishes management not only for corrupt payments made by it but also for payments to any person—typically a sales agent—"while knowing or having reason to know" that some of the money will be passed on to a foreign official for a forbidden purpose. The argument for this provision is that it is necessary to close a loophole for the payment of bribes by management through third parties.

The problem is the ambiguity of the phrase "having reason to know" compounded by the guidance by law enforcement agencies as to the precautions necessary to avoid culpability under this provision. For instance, Justice officials are known to believe that firm instructions to an agent not to pay bribes may not be sufficient precaution even when an agent receives a customary fee for his services. Companies are encouraged to take other measures to ensure that agents do not engage in a frolic of their own including such measures as refusing to pay agents' fees into bank accounts in third countries, or requiring access to the agent's books and records.

The predictable response of many agents to such proposals by U.S. companies is to refuse to do business with them. Foreign businessmen have no desire to become enmeshed in procedures required by U.S. law or to risk embarrassing inquiries into their business practices. They can find other customers for their services.

As a matter of public policy, it is appropriate that a statute prohibiting bribery should prohibit bribes made through third persons. It does not follow that the United States should seek to regulate the practices of foreign agents doing business with U.S. firms at arms-length. Such regulation intrudes too deeply into the mores of foreign countries and places too great a burden on U.S. trade and investment overseas. S. 708 deals effectively with this issue by penalizing a U.S. concern that corruptly directs or authorizes an unlawful payment by a third party.

GIFTS AND HOSPITALITY

There are several other helpful features in S. 708. Section 6(b), for instance, excludes gifts given as a courtesy or in return for hospitality and payment of expenses, such as travel and lodging, relating to the demonstration of products or operations. This provision clarifies an ambiguity which has troubled corporate executives. Section 6(b) also clarifies that the Act was not intended to prohibit payments that are lawful under the laws of the foreign official's own country. Both of these clarifications conform to the original intent of the Act.

Section 7 addresses another legitimate concern of U.S. business by making clear that conduct which is lawful under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act is not to be prosecuted under the mail fraud and wire fraud statutes (18 U.S.C. 1341 and 1343). I was surprised when Justice first began to prosecute foreign payments cases under these statutes. When the Richardson Task Force reviewed legislation that might be implicated by illicit payments abroad, no one suggested that these statutes were applicable. The letter from the Secretary of Commerce to the Chairman of this Committee of June 11, 1976 reviews the legislation thought to be applicable at that time. No mention is made of wire fraud or mail fraud.

The debate was whether the Government should adopt a criminalization approach or a disclosure approach. It seems doubtful to me that Congress would have gone to the trouble of adopting the FCPA in 1977 if it thought that the traditional mail fraud and wire fraud statutes already prohibited the conduct to be punished by the new Act.

GUIDELINES, REVIEW PROCEDURES AGREEMENTS

I am less enthusiastic about the provisions of S. 708 relating to guidelines, review procedures and international agreements. The provisions of Section 8 relating to guidelines and review procedures may be worth experimenting with but I do not entertain great hopes that they will help. The provisions of Section 10 relating to agreements I am sure will not work.

As the State Department officer heretofore responsible for our diplomatic efforts to negotiate an international agreement to prohibit bribery and extortion involving foreign officials, I am pessimistic that international action can be achieved in the near future that will eliminate the competitive disadvantage of the U.S. business operating under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. I am not at all sure that the particular arrangements contemplated by Section 10(a)—standards of conduct for business practices and an agreement for rates of commission—would be effective if they could be achieved. An agreement to adopt and to enforce laws penalizing the bribery of foreign officials, as sought by the United States over the last five years, could be more effective. However, our experience demonstrates that there is no international interest in such an arrangement at the present time.

It might be of interest to review briefly the history of U.S. diplomacy to achieve an international agreement on illicit payments. That initiative was first announced by Deputy Secretary of State Robert Ingersoll in hearings before this Committee in March 1976. At the time we thought there were reasonable prospects for success, because the UN General Assembly in December 1975 had adopted by consensus a resolution calling upon home and host governments to cooperate to eliminate bribery by multinational enterprises. However, a number of industrial and developing countries resisted initiation of negotiations of such an agreement in the United Nations.

After several years of intense diplomatic effort, including a number of personal initiatives by President Carter, the United States achieved several resolutions by Heads of Government and Ministers endorsing an agreement in general terms, and we succeeded in negotiating the terms of an agreement based on the concept of criminalization in a Committee of the UN Economic and Social Council. However, the United States was never able to obtain a decision by the Council to convene a diplomatic conference to conclude an agreement on illicit payments. We made a major diplomatic effort to convene such a conference in 1978 and in 1979, and we made a final effort to do so in 1980. All of these efforts failed because the developing countries insisted on linking negotiation of an agreement on illicit payments with the adoption of a broad UN code of conduct for multinational enterprises.

When U.S. efforts in the United Nations failed, President Carter decided to press for international agreement among the industrial countries who have been meeting annually at the Economic Summit. Although President Carter received general assurances of support for this initiative from Heads of Government, those assurances did not translate into cooperation at the working level. The Reagan Administration has decided not to pursue the Carter initiative in the Summit process, and is now considering other, more low key procedures for keeping the idea alive.

Personally, I believe that it is in the U.S. interest and in the general international interest to work towards an eventual agreement that will discourage bribery in international trade. However, I do not believe the United States can expect early progress on such an agreement, and I question how much further major diplomatic capital should be expended in that effort. There is a strong implication in Section 10(c) of S. 708 that the U.S. should consider taking retaliatory action against our trading partners who do not match our efforts in restraining bribery of foreign officials. I doubt the benefits of such a policy would justify the costs.

I have concluded my testimony on the provision of S. 708, but I would be remiss if I did not say a word about another dimension of this issue—and that is the potential foreign policy problems that could arise out of the administration of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. Although the Act prohibits conduct by U.S. nationals and not by foreign officials, it necessarily involves U.S. law enforcement agencies in the investigation of the conduct of foreign officials in their own countries. It is hard to overestimate the potential damage to U.S. relations with another country if we find ourselves investigating and disclosing misconduct by the Head of Government or other senior officials of that country. It is not hard to imagine that corruption exists at high levels of some governments that are very important to United States interests in the world. It is likely that one day the policies of this Act and critical U.S. foreign policy interests will come into sharp conflict.●

MIRACLE IN MERIDIAN

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, on Sunday, July 11, more than 350 people gathered to worship at the brandnew Treasure Valley Baptist Church, a southern-style sanctuary on the outskirts of Meridian, Idaho.

The completion of the church and the size of the congregation that gathered for the very first service there is a testament to the dreams—and the determination—of the young pastor, Buddy Hoffman.

Six years ago, Buddy and Jody Hoffman arrived in Idaho fresh out of Bible college and rented a room in a TV studio for weekly services. The first week only two people showed up. But Buddy was not discouraged. He was determined to become a preacher and to build a church. And he believed that if you want something and work hard enough for it, it will happen. As a child he had overcome polio because the word "can't" was never in his vocabulary. Surely his dream to build a church and preach there could also come true.

And now it has.

The story of how it happened—the "Miracle in Meridian"—is related in a fine article by Silvia Horkley in the July 14 edition of the Ada County Valley News. I want to congratulate my friends Buddy and Jody Hoffman on the realization of their dream, and I ask that the article by inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article follows:

UNDAUNTED PASTOR INCREASES FOLD

(By Silvia Horkley)

When Pastor Buddy Hoffman came West to establish his own Independent Baptist Church in August, 1976, he rented the conference room at KTVB, Channel 7 Studios in Boise, printed up and distributed 10,000 flyers, and prayed a lot.

Two people showed up.

Undaunted, he printed 10,000 more flyers, and true to his odds, got two more people. With the first two himself, his wife, Jody, and another friend, that made seven.

This past Sunday, Pastor Buddy stood before a standing room only congregation of more than 350 worshippers, thanking them for the beautiful new church they had all helped to build with their own time, sweat and money.

The Treasure Valley Baptist Church, which can be seen on the south side of Interstate-84 just east of Meridian, is finally a reality.

A dream, which many said wouldn't happen, came true, thanks to the belief and dedication of the people who spent every spare minute hammering, sawing, painting, spackling, sheetrocking, and the thousands of tasks that erecting a building requires.

The new building reverberated Sunday with the collective joyful voices of a people who had fought a battle and won. And Pastor Buddy, as he is affectionately called, has been their leader.

Douglas Guy Hoffman, Jr., a small but dynamic man with a boyish face that's somewhere between angelic and mischievious, was born a little over 28 years ago in Atlanta, Georgia. He still retains a southern drawl.

When he was only 10 months old, Hoffman contracted polio. He relied on crutches and braces until he was five, and then was able to get by with just the leg braces.

At that time, some of the medical profession thought it best not to try to exercise a polio victim's atrophying extremeties, but rather just have the person rely on the support of braces. The doctors said that Buddy, as his dad nicknamed him, would never be able to run or ride a bike as other kids do.

In response to this news, Hoffman's parents promptly went out and bought a bicycle for their son, which they parked on the front porch so he could see it often. Out of sheer determination, he learned to ride it.

"My mother always said that 'can't' isn't in our dictionary," Hoffman said. "We can do anything we want to do."

"Actually, having polio is one of the greatest things that ever happened to me," he says earnestly. "It taught me that when people say something can't be done, it just means it's a little bit harder.

"There's no such word as can't. If you make up your mind to do something, and you really want to do it, you can."

After high school, Hoffman underwent a muscle transplant for his wasted leg muscles, and today gets around just fine, except for a barely noticable limp.

Though he is only 5'7", his arms and shoulders are well developed. He admits he works out regularly and can bench press over 200 pounds. He says he doesn't want to take any chances of having his body waste away again.

As far as preaching goes, it's nothing new to him. He comes from a long line of preachers.

"We've had pastors and preachers in every generation since the Civil War," he boasts.

As for himself, he wasn't positive that the preaching life was for him, and even his grandmother tried to talk him out of it.

"She told me, 'We've got enough preachers in the family. You be rich,' " he laughs.

Hoffman says if you can be happy doing anything but preaching, then you haven't been called.

"I know I was called," he says positively. He says he tried other jobs at which he could make some good money, but they didn't cut the mustard.

"I always had to think, what am I doing now that 100 years from now will make any difference?" he said.

After Hoffman's humble beginnings at KTVB, the small congregation moved to a room rented from the YMCA. The third time they met, there were 25 people, a respectable roomful.

After meeting at the YMCA for a while, their numbers expanded and they moved to the Locust Grove Grange, where they have been for the last several years.

It has been cramped, crowded and inconvenient. They held Sunday School classes in vans outside. The nursery was in the furnace room. But the people still came, and Hoffman says they were grateful just to have a place to meet.

As Hoffman has become stronger in the leadership of his congregation, he has also expanded his interests and has become involved in a cause that is at once popular and very unpopular, depending on who one asks.

Hoffman is the Idaho chairman of the Moral Majority, a group which has burst into public consciousness of recent, questioning everything from abortions to humanism taught in the public schools.

Hoffman's reason for getting involved is the abortion issue, which he views purely and simply as murder.

He explains that as a teenager, he found library pictures of Jews being slaughtered in concentration camps and could not believe that human beings could treat each other in such a manner. His eyes redden at the thought.

Hoffman said he asked a favorite uncle if he had known what was happening, and the uncle admitted he had.

"What did you do about it," Hoffman said he asked his uncle, only to be told there was nothing that could have been done.

Hoffman says when his children discover there was a time that innocent children were murdered before they were born, and ask him if he knew about it, he will have to say yes.

"And when they ask me what I did about it, I want to be able to say, 'Everything in my power,' " he said.

"But there are a lot of things Dr. (Jerry) Falwell (national director of the Moral Majority) does that I don't necessarily agree with. I'm not rightwing on every issue," he said.

Hoffman feels that perhaps the Moral Majority has outlived its usefulness and the hoopla made over its existence overshadows any actual good it may do, he said. He is seriously considering resigning his chairmanship, and attending more to the matters at hand, like his new church, he said.

"This church is a miracle in Meridian," he said. Because of the great amount of donations, including a pipe organ, a piano, the copper cross that graces the top of the structure, the pulpit, the baptismal fount, and the countless hours of donated labor, the church was built for just a fraction of what it would have cost to have it built professionally.

Actually, it still is not totally completed, and may not be for some time. There are still some floors to be carpeted, a parking lot to be paved, and pews—which cost $14,000—are needed to replace the rows of folding chairs in the sanctuary. But these and other things can wait until the money is raised, Hoffman says.

"We have an aversion to debt," he said.

"Besides, I feel that if it is God's work, he will provide. This church is a testimony to that fact."●

JIM WATT, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, Jim Watt, the Secretary of the Interior, has been one of the most controversial figures in the Reagan administration. I think it is fair to say that no Cabinet officer, even including the Secretary of Labor, has received such universally bad press. Jim Watt has been attacked in the press for everything he has done.

Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I was a little bit surprised to read the results of a recent poll conducted by the Gallup organization, on the public's perceptions of Jim Watt. Interestingly enough, Jim Watt receives a very favorable rating from the people of the country.

He is not the best known of the Reagan Cabinet officers. Cap Weinberger and Donald Regan were known to more people than Watt. Only 80 percent of Americans felt they knew enough about Watt to rate him, while the numbers for Weinberger and Regan were 84 and 82 percent.

And Watt is not the most popular of Cabinet officers. Weinberger received a favorable rating of 73 percent, while Regan weighed in at 71 percent. Watt's rating, while somewhat lower, was still over 60 percent. To me, that is a remarkable figure, given the treatment of Watt in the press.

Mr. Gallup, in analyzing these figures, cautions that "these are ratings of each man as a person, not job performance ratings." Well, Mr. President, maybe so, but my perception is that the press has talked very little about Jim Watt (or the other two, for that matter) as individuals, and a very great deal about him as a Secretary of Interior. I doubt seriously that the public at large knows whether Jim Watts beats his dogs or has crab grass in his lawn. They do know what he proposes on wilderness and environmental matters, because that is what they have been told.

And with all they have been told, and as distorted as it has often been, they still retain a 61 percent favorable view of him. Mr. President, I suggest that that is nothing short of remarkable, and a tribute to a great public servant, our Secretary of the Interior, Jim Watt.

I ask that the attached Gallup poll be printed in the RECORD.

The information follows:

PUBLIC'S KNOWLEDGE OF CABINET MEMBERS

According to Gallup, respondents "were asked whether they have a favorable or unfavorable opinion of members of the (Reagan) Cabinet who have figured prominately in the news in recent months. . . . The survey also sought to determine the percentage of persons surveyed who know each of the men tested well enough to offer a rating. The following table shows the awareness levels for each Cabinet member."

COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS FOR FEDERAL CIVILIAN AND MILITARY RETIREES

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, on Tuesday, July 20, the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee approved a 4-percent ceiling on annual cost-of-living adjustments for retired Federal workers

This 4-percent cap is less than half the 8.7-percent COLA these retirees received this year, and less than two-thirds of what the Congressional Budget Office estimates they would otherwise get under the existing no-limits linkage of the cost-of-living adjustment to the Consumer Price Index.

This morning, Mike Causey of the Washington Post wrote a well-balanced and factual account of the effect this 4-percent COLA cap will have on Federal retirees, and the political and legislative history leading up to the adoption of this cap.

From my perspective, Mr. Causey's concluding statement goes to the heart of my concern for Federal retirees and for the integrity of Congress.

Causey writes:

Most feds realize their retirement plan is one of the nation's best. They help pay for it and, unlike Social Security, pay taxes on it. It is one reason they came into government. But a lot of them wish Congress and the White House would tackle the problem—inflation—not their catch-up-with-inflation raises.

Mr. President, I ask that Mike Causey's column from today's Washington Post be printed in its entirety in the RECORD for all Senators to read.

The column referred to follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 22, 1982]

FEDERAL RETIREES HAVE A COMMON INTEREST

(By Mike Causey)

The 1.7 million federal retirees who would be put on a 4 percent COLA (cost-of-living adjustment) diet for the next three years come in all shapes and sizes, but have a few important things in common:

All either worked for Uncle Sam long enough to earn an annuity, or were married to somebody who did. All have seen promised benefit cutbacks in recent years.

Many feel that politicians of both parties—especially Republicans and particularly President Reagan—con them at election time with pension-protection promises that fade after the votes are counted.

Some retirees are doing well, thanks to the government retirement system. But the majority are living modestly. They watch the Consumer Price Index the way deep-sea fishermen watch the barometer.

Earlier this week the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee went along with the budget (already approved by the Senate and House) which caps the next three annual pay and pension adjustments for federal workers and retirees at 4 percent.

Retirees now get a raise each March to match the previous year's rise in living costs. Five months ago they got an 8.7 percent raise.

Lots of retirees think they have gotten a bad rap from the media, which has frequently quoted a few retired members of Congress and former federal officials who complain that their own retirement checks are embarrassingly high.

Some points about retirees:

They are scattered across the nation (heavy in Florida, California, Virginia and Texas) and 110,000 live in foreign countries. There are 100,000 former military and feds here.

Their average age is 66.9 years. Their average age at retirement is 59.3 years.

There are 1.3 million retirees; 458,000 survivors.

The average monthly annuity is just over $1,000. The average survivor benefit is just under $450.

More than 1,000 get monthly pensions of less than $50. About 74,000 get less than $200 a month, and 270,000 get less than $500 a month.

About 10,000 retirees (mostly long-service, high-salaried officials and members of Congress) get about $3,000 monthly.

Percentage raises for retirees during the late 1970's period of high inflation went up faster than pay of federal employes, because pay was frequently capped by Congress or the White House.

Some top-paid workers who retired during the period of double-digit inflation (when pay was capped) now get annuities that are higher than their former salaries. Retirees blame inflation for this, not the system.

The annual payout to retirees is over $15 billion a year, plus $2.4 billion to survivors. Washington area retirees get over a billion dollars a year. Retirees range from relatively well-off ex-supergraders to former clerks who live from month to month.

The U.S. retirees whom politicians and the media see tend to be from the financial elite, the ones who have good incomes, second careers and summer homes. They rarely hobnob with ex-civil servants living in Georgia trailer parks, or apartments in College Park.

Last election two candidates—Jimmy Carter and John Anderson—proposed limiting retirees to one COLA raise a year. Candidate Ronald Reagan pledged, in writing to the National Association of Retired Federal Employees, that he would not tamper with their twice-yearly adjustments if elected.

A followup poll by NARFE showed that better than 80 percent of its half million members voted for Reagan. The poll results were hardly public before Reagan proposed—and Congress agreed—to eliminate the September COLA adjustment, and give retirees one raise a year.

Most feds realize their retirement plan is one of the nation's best. They help pay for it and, unlike Social Security, pay taxes on it. It is one reason they came into government. But a lot of them wish Congress and the White House would tackle the problem—inflation—not their catch-up-with-inflation raises.●

NAVY'S CONGRESS RATINGS: SCORE THEM ZERO

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, this week's issue of Defense Week has an article, "Navy Political Index Rates the Congressmen (Stevens 57, Warner 100", which should give us all cause of concern.

According to the article, I was fortunate enough to rate 100 under the Navy's system, so I should, I suppose, be pleased. I must say, however, that I am not.

Members of the military are trained to defend our Nation, not to rate Members of Congress. Ours is a nation of civilian rule, not military control. Elected officials should not have to feel that their every vote is being placed under the careful scrutiny of military judges who are rating their friendliness on defense issues.

The Defense Week piece quoted a Navy legislative affairs office staff member as saying 11 recent "representative pieces of legislation" served as the basis for the ratings. Further, he said, every member of the Congressional Military Reform Caucus was rated. In the officer's words. "We concentrate on them more than on any other group."

I have two reactions to this. First, I can only conclude that the legislative affairs office may have too many personnel and too few things to do. If they have time to codify and commit to paper a refined rating system concentrating on a selected group of elected officials, it strikes me that they may have too much time on their hands. Perhaps the Navy needs to review whether it has an overstaffing problem.

What troubles me more, though, is what I perceive as an "us against them" kind of attitude underlying the decision to rate reform caucus members. This attitude, reflected earlier in the statement of a high ranking Air Force officer who described the reform movement as an "internal threat" to the military, is, I believe, an unhealthy one.

I find this combative approach by the military to the reform caucus offensive. The caucus was formed to introduce new ideas, to challenge old concepts, and to see whether we can supply some fresh approaches that will strengthen our defense capability.

That some military officials feel a need to focus on us, to place our votes under a microscope, is objectionable to me. This entire exercise could only encourage an unhealthy competition among the services for their own ratings games.

Members of Congress could, if we wished, play the same game. The services, and their representatives who testify before us, could be rated on how forthcoming they are, how devious, obstructive, or nasty. I am certain that officers up for promtion would not want Members of Congress to file a numerical rating which would be taken into account as they proceed up their career path.

Members of Congress realize when they cast votes that they are not doing so in a vacuum. They know that special interest groups will be selecting representative votes and rating them. That is a fact of life.

But for individuals in one branch of the Government to rate those in another branch is unacceptable. There is simply no place for that sort of thing.

And I am especially troubled by the apparent premise of the Navy ratings. TED STEVENS is no less committed to a strong national defense than I am, yet he scores "a lowly 57," in the words of Defense Week.

Do the people who devised this rating system feel there is something wrong with constructive dissent? I do not feel, for instance, that my opposition to reactivating the aircraft carrier Oriskany, an action apparently not included in the Navy's ratings, is an anti-defense vote. Rather it reflects my belief that such a step would not substantially enhance the Navy's capabilities and that its cost could not be justified.

That, then, is my problem with this sort of ratings system. I recognize that our military services, and all other Government agencies, closely follow how we vote on their programs. They have, I know, a keen interest in what we do. But singling out one group of members, because of their commitment to "military reform," for special review and a codified ratings system is distressing.

I am contacting the Secretary of the Navy, John Lehman, personally to urge him to stop this activity. We must all work together on behalf of a strong national defense. The Navy's ratings only run counter to that goal.●

ADMINISTRATION URGED TO CONTINUE WITH STRONG STAND AGAINST STEEL SUBSIDIES

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, on Monday, July 26, I will initiate a colloquy on the current trade crisis in the steel industry and I invite all interested Senators to participate. I do so because I believe that we are rapidly approaching a critical juncture for the American steel industry, as pressure to resolve the outstanding steel cases intensifies.

Thus far the administration is to be commended for taking a strong stand in support of strict adherence to free market principles and international trading rules. I am concerned, however, that growing pressure from the European Community to find some easy way out of their responsibilities may end up landing on receptive ears in Washington in the interests of expediency.

That, Mr. President, would be most unfortunate. The facts in these cases could not be more clear. European steel subsidies violate both U.S. law and international agreements which the Europeans have signed. We went through 5 years of negotiations to produce those agreements. We made significant concessions of our own to reach them. We did so because they represent major increases in discipline over subsidies, dumping, and other unfair trade practices that plague the international commercial system.

The essence of our trade policy since then has been to encourage broader participation in those codes and to promote the discipline embodied in them through encouraging strict adherence to their provisions.

The pending steel cases represent the most serious test of the codes to date. Simply put, the Europeans do not want to accept the responsibilities they agreed to undertake in 1979. They do not want the rules enforced. They do not want to make the hard economic decisions about their own steel industry that the market requires them to make. They would rather export their unemployment to the United States.

Nevertheless this is a test we must meet. First, our own steel industry demands it. Capacity utilization is currently hovering near 40 percent. Over 115,000 steelworkers have been laid off. Major plant shutdowns have occurred. Not to defend our own industry—particularly when it is consistent with our own law and with our international obligations to do so—is to turn an already serious situation into a major disaster.

Second, the survival of discipline in the international trading system demands it. As I noted, this is the first serious test of the rules we all agreed to in 1979. To fail this test now is to make inevitable further, even more serious breaches in the future. Obviously conditions in the European steel industry are difficult. They are difficult here as well. That is precisely why this threat to the trading system is so great. The solution to that problem is not to seek to evade the rules, to countenance subsidies, dumping, and other efforts to avoid the reality of the marketplace, but rather to permit the market system to operate as it was intended.

That is precisely what our administration's policy has been thus far, and it is precisely what it should continue to be. To emphasize that fact to all concerned, I have asked for time on the Senate floor Monday to discuss this issue in greater detail with my colleagues, and, along with the rest of the steel caucus executive committee, I am circulating a letter to the Secretary of Commerce which I hope other caucus members will join me in signing. I encourage all my colleagues to join in the colloquy Monday and to sign this letter, copies of which have been sent to all caucus members. Mr. President, I ask that the letter and some additional background information be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

HEINZ URGES ADMINISTRATION NOT TO "BACK AWAY" ON IMPORTED STEEL

WASHINGTON.—Senator John Heinz today warned the Reagan administration not to "back away" from its strong stand against heavily subsidized European steel imports.

Speaking as Chairman of the 47-member Senate Steel Caucus, Heinz said, "What is at stake here is both the survival of our steel industry and the principle of free trade embodied in the international agreements the Europeans have signed. This principle is too important to abandon in the interest of expediency."

Referring to news reports that the European Community will attempt to use the settlement authority in current law on a case-by-case basic rather than continuing to negotiate an overall steel settlement, Heinz said, "This tactic is nothing more than a ploy to circumvent the international agreements the United States and the European Community signed in 1979 and to find an 'easy road' that will allow them to avoid their responsibilities."

Pennsylvania's senior Senator also praised Commerce Secretary Baldridge for "thus far taking a strong position in support of enforcing our law" but expressed concern that "other voices" in the Administration might be beginning to weaken in the interests of maintaining smooth relations with Europe.

"With the American steel industry operating at 40% capacity and with nearly one-third of America's steelworkers unemployed, the Reagan Administration cannot expect the Congress to stand by and permit the further dismemberment of U.S. industry," Heinz said.

"The Administration has come to Congress seeking support for such tariff cutting initiatives as the Caribbean Basin proposal. It is also asking us to oppose domestic local content legislation for automobiles. The President cannot expect Congress to go along with such efforts if he is simultaneously going to abandon a basic American industry that has consistently proven its case before the Department of Commerce and the International Trade Commission."

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D.C., July 22, 1982.

To the Senate Steel Caucus Staff:

The recent announcement by the European Community that it plans to seek settlements of the pending complaints within the provisions of the Trade Agreements Act with respect to the products covered in the complaints, rather than through the comprehensive approach it had been engaged in thus far, has increased the pressure on our government and aroused some concern that these cases could be concluded in a way not acceptable to the industry and not broad enough to eliminate the injury being suffered.

Accordingly, it would be helpful at this point to send some messages of encouragement to the Administration, Secretary Baldridge in particular, urging him to hold firm to the course he has been taking thus far.

To that end, Sen. Heinz has prepared the attached letter and has reserved time on the floor on Monday for a colloquy on the subject of the trade crisis in the steel industry. Also enclosed is some additional information and background on recent developments.

If your senator wishes to sign the letter or participate in the colloquy, please contact Bill Reinsch of Sen. Heinz' office (x46324) by noon Friday. Events are moving quickly on this issue right now, and it is important that we act immediately if we are to have any influence on the outcome.

Sincerely,

JOHN HEINZ.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D.C., July 22, 1982.

Hon. MALCOLM BALDRIGE,
Secretary of Commerce,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: We are writing to urge you to continue your strong stand in support of adherence to agreed upon international trading rules and against subsidized steel imports.

We believe your Department's decisions thus far reflect our view that the Europeans are clearly subsidizing their steel production in violation of U.S. law and GATT agreements at the expense of American workers. Far from a "protectionist" action, the Administration's efforts on steel thus far have served to vigorously enforce the rule of law and the principle of the free market in the face of growing evidence that the European Community would prefer to ignore both those standards. Ultimately, the result of your policy will be a stronger international trading community as well as a stronger American steel industry.

As members of the Senate Steel Caucus, we are particularly interested in the latter and are increasingly concerned about declines in capacity utilization—now down to 40 percent—and employment—over 110,000 workers are currently laid off—that are causing serious economic distress in many parts of the country. Not to fully enforce our trade laws at this critical juncture will turn an already serious situation into a major disaster.

We are aware, however, that as the time for a suitable settlement diminishes, pressure to settle on any terms will increase. Already the European Community has launched a major campaign to that end, and we are concerned that other voices in the Administration may pick up that cry of expediency and advocate a settlement short of what is needed to fully eliminate the injury being suffered. Many of us have, in the past, supported Administration proposals for freer trade despite short term adverse consequences for American industries. We did so knowing that at the same time this Administration stood firmly behind the principle of fair trade as well, meaning strict adherence to international rules and agreements; and that industries injured by unfair imports would be supported with the full weight of the government. That support is now being tested. If the Administration does not respond, particularly in a case like steel where U.S. law, international agreements, and our own economic interests all coincide, we would expect considerable reluctance on the part of Members of Congress generally to support freer trade initiatives and to resist legislation like the local content bill.

Accordingly, we hope you will hold firm to the position you have taken thus far and will not agree to any steel settlement that does not satisfy the industry as being sufficiently broad to fully eliminate the injury suffered.

Sincerely,

JOHN HEINZ.●

ONE OF THREE KIDS IN 1980 ON WELFARE BEFORE 18

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, Mr. Gus Tyler, assistant president of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, has recently written a fine article on the status of children on welfare. This is a useful summary of a serious national problem, one that deserves this body's attention. I ask that this article be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

The article follows:

ONE OF THREE KIDS BORN IN 1980 ON WELFARE BEFORE 18

(By Gus Tyler)

NEW YORK.—One out of every three children born in the year 1980 will be "on relief" before reaching the age of 18.

That is the disturbing and, for many, startling conclusion of Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York. "The descent into welfare dependency is so chronic," writes Moynihan in The New Republic magazine, "that how we deal with it can legitimately be thought of as the question of how the nation will care for its children."

For Moynihan, this question of "dependency," and especially of dependent children, is not new. Under three Presidents—Kennedy, Johnson, and Nixon—he has given major chunks of his critical thinking to the question of children, growing up—or trying to grow up—in the seemingly dissolving American family. His latest research is spurred by the Administration's proposal to turn Aid for Dependent Children over to the states.

It's the worst time to do so, argues Moynihan, because the dependency ratio—the percentage of children who will be eligible for assistance—is growing. Since 1940, there has been a rise "in the proportion of children who receive public assistance." The 1980 ratio—one out of three—is "four times the 1940 ratio."

The root of the problem is, of course, not the kids, but their parents. "The welfare population today is associated to a substantial degree not with widowhood (the basis for the original law on aid to families with dependent children) but "with abandoned female-headed families, or those that never had a father at home in the first place." Whether white or black, female-headed families have an income that is less than half that of husband-wife families. There has been a "feminization of poverty" in America.

Child dependency is growing, is national, and is a serious threat to the future of America. It is the kind of massive, overall, many-faceted problem that dare not be neglected and should not be swept under the rug by turning it over to the states.

"The only clear policy prescription that emerges from the almost half-century of experience with the AFDC program is that the time has come to make it a truly national program, as was done with every other provision of the original Social Security Act of 1935."

To turn the American future over to the states is to trivialize the problem of the nation's children. Some states, with above average cash and conscience, will act; other states will not. Some will raise standards; others will lower them.

But in the long run, all standards will come down, because those dependent families living in poor or poorly intentioned states will move to the more generous states. As the burden grows in the latter, pressure will grow to reduce benefits. The states will begin to contest one another on who can offer less as a way of dumping undesired kids on to other states.

The assumption of responsibility by the Federal government will not, Moynihan says, solve the problem of growing dependency. At best, it will cope with a spreading disease.

Federal responsibility, however, could mean more than providing for the unfortunate children. It could establish a center, a national site, for digging into the source of the social malady to cure the disease.●

A COURT SAYS NO TO BILINGUAL EDUCATION

● Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, last week, the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a lower court decision which required bilingual education for all Mexican-American children in Texas public schools. This ruling is important for its shows that while we have an obligation to teach Spanish-speaking children English, it does not have to be done with bilingual education.

Many Spanish-speaking people in this country are demanding bilingual instruction so that their children can have equal educational opportunities. However, by using bilingual education, they are more interested in helping to maintain the child's home language and culture than in having the child learn English. We must remember that the goal is to teach these children English, not to maintain the child's culture. Teaching English can be achieved by means other than bilingual education which the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals recognized by its ruling.

Mr. President, I ask that an article and editorial from the Washington Post about this case be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 13, 1982]

TEXAS SCHOOL BILINGUAL EDUCATION REJECTED

NEW ORLEANS.—A Federal appeals court yesterday threw out a lower court decision requiring bilingual education for all Mexican-American children in Texas public schools.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed U.S. District Court Judge William Wayne Justice of Tyler, Tex., who ruled that Mexican-American students were receiving unequal treatment and ordered school officials to provide bilingual instruction.

A three-judge panel of the 5th Circuit questioned the "entire factual underpinning" of the case and declared that Justice had overstepped his legal bounds. The judge declined comment.

A legal watchdog group set up to protect Mexican-Americans in Texas first filed suit against the State, claiming it had discriminated against Mexican-Americans by banning the Spanish language in public schools.

Justice decided that violated the rights of minorities and on April 17, 1981, ordered school officials to provide bilingual instruction to all Mexican-Americans with limited English proficiency.

Texas officials appealed, claiming the "no Spanish rule" was created to provide the best possible environment for teaching Mexican immigrants English—and not to discriminate.

BILINGUAL JUSTICE

In the ordinary course of things, there isn't much reason to pay attention to a court decision that affects the schools of just one state, but a recent decision of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals involving the state of Texas is an exception. The issue involved is an important one: how to educate children whose native language is Spanish. It is particularly important in Texas, where 22 percent of the nation's 3 million Spanish-speaking schoolage children live. And its importance has been increased by the Supreme Court decision last month, which overturned a Texas law and required that state henceforth to educate children of illegal aliens, the large majority of whom in Texas are Spanish-speaking.

Finally, the decision is important because it is so sensible. The appeals court here was faced with an order issued by a single district judge requiring that every public school in the state of Texas provide Spanish-speaking pupils with instruction in Spanish in every grade. The order was entered even though the Texas legislature—admittedly, acting under pressure because of the court's ruling—passed a law requiring special instruction for Spanish-speaking pupils, but giving schools a choice between a number of programs. The appeals court overturned the trial court's ruling, making the common-sense point that "the issue is essentially a pedagogic one: how best to teach comprehension of a language. Neither we nor the trial court possess special competence in such matters."

This is not to say that nobody does. On the contrary, school districts all over the country, faced with increasing numbers of non-English-speaking students, have experimented with a variety of approaches and have found many that work. They have also found that different students, coming from a variety of backgrounds and entering school at different ages, need different approaches. The Reagan administration this spring wisely abandoned the attempt to tell local school districts they have to provide instruction in the child's first language. Now the courts in the important state of Texas have done the same thing. "There is no legal or research basis," one expert writes in the Harvard Educational Review, "for the federal government to advocate or require a specific educational approach."

These rulings do not mean that our schools do not have an affirmative obligation to provide special help to pupils speaking a foreign language. They do. But they should not be forced to rely on a single, rigid approach by either the Department of Education or the courts. And they should not lose sight of the goal—a goal whose worth and feasibility has been demonstrated again and again by the past century of our history. That goal is to teach children to speak and write English. We should give educators the leeway to abandon bilingual education programs that mistakenly keep children learning primarily in their native language and deny them the opportunity to master the language in which business and public affairs in this country are conducted.●

DEDICATION OF THE FRANK B. SWAPKA SPORTS COMPLEX

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, on Saturday, July 24, the citizens of Dearborn Heights, Mich., will dedicate the Frank B. Swapka Sports Complex.

Frank Swapka was a dedicated public servant, a concerned citizen, an outstanding community leader, and a friend.

Born in Collinsville, Ill., on March 7, 1907, he moved to Detroit in 1928 where for many years he worked as a plant superintendent and chemical engineer for the Ford Motor Co. In 1942, he went to work for the city of Dearborn, Mich. He served that city well during his tenure as director of the department of public works, city assessor, and building department director.

Frank Swapka left public service from 1951 to 1963 to work in private industry, but his interest in serving his community did not waiver. He was a charter member of the Dearborn Elks. In 1962, he became a resident of Dearborn Heights, Mich. and there he assisted in organizing the Dearborn Heights Rotary and Chamber of Commerce. Frank Swapka was founder of the Dearborn Heights Benevolent Association and active in the Goodfellows.

In 1963, Frank Swapka was again called into public service as director of public works for the city of Dearborn Heights. He served in that position until his retirement in 1976. He also served as a Wayne County supervisor during a portion of that time.

However, after a very brief retirement, Frank Swapka's knowledge and talents were needed once again, and in 1978, while I was campaigning for the U.S. Senate, he was out on the hustings campaigning for mayor of Dearborn Heights. I particularly value the opinions of local elected officials like Frank Swapka because they so often know best the needs of their community.

Unfortunately, Mayor Frank Swapka never was able to finish his first term in office, for he died on March 14, 1980. He left his wife Agnes and four daughters and the many friends he had made during years of public service.

It is a fitting tribute that this sports complex be named for Frank Swapka, for he believed that communities should provide for the needs of their citizens. He would be delighted that the additional baseball diamonds, tennis courts, basketball courts, as well as open play area, picnic ground, and playground will bring enjoyment to the citizens of the community that for so many years he called home.

The honor which Mayor Frank Swapka receives with this dedication he truly deserves. I am pleased for his memory, proud to have known him, and delighted that the community which had the benefit of his services for so long continues to benefit from that service.●

SALT LAKE BASIN

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, in these days of 5-hour flights from coast to coast, air-conditioned cars, and other travel luxuries, it is difficult to imagine the perils that early settlers faced. Traveling was filled with sickness and danger, and the land they found and settled was in no way trouble free. The early pioneers were a determined, hard-working, proud breed. Among these pioneers, a small group of Mormon settlers had come to find a home.

Led by Brigham Young, these settlers had come across the Nation, driven from their homes in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois to the Great Salt Lake basin. This valley of arid waste, parched soil, and deposits of salt and alkali was to become their home.

It was through their hard labor and deep conviction that the Salt Lake basin became a productive valley. Canals and ditches were dug for irrigation, the soil began to produce more than the thickets of sagebrush which the Mormons had first seen. As later pioneers arrived, they must have found hope in knowing what could be done after seeing the progress in the Salt Lake basin. Pioneer settlements expanded into Idaho, Nevada, Arizona, and even into northern New Mexico.

One hundred and forty-five years after the day Brigham Young, stricken by sickness and fatigue from the 1,200-mile journey, decided this was to be the place for his Mormon settlers, the Salt Lake basin is a place of productivity that spreads into Idaho. It is these first Mormon pioneers who found their way to this barren land and labored to build a fruitful, rich homeland that we commemorate this Saturday on Pioneer Day. These settlers contributed greatly to Idaho's past and present and should be remembered and honored with our thanks.●

BRING INTEREST RATES DOWN

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I would like to share a June 14, 1982, Fortune magazine article entitled "How To Bring Interest Rates Down." We all know the crippling effect these high rates are having on our recovery. Unfortunately, economists, academicians, and politicians have been unable to agree on the right prescription that will get these crippling rates down. Several dangerous ideas have been gaining momentum during this election year. Unfortunately, the most notable is the ill-advised notion to "reflate" the economy by allowing the money supply to grow much more rapidly than its current rate. This article quickly dispels this dangerous inclination and makes it very clear that this may give us temporary reduction in rates, in the long run it would inflict serious damage on our recovery and perhaps permanent damage in our war with inflation. As the article states:

A jolt of easy money puts downward pressure on rates for a few days or weeks, but credit markets have become so sensitized to the effect of monetary policy on inflation that sustained doses of loose money send interest rates soaring.

What our economy needs the least is unaccountable spending coupled with an exorbitantly loose money supply. Confidence in our monetary policy must be restored and held consistent if the financial markets are to correctly assume that the war with inflation will not be abandoned. The article asserts that, in 1977, when the former Chairman of the Federal Reserve, Arthur Burns, buckled under political pressure from the Carter administration and deserted his 2 year anti-inflation fight, interest rates soared to rates that are still choking us. These heights were reached at the end of the fastest 6-month increase in money supply in nearly 30 years and were a very large contributing factor to our current recession. With a grim track record like this I am not surprised that money managers are skeptical about the seriousness of this administration's efforts, especially with the magnitude of this election year's pressure.

In testimony this week before the Senate Banking Committee, Chairman of the Federal Reserve, Paul Volcker stood behind these arguments and reaffirmed the importance of controlling inflation through steady monetary policy. By calling for release of this control we are only raising inflationary fears.

While I may not agree with Chairman Volcker on all counts, I do agree with his statements before the Banking Committee, and I do agree with him when he states that "considerably more remains to be done to bring the deficit under control as the economy expands." There is no doubt that getting a solid downward trend on our budget deficit is the best thing this Congress can do to pave a road to recovery. Calling an end to our control of the money supply is surrendering the war with inflation and will mean that all the pain and suffering have been done in vain.

I ask unanimous consent that my comments and the accompanying article be reprinted in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

HOW TO BRING INTEREST RATES DOWN

(By A. F. Ehrbar)

(Supply-side Congressman Jack Kemp and James Tobin, liberal Keynesian Nobel laureate; Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker and Walter E. Fauntroy, black representative from the District of Columbia; Irving Kristol, eminent neoconservative, and François Mitterrand, Socialist President of France.)

What could possibly unite all those odd couples in a common cause? They all are part of a swelling crowd that blames high interest rates on excessively tight money and wants the Federal Reserve to loosen up in order to get rates down and the economy moving. The campaign has been particularly strident in Congress, where some members have been trying to get the Fed to double its growth target for M_1 this year (see box, page 69). Howard Baker, one of the cast of characters above, doesn't go quite that far but he has been grousing that the Fed should "get its boot off the neck of the economy."

Interest rates are indeed painfully high, and several policy changes would help bring them down. However, the old trick of pumping out more money simply won't work nowadays. For the past two years faster money growth has quickly led to higher rates, not lower ones. A jolt of easy money still puts downward pressure on rates for a few days or weeks, but the credit markets have become so sensitized to the effect of monetary policy on inflation that sustained doses of loose money send rates soaring. Similarly, interest rates have dropped sharply during the periods when money has been tightest. As the chart on page 68 demonstrates, the record on this point is quite clear.

One policy step that would obviously help is putting clamps on a federal budget deficit that threatens to grow like a cancer for the next three years. But it would be a mistake to think—as Salomon Brothers economist Henry Kaufman and some other Wall Street pundits maintain—that the prolonged squabbling over the budget is the only or even the primary cause of the problem. Jumps in interest rates have tracked much more closely with news about the money supply than they have with news about the deficit. Short-term rates fell last September and October, for instance, when the markets were adjusting to the first gruesome projections of $100-billion deficits—and money was tight. Rates have also fallen over the last couple of months while the budget news got worse. Again, money has been tight.

LET'S HEAR IT FOR PAUL

The real key to getting interest rates down is to build confidence that monetary policy will stay on the tight, anti-inflation course charted by Fed Chairman Paul Volcker. What we've learned recently is that it's taking a lot longer than anyone anticipated to restore confidence in the Fed.

That really shouldn't be so surprising. After all, it took a decade and a half to persuade most people that high and rising inflation had become a permanent feature of American life. Investors who bought bonds in 1976, when inflation was fleetingly below 5% and interest rates were half their current levels, took a shellacking they won't forget. As Volcker keeps reminding congressional committees, the Fed has to earn back its credibility with "persistence and performance." It's entirely possible that lenders might not be convinced for another year or two, until we've gone through an economic recovery without the familiar pattern of accelerating monetary growth and renewed inflation.

But some changes in the way the Fed carries out its policy might shorten the time frame dramatically. The most important reform would be to eliminate the gyrations in money growth that we've had since late 1979. In a famous change of policy then, the Fed said that it would stop worrying so much about interest rates and just hold money growth on a steady course.

Astonishingly enough, however, the average monthly change in the growth rate of M_1 has more than doubled since then. (M_1 includes currency and all checking accounts.) To put the point in pharmaceutical terms, the money supply has been swinging between uppers and downers ever since the Fed promised to give it a couple of aspirin. A growing body of evidence suggests that trimming these gyrations in money growth would lessen the broad swings in interest rates and, by some estimates, might reduce rates several percentage points. If money growth remained steady on the declining path the Fed has promised, rates would fall further as confidence grew.

The surest confidence builder and interest-rate reducer of all, symbolized in the concrete number at the right, would be a legislated "monetary rule" that severely circumscribed the Fed's ability to create money. One version of such a rule would require the Fed to cut the growth of the monetary base gradually to a non-inflationary level of 1.5% or so, and then keep it there forever. (The monetary base consists of currency and bank reserves and can be thought of as the root from which the various M's grow. The base rose 4.3% from the fourth quarter of 1980 to the fouth quarter of 1981, and 8.2% the year before.) No amount of legislation can guarantee non-inflationary policies, of course. But a monetary rule offers the best hope that Volcker and President Reagan—and their successors—won't return to the ruinous practices of the recent past.

NO TIME TO GOOSE

Support for a monetary rule isn't exactly sweeping the country, but it is an idea that has been gaining more and more attention. In the last few years, just about everyone has come to accept the monetarist proposition that we can't have price stability if money grows too fast and we can't have persistent inflation if money doesn't grow too fast.

In the same vein, a large majority of economists would agree that goosing the money supply to boost economic growth—even in the depths of a recession—is a dangerous and ultimately self-defeating course. The latest cycle of high interest rates got started in 1977 when former Fed Chairman Arthur Burns abandoned a two-year anti-inflation effort and caved in to the Carter Administration's demands that he do something about unemployment. By the time Reagan took office in January 1981, T-bills were at 15.7%, the commercial-paper rate was 17.2%, and the federal funds rate was 19.4%. Those nosebleed heights were reached at the end of the fastest six-month increase in the money supply in at least 30 years.

Money has, on average, been extremely tight since then, and undoubtedly was the major cause of the recession. At the same time, inflation fell faster than most people thought possible. In other words, this "intractable" problem was not so tough as all that. A good deal of the progress—to a rate of only 1% in the first quarter—is due to the recession. But the underlying inflation rate has dropped by around four percentage points. So too have short-term interest rates. By the middle of May, the federal funds rate was down five percentage points from its January 1981 level, and T-bill rates were down 3.4 points. In other words, short-term rates have moved pretty much in step with inflation despite the Fed's stringency.

The confounding mystery about interest rates is why real rates got so high in 1980 and why they haven't come down at all. The real interest rate is the nominal rate minus expected inflation; with inflation likely to be around 5% this year, the real rate on short-term debt is up in a numbing 7% to 9% range. No one has offered a fully adequate solution to that riddle, but the Fed's monetarist critics have come up with the most complete and consistent one so far. As they see it, a primary cause of high real rates has been the enormous increase in the variability of money growth since the Fed changed its operating procedures in October 1979. The swings in money growth haven't been random bounces from month to month. Instead, three- to six-month spurts of extreme looseness have been followed by periods when the Fed's brakes seemed locked.

Karl Brunner and Allan Meltzer, the co-chairmen of the Shadow Open Market Committee, a monetarist group that critiques Fed policy, contend that the credit markets are so distrustful of Fed promises that they interpret each new swing in money growth as the best indicator of future policy. An extended period of excessive money growth feeds fears that inflation is about to take off on another upward spiral. Then a dose of tight money reassures lenders and brings interest rates down. Says Brunner: "We now know that the Fed has pursued an anti-inflation policy for the last 2½ years. But no one could have known it during the period, and no one can say with any confidence that the policy will continue."

Worse still, say Brunner and Meltzer, the big sustained swings in money growth have raised the underlying level of uncertainty about future policy, causing lenders to demand a higher "risk premium." By Meltzer's econometric calculations, the new uncertainty created by volatile money growth accounts for two to four percentage points of the increase in real rates.

The uncertainty quotient in long-term rates probably is much larger. Under the old rule of thumb that double-A bond rates consist of the expected long-term inflation rate plus a 3% real rate, the present 15% rates would indicate that long-term inflation expectations are around 12%. But if that were true, corporations wouldn't be so reluctant to issue bonds paying 15% interest. It seems more likely that bond rates reflect some subjective assessment of wildly divergent possibilities about the future. Investors may be saying: okay, long-run inflation could be close to zero—but it could also be up above 25%. In a split-the-difference gamble, a 12% premium might look about right.

The level of long-term rates and the consequent dearth of new bond issues also account for some portion of the increase in real short-term rates. Unwilling to borrow long term at 15%, corporations have bunched all their credit demands into the short end of the market, pushing short rates up. By paying through the nose short term, companies preserve the chance of getting a lower long-term rate six months or a year from now.

Chairman Volcker and Stephen Axilrod, the Fed's powerful director of monetary-policy research, argue that money growth has been so erratic because of a series of unprecedented short-run shifts in the demand for money and credit. The Fed's view is that it has taken a middle course in reacting to those demand shifts, allowing interest rates to move more than it would have permitted under the old operating procedures, while accepting greater deviations in money growth than the new procedures were supposed to produce.

THE MESSAGE FROM BONDS

The monetarists maintain that the Fed has cause and effect backward. They argue that the swings in money growth have played havoc with inflation expectations, amplifying the normal shifts in credit demand and causing the big movements in interest rates. They draw strong support for their views from the fact that long-term as well as short-term interest rates have become more volatile. If independent, short-run shifts in the demand for credit really were the problem, only short-term interest rates would be affected. Since long-term rates have also become more volatile, something is happening that is continually altering long-term expectations. The guiltiest-looking suspect around is volatile money growth.

Monetary experts generally agree that the Fed could do a substantially better job of hitting its growth targets if it tried. No one asserts that the Fed can control M1 precisely on a weekly or monthly basis. But studies by members of the Shadow—and by Fed economists—show that the Fed could hold M1 growth within a two-percentage-point band on an annual basis and could come within two percentage points of a specific target (as opposed to a target range) on a quarterly basis. And the Fed could control the monetary base with pinpoint accuracy because it can manipulate bank reserves at will. The base serves as an excellent proxy for the transaction balances that M1 measures; the growth of the base and M1 rarely diverge by more than one percentage point.

The monetarists believe that the Fed should establish a desired growth rate for a single monetary aggregate and stick to it. Brunner and Meltzer acknowledge that this would produce more week-to-week variation in short-term interest rates but insist that the economy would be better off. By their analysis, refusing to accommodate temporary blips in credit demand would affect only the shortest of short-term rates; if a change in credit demand is truly temporary, it shouldn't alter the price of longer-term credit. Longer-term rates would actually be steadier and lower, and business would have an easier time making long-range financing and planning decisions.

"The federal funds rate would bounce around a lot," says Meltzer, "but there would be less variation in the rates on loans with maturities of six months or more, and all rates would be lower."

Incredible as it sounds, the Fed's Stephen Axilrod agrees with a good part of Meltzer's prediction. In one of his standard defenses of Fed policies, Axilrod argued in a recent Federal Reserve Bulletin that the Fed has to adapt policy to interest-rate pressures. But at a conference that Brunner and Meltzer hosted in April, Axilrod said that he too believed that firmer control of the money supply would increase the variability of only the shortest-term interest rates. When asked why that would be so bad, he replied: "I don't see any problem with that kind of volatility, but people in the market tell us they don't like it."

This fundamental debate over monetary policy has been obscured lately by all the wrangling over financial innovation. Critics of monetary targeting have been saying that the advent of money-market funds, NOW accounts, and other new financial vehicles has made it increasingly difficult to measure money, let alone control it.

It's quite true that innovation has complicated life at the Fed, but there is no evidence that money has become less definable or controllable. Much of the case against rigorous targeting rests on the assertion that the growth rates of M1 and M2 were wildly out of sync last year. In fact, the difference between the M1 and M2 growth rates was less than it had been in 1975 and 1976, before the onslaught of innovation. More important, the relationships betwen M_1 and both the monetary base and nominal GNP haven't changed in any statistically perceptible way. All that's happened is that the Fed has had to redefine the aggregates to include the new instruments as they've been created.

AN URGE TO FOOL AROUND

The principal problem with the Fed's present strategy isn't that it is incapable of eliminating inflation; it will work if money stays tight long enough. The greatest trouble is that the uncertainty spawned by erratic money growth needlessly raises the social costs of an anti-inflation policy and reduces the chance that the Fed will be allowed to follow through.

The prospect of yet another failed inflation fight has persuaded a large number of monetarists and even a few Congressmen that the time has come for a monetary rule. A rule would smooth the road to stable prices in three ways. It would minimize the social costs of a disinflationary policy. It would remove monetary policy from the arena of day-to-day politics; Presidents and Congress would still have the same urge to fool around with the Fed, but they'd have to enact new legislation to do it. And a monetary rule would hobble the Fed's own instincts to manipulate interest rates and finetune the economy. A monetary rule might also serve as a catalyst for better fiscal policy. Deprived of the printing press, Congress would be more likely to respond to the anguished cries of credit-sensitive industries by actually doing something about the deficit.

Advocates of a rule have put forth several specific proposals for how it should be written. Some want to put an upper limit on the growth of the monetary base. Others, including Brunner and Meltzer, would state the rule in terms of a specific growth rate. The details of a rule aren't terribly important, however, so long as it holds money growth to a level consistent with price stability. The differences among the growth rates being talked about are smaller than the spread between the bottom and top of the Fed's target range for M_1 now, which is 2.5% to 5.5%.

If the rule were applied to the monetary base, growth of around 1.5% would be compatible with stable prices. That growth, plus the average 2% to 2.5% annual increase in the "velocity" of the base, would finance real GNP growth of 3.5% to 4% with zero inflation (velocity is the number of times a dollar "turns over" each year). The stable-price growth rate for M1 would be around 0.5%, since its velocity rises 3% to 3.5% on average.

Opponents of a rule, including Volcker, argue that it would be folly to legislate a fixed growth rate for money when the definitions of the aggregates keep changing. Another objection to a rule is that the appropriate growth rate may change even if the composition of the targeted aggregate remains the same. That could happen if, say, velocity began rising more slowly.

Brunner has suggested a scheme that appears to deal with those objections quite handily. He points out that financial innovations don't affect the monetary base, so it could be used without any worries about changing definitions. Alternatively, if the rule were stated in terms of M1, he would leave the matter of defining and measuring M1 to the Fed. Brunner says an independent commission could work out the benchmark, non-inflationary growth rate, as well as the procedures for adjusting it.

With monetarism under furious attack in Washington and on Wall Street, the prospects for adopting a monetary rule may appear somewhere close to zero. That's probably true for now, but there are indications that a rule could become a winning issue over the next couple of years, especially if the current anti-inflation effort proves as short-lived as its predecessors—just as the bond market fears.

Sentiment for a rule has already progressed beyond the classrooms, and a movement has begun forming in Washington. The strongest support comes, unsurprisingly, from the monetarists in the Reagan Administration. In the House, Democrat Stephen L. Neal of North Carolina has had a bill before the banking Committee for several years that would require the Fed to reduce money growth—he doesn't specify which measure—gradually to less than 3 percent and keep it there. Senator Roger W. Jepsen, an Iowa Republican, supported a monetary rule during the Gold Commission deliberations. He will be chairman of the Joint Economic Committee next year if the Republicans retain control of the Senate.

KEEPING MUM, FOR NOW

The pro-rule forces on the Hill have kept a discreet silence this year, partly out of fear that the loose-money crowd might seize on the proposal as a device to force the Fed to raise its growth targets. In addition, it would be futile to push for a rule until Henry S. Reuss, a Wisconsin Democrat, retires at the end of this year. He adamantly opposes the idea, and most House Democrats defer to his judgment on monetary issues.

Rule or no rule, the one imperative now is that money growth remain on a decelerating, disinflationary path. With unemployment at a postwar high and elections approaching, that may be a politically poisonous choice. But the economy has already absorbed a large share of the costs of ending inflation. To give up again would simply mean that the poor souls in the unemployment line and all those bankrupt builders and car dealers had suffered in vain. As the Fed so correctly observed in its annual report to Congress this year. "A failure to continue on the current path would mean that the next effort would be associated with still greater hardship."

THE REFLATION CAMPAIGN IN CONGRESS

"It's the first time I can remember," says Republican Congressman Stewart B. McKinney, "when all my big guys were singing the same song." The big guys are executives at many of the 20 Fortune 500 companies headquartered in Fairfield County, Connecticut, part of McKinney's district, and the song is the familiar lament that intersest rates, oh, interest rates, must come down. The singing, at a meeting with these influential constituents last month, helped persuade McKinney to sign on with an emerging coalition in Congress that has been putting enormous pressure on the Federal Reserve to abandon the inflation fight.

Most members of the coalition, including McKinney, would vociferously deny that they've grown soft on inflation—"That seems to be in the same political bracket as sexual relations with teenagers," one congressional aide explains—but how else to characterize a group that is insisting the Fed raise its monetary-growth targets? At least three members of the group—Democratic Senators Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York, Jim Sasser of Tennessee, and Donald W. Riegle of Michigan—actually admit their monetary prescription would boost the inflation rate. If nothing else, that's some kind of new high in political candor.

Eliminating inflation is, at bottom, mostly a matter of political will, and that will has once again started to crumble just as the Fed's monetary stringency has begun to produce some solid progress. Large corporations, as McKinney's story shows, have now joined home builders and car dealers in pleading for relief. Says Du Pont Chairman Edward G. Jefferson, expressing an attitude increasingly prevalent among the boardroom set, "The greatest risk right now is not inflation but the risk of continued stagnation."

AN OVERLOAD OF COLLECTIBLES

This time around, the pressure to reflate (as the Europeans call it) appears to be getting an extra push from people who loaded up with collectibles and other inflation hedges. Owners of high priced homes and Mississippi bottomland have been discovering that what they bought weren't really hedges, but big bets on continuing high inflation. (Du Pont made one such bet when it acquired Conoco.) Observes an investment banker, referring to the paper losses some of his Wall Street cohorts are facing on the lavish places they call home: "The sagging New York co-op market could be the death of disinflationary monetary policy."

Another group that's discovered a strong interest in renewed inflation are the Senators and Congressmen who've been leaning on the Fed. As inflation falls, so does bracket creep, leaving legislators with less revenues to dispense. Says Edwin H. Yeo, a former Treasury under secretary for monetary affairs: "Congress got two tax cuts last year. Reagan gave them one and Volcker gave them a second. That's playing havoc with the politics of giveaways."

The politicking over monetary policy has gone largely unnoticed in a Washington fixated on budget deficits, but it has been hectic and fierce. Both Republicans and Democrats involved in the unsuccessful budget negotiations with the White House, for instance, wanted looser money as part of any compromise.

The first overt move to push the Fed toward faster money growth was made by Representative Henry S. Reuss, a Wisconsin populist and chairman of the Joint Economic Committee. In March, Reuss persuaded Fernand St Germain, chairman of the Banking Committee, to endorse a monetary-policy report calling for the Fed to make up for its extreme tightness last year with extra slack this year. The numbers in the report suggest that M1 should increase 10.7% this year—nearly double the Fed's top target of 5.5%.

St Germain sent a copy of the draft report to Fed Chairman Paul Volcker, along with the daunting request that the entire open-market committee appear before the Banking Committee at 5 p.m. on March 30 to answer questions about what they had decided at the regular meeting of the committee earlier that day. Mortified by Reuss's strong-arming, Volcker began lobbying and defeated the report in committee. With that, St Germain dropped the summons. The committee has since adopted a milder recommendation tying looser money to a tighter budget.

Moynihan, who's up for reelection this year, has been leading a similar campaign in the Senate. He, Sasser, and Riegle introduced a budget plan on March 31 that included a call for 9.7% M1 growth this year, based on logic much like Reuss's. Moynihan's plan came complete with a computer projection showing that inflation, instead of continuing to decline, would rise from 6.7% this year to 7.5% in 1983 and 7.4% in 1984.

The Moynihan plan died when the Senate's Republican majority pushed through a budget compromise in early May, but the fast-money crowd did manage to get a clause into the Senate Budget Committee's bill saying it is "the sense of Congress" that the Fed "shall" reevaluate its targets if Congress reduces the deficit substantially. The House Budget Committee approved the same clause a week later. Democrats in both the Senate and House plan to take on the Fed again in June or July. If interest rates haven't dropped much by then, the reflators will push for a congressional resolution directing Volcker to raise his targets.

BIGGER THAN THE BUDGET

In resisting the pressure from Congress, Volcker's most important ally thus far has been Ronald Reagan, the one man who really counts. The history of monetary policy shows that the Fed delivers whatever Presidents want, and Reagan has so far stuck to his initial support for declining money growth. But he hasn't been out front defending the Fed's policy, and he's under pressure from Republicans worried about November.

However the monetary debate comes out, it's likely to have a larger and more lasting effect on the economy than all the tussling over the budget. As Robert E. Weintraub, a senior economist at the Joint Economic Committee, points out, the question of whether M1 grows 4% or 8% this year is far more important for the future course of inflation than trimming $50 billion from an $825-billion federal budget.

A STRAITJACKET (WITH SOME ZIPPERS) FOR THE BUDGET

The nightly newscasts in coming months are bound to include a rising chorus of ululations from Washington spenders warning against the proposed balanced-budget amendment. The amendment now has the endorsement of President Reagan (candidate Reagan always liked it), and should clear the Senate soon by the necessary two-thirds margin. In the House, Peter Rodino has had the proposal locked safely away in the Judiciary Committee he heads, but sponsors think they have enough votes to call it to the floor.

The amendment would make life less congenial on Capitol Hill by erecting barriers—though not insurmountable ones—to deficits and tax hikes. It would not, as its critics claim, dangerously reduce the flexibility of economic policy, but it would add a bias for less spending and less taxing to a system where most of the incentives currently operate in the opposite direction. Congress might not always abide by the amendment's provisions but would at least be under some moral and political pressure to do so.

The proposal before the Senate and House combines ideas put forth by the National Taxpayers Union, an outfit that wants balanced budgets, and the National Tax Limitation Committee, a group that wants to stanch federal spending. It would require Congress to adopt a budget in which projected spending is no larger than projected tax receipts. Congress could amend the budget as the year went along, but projected receipts would still have to equal or exceed all outlays, including off-budget items.

In addition, the amendment would limit the increase in taxes in any fiscal year to the percentage increase in GNP in the prior calendar year. For instance, if GNP rose 8% in 1982, revenues couldn't rise more than 8% in fiscal 1984 (beginning October 1, 1983). In theory, the limit on tax increases, combined with the balanced-budget requirement, would have the effect of limiting the share of GNP going to the federal government. If taxes didn't rise relative to GNP and spending didn't exceed taxes, spending couldn't increase as a percentage of GNP.

Without a safety valve, these provisions would be a recipe for political and economic chaos: Congress would have to raise taxes or cut expenditures during recessions in order to keep the budget in line with revenues. Budget cuts or tax hikes could worsen and prolong a slump.

However, the amendment contains three escape clauses that would avert such purposeless pain. The entire amendment could be waived in time of war. In peacetime, with the approval of 60% of all the members of both houses (not just 60% of the votes cast) Congress could run as big a deficit as it pleased. Congress could also increase taxes relative to GNP by a vote of more than half the members of both houses. Some increase in the share of GNP taken by government will be necessary when the baby-boom generation retires, boosting the proportion of nonworkers in the economy.

The principal thrust of the amendment isn't to achieve balanced budgets, though that's a goal an overwhelming majority of the public endorses (see "Americans' Hate Affair with Deficits," page 77). Rather, the framers of the amendment have in mind putting a brake on the growth of spending. Says economist Milton Friedman, an architect of the amendment: "I think a balanced budget is important for political reasons—so that legislators who vote for spending also have to vote for the taxes to pay for it. But our emphasis has always been on limiting taxes and spending."

The proposed amendment has flaws, but they don't seem crippling. Proponents have never come up with a satisfactory answer to how it would be enforced if Congress chose to ignore the provisions. In fact, Congress has never paid the slightest attention to a law it passed in 1978 requiring balanced budgets from fiscal year 1981 onward. Given the uncertainties of budget forecasting, Congress might miss the mark by tens of billions even after a good-faith effort. The proponents of the amendment simply say we'll have to rely on the political process to throw out rascals who openly defy the Constitution. Presumably taxpayers would also be able to sue Congress and the President. Would the Supreme Court enjoin the Treasury from increasing its debt?

Now that 31 states (of the necessary 34) have called for a constitutional convention to write a balanced-budget amendment, Congress is almost certain to bring the matter to a vote. In an election year, it will be a tough proposition to oppose. As the debate progresses, we're bound to hear plenty of wailing about putting the budget in a straitjacket. But after ten years in which we've run up $406 billion in deficits, that may seem the proper attire.●

RECLAMATION REFORM—S. 1867

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I would like to express my opposition to S. 1867, the reclamation reform bill of 1982, passed by the Senate on July 16.

As amended by Senator METZENBAUM, S. 1867 would make major revisions in the 1902 Reclamation Act, which established a Federal program to provide subsidized irrigation water for farmers in the West. The original act was designed to encourage small, family-owned farms by limiting the size of farms eligible to receive subsidized water to 160 acres. Administrative interpretations of law later increased this to 320 acres for a farm owned by a husband and wife. In recent years, however, many people have circumvented the original intent of the 1902 law by leasing additional land over the 320 limit.

There is no doubt that much has changed since 1902. Farm sizes in general have grown to take into account modern farming practices. I recognize this fact. The bill before us, however, goes well beyond simple reform and, I believe, is contrary to the original intent of the 1902 act.

The bill, as amended, establishes a 1,280 acre limit on both owned and leased land. I am not convinced that such a large acreage limitation is necessary to accommodate modern farming practices. In 1980, an Environmental Impact Statement, prepared by the Department of Interior, found that 87 percent of the reclamation farms in the West were 320 acres or smaller; while a full 97 percent were 960 acres or less. Given this, it is clear that a 1,280 acreage limitation is not "necessary" to accommodate modern farming techniques.

In my view, the purpose of reclamation is to encourage farmers to cultivate semiarid regions of the West without providing them with an unnecessary subsidy. I believe that the acreage limitation established in this bill will simply encourage large profitable corporations to buy up small farms. At a time when family farms are disappearing in this country at an alarming rate, I do not believe the Federal Government should be encouraging this trend even further. In my view, this does not represent sound farm policy and is not in the best national interest.

Under current law, reclamation farmers in the 17 western-most States enjoy a considerable subsidy because they are not required to repay the interest on the cost of reclamation projects. In fact, the Congressional Budget Office has estimated that water districts in the West repay, on the average, only 16 percent of the total cost of these projects. This subsidy is not available to farmers in any other region of the country, including my home State of Maine.

S. 1867 attempts to address this by charging farmers the "full cost," including interest, for water on those acres over 1,280. Although the Metzenbaum substitute uses a rate of interest which more accurately reflects the true cost of borrowing to the Treasury, the 1,280 acreage limitation is so high that less than 3 percent of the farms in the West will be required to pay this "full cost." The other 87 percent will continue to receive a full subsidy on their Federal water.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say that I support efforts to reform reclamation law. I cannot, however, support a bill which is contrary to the intent of the 1902 act and which, I believe continues a massive Federal subsidy to a few western farming interests, at the expense of the American taxpayer.●

RETIREMENT OF HERBERT L. FOREST

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I rise today to honor a most distinguished dairyman. After 48 years as a dedicated public servant, Herbert L. Forest has retired from his position as "Mr. Dairy" in the Department of Agriculture.

In the 1930's and 1940's, when the dairy industry was in complete disarray, Mr. Forest played a key role in the formation of the Federal milk marketing order system that stabilized the dairy industry then and today provides an orderly marketing system for milk for 120,000 dairy farmers and 80 percent of all grade A milk delivered.

Mr. President, Mr. Forest's job has not been without its delicate moments. Yet his genius consistently shined through as he picked his way between what Congress provided, what the courts allowed, what producers, processors, and consumers desired, and what we knew was necessary to operate and preserve the program in the public interest. Mr. Forest has been cited many times by all segments of the dairy industry. In 1976, he received the Department's Distinguished Service Award for exceptional dedication, accomplishment, and leadership on dairy issues.

Mr. President, we all owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Forest. I know the dairy farmers in my home State of Vermont would agree. We will all miss you, "Mr. Dairy." Thanks for a job exceptionally well done.●

FOREIGN CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I request that an article which appeared in the International Construction Newsletter of July 1982, concerning hearings before the House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection, and Finance on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, be inserted in the RECORD following my statement.

HOUSE HEARINGS ON FCPA

Congressman Timothy Wirth's Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection and Finance held a fourth and final day of oversight hearings, June 8, on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977. Jack Richards, Vice President for Governmental Affairs of the N. W. Kellogg Company, a subsidiary of Wheelabrator-Frye, Inc., testified on behalf of International Engineering and Construction Industries Council [IECIC]. IECIC is comprised of the AGC, the National Constructors Association, the American Consulting Engineers Council and the American Institute of Architects.

Mr. Richards began his remarks by saying, "At the outset, let me state, positively, that we do not believe bribery of foreign officials is an acceptable way of doing business. Companies represented by the IECIC associations are well-established, reputable leaders in the engineering-construction industry who cannot afford the certain ramifications of illicit payments and the accusation of inapproprate or illegal business transactions. Our members have developed their strong reputations in world markets by offering a better product, sophisticated technologies and by establishing themselves as responsible business partners. We consider illicit payments unethical and not in the best interests of U.S. exports of goods and services."

The purpose of this fourth day of hearings, according to subcommittee staff, was to hear directly from the business community the actual impact the FCPA is having on their business. Speaking from over twenty years of career experience overseas in engineering and construction activities, Mr. Richards told the subcommittee, "I know that many U.S. firms are reluctant to undertake projects in many countries because of their concern over the application and associated penalties of the law . . . I wish I could tell you precisely that U.S. industry in any given year lost X billion dollars because of the provisions of the law. Unfortunately, there are many contributing causes for lost U.S. export business; and it is extremely difficult, often impossible, in every case to distinguish the primary reason for a lost contract."

Mr. Richards went on to highlight three aspects of the current law's impact on U.S. exports and gave examples of each. Briefly, the three cases are: [1] unwillingness on the part of U.S. firms to engage in commercial arrangements such as joint ventures in countries whose routine business practices may be challenged under the FCPA; [2] uncertainty in the definition of facilitating payments under the law has caused companies to withdraw completely from business activity in some countries and; [3] confusion over extent to which U.S. firms are held responsible for the actions of third party intermediaries which they are often required by local law to employ.

In closing, Mr. Richards urged the committee to consider favorably the adoption of amending FCPA legislation consistent with the general provisions of H.R. 2530 and the final S. 708. IECIC believes clarifying amendments to the FCPA is of "extreme importance to our industry and will represent a major step in the development of our U.S. export enhancement policy."

Following the testimony from the two business panels present, Chairman Wirth began a dialogue questioning the usefulness of many provisions in the Senate-passed clarifying amendments. Mr. Wirth stated in several cases he found the proposed language changes just as ambiguous as the current law. Despite the testimony from the business community stating that business understood and could live with the new language, Mr. Wirth continued to seek precise definitions on many points such as "facilitating payments" and the "reason to know" standard in the bribery provisions of the law.

Mr. Richards offered Mr. Wirth the assistance of a business community task force comprised of the Chamber of Commerce of the U.S.A., the Emergency Committee for American Trade, the National Association of Manufacturers and IECIC in helping to achieve definitions and language he could accept. This task force, on June 11, sent a five page response to Mr. Wirth covering all his concerns raised at the hearings. The willingness of the business community to respond quickly to the Congress should be taken as an indication of the importance placed on amending the FCPA this year.

IECIC, agreeing with views expressed in previous testimony, said Mr. Richards, has problems "with regard to the excessive and unrealistic accounting and reporting standards mandated by a strict interpretation of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act" and the ambiguities in the bribery provisions of the current law. "Chief among our concerns is the extent to which a U.S. company can be held liable for the actions of its foreign agents overseas and the problems surrounding the determination of an illicit payment." He voiced IECIC's support for the way Senate-passed S. 708 had addressed these concerns.●

MLRS: A SUCCESSFUL WEAPONS PROGRAM

● Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, the cost of today's modern weapons are mind-boggling: $30 million for one F-18 fighter, almost $3 million per M-1 tank, $3.5 billion for a nuclear aircraft carrier. Time and again, we receive reports of staggering cost overruns and complex military systems that do not perform as advertised. Last year, for example, the actual costs of 47 major weapons programs exceeded expected costs by more than $50 billion. It is such a rare event to find a program that is militarily effective, on schedule, and on budget, that I feel the American people should know about it. They deserve some encouraging news concerning how their hard-earned defense dollars are being spent.

The system I am referring to is the multiple launch rocket system, better known as the MLRS, which is being built for the Army by the Vought Corp. in Camden, Ark. The MLRS is an unguided, surface-to-surface 230-mm rocket system that is mounted on an armored vehicle that can travel up to 64 kilometers per hour. It can fire up to 12 rockets, each with a range in excess of 30 kilometers, individually or in rapid sequence. The mission of the MLRS is critical yet straight-forward: to prevent enemy forces from assembling prior to launching attacks on friendly forces. Deployed 5 to 10 kilometers behind our front lines, it will carry out this mission with devastasting efficieny as it fires its 12 rockets and then moves quickly to another position to avoid detection. Using these "shoot and scoot" tactics will increase both its effectiveness and its survivability on the modern battlefield.

Congress watchdog for cost overruns is the General Accounting Office (GAO), which usually has little good to say about the way the Department of Defense spends money. But earlier this year, the GAO published a report titled "The Army's Multiple Launch Rocket System Is Progressing Well and Merits Continued Support," and concluded that the MLRS "has excellent potential for significantly increasing the Army's artillery capability," and that the program is meeting its cost and schedule goals. In fact, while the costs of most systems have spiraled out of sight, the program acquisition costs of the MLRS actually fell by 12 percent during the last 9 months of 1981. No wonder the MLRS project manager, Army Col. Monte Hatchett, was named Project Manager of the Year.

The ingredients of the MLRS' success include the Army's clear need for the system; a $50 million investment of private capital, including a new 500,000-square-foot production facility in Camden's Highland Industrial Park, by the Vought Corp.; a pool of highly skilled labor and the presence of major subcontractors like Atlantic Research Corp. and the Brunswick Corp. in Camden; and fixed price contracts. As a result, Congress has authorized more than $400 million for the MLRS program for fiscal year 1983. The cost effectiveness of the program will be enhanced even more when the Army concludes a multiyear procurement contract for the MLRS.

By the end of fiscal year 1990, 276 MLRS launch vehicles, 363,000 tactical rockets, and 28,000 training rockets will have been produced at an estimated total cost of almost $4 billion. In addition, the United States, France, Germany, and the United Kingdom have agreed to coproduce the MLRS in Europe, and to deploy it throughout the NATO Alliance.

The MLRS is an example of how the weapons development and procurement system is supposed to work. I hope that this program will be studied by contractors and military managers, and that its lessons can be applied to the production of future weapons systems. We need a strong defense, but the only way we will achieve that goal is to build weapons, like the MLRS, that make military sense and that are cost effective.●

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a few final and concluding details to attend to if the minority leader is prepared to consider these items at this time.

TRIBUTE OF MARY ALICE RICHARDS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution for myself and the distinguished minority leader, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD and for Senators THURMOND, ZORINSKY, and EXON, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 432) paying tribute to Mary Alice Richards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BAKER. I acknowledge the retirement today of one of the Senate's most loyal and dedicated employees, Miss Mary Alice Richards of the Sergeant at Arms Office. She is retiring after 30 years of Government service, 15 years of which she has been with the Sergeant at Arms Office. Miss Richards is the secretary for personnel administration for the Sergeant at Arms. In that capacity she has personally put many thousands of Senate employees on the payroll. She has maintained the personnel records of more than 1,200 current Sergeant at Arms employees, assisting them with retirement procedures and medical claims. She has also provided counsel to the Sergeant at Arms and department heads on personnel policies and procedures. Further, Miss Richards was also responsible for maintaining patronage records and worked with the secretaries of the majority and minority in administering the patronage system

Miss Richards is a native of Omaha, Nebr., and will be returning there soon to pursue a nursing career. The U.S. Senate owes a great measure of gratitude to Mary Alice and will long remember her devotion to this institution. And while we acknowledge and thank Mary Alice Richards for her extraordinary service to the U.S. Senate, we also wish her happiness in her retirement from the Senate and godspeed in a new and challenging future.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield? It is a pleasure to pause at this time after a very long day to pay tribute to one of our most dedicated Senate employees. I am happy to be able to join the majority leader in recognizing the long and distinguished service of Mary Alice Richards of the Sergeant at Arms Office.

Miss Richards over the past 15 years has assisted literally thousands of Senate employees in her position as secretary for personnel administration. It is very appropriate that Mary Alice is about to enter a new field of service—that being the nursing profession. I know that she will serve her new career with the same degree of diligence and patience as she has served the Senate and so many of her fellow colleagues.

Mr. President, I know my colleagues join me in wishing Mary Alice Richards the very best in the years ahead and to give her our sincere thanks for her loyal and dedicated service.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the splendid remarks of the majority and minority leaders.

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, I am very proud to be able to commend a native Nebraskan who has served the U.S. Senate for 15 years. Mary Alice Richards, secretary for personnel adminstration of the Sergeant at Arms Office, will conclude her tenure as a Senate employee today to return to Omaha to begin an entirely new career.

My wife Cece and I have known Mary Alice for many years and while we regret that she is leaving the Senate and the Washington area, we are very excited that she is returning to Nebraska. We both intend to follow her nursing career with great interest, and we know she will take to the nursing profession the same care and understanding of people as she exercised while here in the Nation's Capital.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I wish to join my colleagues in paying tribute to Mary Alice Richards upon her retirement from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 432) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, together with the preamble, are as follows:

S. RES. 432

Whereas, Mary Alice Richards has served as an exemplary Secretary for Personnel Administration to the Senate Sergeant at Arms for 15 years and her country for over 30 years;

Whereas, she has throughout the 97th Congress, been responsible for the personnel records of over 1,200 current Sergeant at Arms employees, providing assistance and counsel to the Sergeant at Arms and Department Heads on personnel policies and procedures, maintaining patronage records and assisting in administering the patronage system, and placing thousands of Senate employees on the payroll;

Whereas, she has served the Senate, especially the Sergeant at Arms and the Secretaries of the Majority and Minority, with extraordinary competence, dedication, and loyalty: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States extends its appreciation and gratitude to Mary Alice Richards for her faithful service to the Senate and to the Nation.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to Mary Alice Richards.

ORDER FOR THE RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS ON MONDAY, JULY 26, 1982

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order on Monday, July 26, three Senators be recognized on special orders of not to exceed 15 minutes each: Senators HEINZ, PRYOR, and NUNN, in that order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR THE TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON MONDAY, JULY 26, 1982

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the execution of the special orders there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 1 p.m. in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on Monday after the execution of the program as just outlined, the Senate will return to the consideration of the constitutional amendment on the balanced budget. The Ford amendment will be the pending question.

EXPRESSIONS OF APPRECIATION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no further business to transact. I will inquire of the minority leader if he has any matters he wishes to bring before the Senate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Just to thank the majority leader for his characteristic courtesy which he has shown to the minority during the deliberations on this bill.

I marvel at his equanimity at all times. I think it is worthy of emulation, and certainly worthy of mention.

I personally admire him greatly and I thank him for his understanding and his courtesies extended to my colleagues on this side of the aisle and to me personally.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am deeply grateful, and I hope I can acknowledge without any further elaboration what I have said privately to the minority leader on many other occasions. What a fine example he has set in his service as majority leader and how shamelessly I emulate that, and I am pleased with that opportunity.

RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. ON MONDAY, JULY 26, 1982

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if there is nothing further to come before the Senate, and no other Senator is seeking recognition, I move now, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 11 a.m. on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, at 5:01 a.m. recessed until Monday, July 26, 1982, at 11 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 22, 1982:

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

James C. Treadway, Jr., of the District of Columbia, to be a Member of the Securities and Exchange Commission for the term expiring June 5, 1987, vice Bevis Longstreth, term expired.

THE JUDICIARY

William M. Acker, Jr., of Alabama, to be U.S. district judge for the northern district of Alabama vice Frank H. McFadden, resigned.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Faith P. Evans, of Hawaii, to be U.S. Marshal for the district of Hawaii for the term of 4 years vice Edward N. Keliikoa, resigned.

U.S. METRIC BOARD

Harry J. Staszewski, Jr., of Pennsylvania, to be a Member of the U.S. Metric Board for the term expiring March 23, 1988, vice Sandra R. Kenney, term expired.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

Edward A. Knapp, of New Mexico, to be an Assistant Director of the National Science Foundation, vice William Klemperer, resigned.

APPALACHIAN REGIONAL COMMISSION

Winifred Ann Pizzano, of Virginia, to be Federal Cochairman of the Appalachian Regional Commission, vice Albert P. Smith, resigned.

Jacqueline L. Phillips, of Maryland, to be Alternate Federal Cochairman of the Appalachian Regional Commission, vice William E. Albers.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Wilmer D. Mizell, Sr., of North Carolina, to be an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, vice James C. Webster, resigned.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

CHESAPEAKE BAY INFORMATION PROJECT

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that one of the most productive, beautiful, and well-known bodies of water in the world is the Chesapeake Bay. I have had a lifelong interest in the waters of the Chesapeake and am proud of the fact that much of the district I represent is "Bay Country." Like all estuaries, the Chesapeake Bay is vulnerable to the depredations of man—whether intentional or not. Over the years, many organizations have studied the bay to seek a greater understanding of its cycles, its strengths and weaknesses.

A new endeavor of citizens who are working to strengthen bay improvement programs through better coordination of research information dissemination is the Chesapeake Bay information project. Our former colleague Gilbert Gude, presently Director of the Congressional Research Service, made a presentation to these citizens which points up how important it is that all policymakers—whether bay community leaders or Congressmen—need the very best of information systems to deal with the complex issues of today.

I commend this speech to your attention.

INFORMATION AND RESEARCH SYSTEMS IN THE SERVICE OF DECISIONMAKING

(By Gilbert Gude, Director, Congressional Research Service)

Your invitation to discuss the establishment of a Chesapeake Bay information center is most appreciated. When people are in government, they are always involved in some type of information communication but for more than 5 years now I have been involved with an institution which is totally committed to research and transfer of information to the United States Congress. The Congressional Research Service, CRS works exclusively for Congress—for all the Members and all the committees; and CRS scope—information, reference, and research—covers all subject areas including estuarine and coastal shelf problems which are of congressional interest. The inquiries from Members and staff—by phone, letter or in person—exceed 370,000 a year and the number of requests has increased at an average rate of almost 9 percent each year over the past decade. The Service employs about 825 people—550 of whom are professionals.

But let me assure you that CRS did not spring forth—Juno-like—from the legislative brow in its present form. It evolved at a very slow pace from a small staff of librarians in days when Government—in fact all society—moved leisurely, to a highly complex information, reference and research system, with automation capability; such evolution rarely follows a smooth path—there inevitably are the ruts of trial and error.

Several principles of CRS account for this evolution. One is embodied in the concept that CRS is in the information and research management business. A few decades ago, the problems we faced were exacerbated by lack of knowledge; but today it is not lack of information but really information overload which often makes problem solving difficult. For this reason CRS sends materials to Congress only at the request of the Members or committees or staff; none of our issue briefs, reports or other materials are provided unless each has been requested. We do not pamphleteer nor lobby Congress; this means, of course, that we serve Congress in a nonpartisan, objective mode; if there is one thing that is not needed in Washington today, it's another advocate or pressure group—sometimes it seems that the lobbies are cloning all over town. So your planning committee's recommendation that your proposed center should provide unbiased and timely information on issues that affect bay publics is on target.

CRS also heartily concurs with your planning committee's stipulation of timeliness. We labor continuously to meet congressional deadlines—provide research in time for a committee hearing, or information in time for a statement to be made in scheduled debate. Fortunately, not every Member of Congress nor every committee is on the phone making requests at one time; we are able to structure our workload. Sometimes we must negotiate a deadline, supplying some material or part of the research initially and then serve up the balance at a later time.

In order to respond to a large number of diverse requests, the CRS professional staff is comprised both of generalists—librarians or information specialists—and subject area specialists—researchers, analysts, lawyers, economists, oceanographers, experts in renewable resource. These professionals serve as shared staff, for all Members of the Senate and House and all of the committees. For example, a researcher in our Environment and Natural Resources Division could, in the course of several days, be assisting a committee in analyzing draft legislation to establish a coastal barrier resources system, talk by phone with legislative staff in a Member's office concerning problems of oil pollution and at the same time be preparing an issue brief which will be available to answer recurring questions from a number of offices which are not seeking detailed analysis but a succinct but well stated overview.

Through the system of shared staff CRS endeavors to use its personnel economically and efficiently. Analysts and specialists are grouped into seven research divisions including the Environment and Natural Resources Policy Division which does much of the estuarine and coastal zone work, and SPRD which approaches these problems from a scientific analysis position. CRS librarians with professional training in library and information science and who might be termed information generalists—are located in the Library Services Division and the Reference Division. The arts and science team in the Reference Division would handle marine estuarine and coastal shelf questions.

In examining information and research work your planning committee has raised an important problem—how to supply the requester with precisely the needed information. I has often been said that 95 percent of the job of providing the needed information involves how well the question is asked. In CRS we have a series of institutes for Member and committee staff to help them to work effectively with CRS information and research resources and how to design and clearly delineate the structure of a project.

Good professionals—analysts, researchers and librarians—not only look to numerous sources of prepared material to carry out their work, but consult professionals in other institutions, both governmental and private, to keep abreast of developments in all of the particular fields. We don't mind picking brains. A CRS bibliographer who specializes in the environmental area can call on the librarians in NOAA, EPA or at Columbia University for information concerning current literature. At the same time, a CRS oceanographer will be on the same kind of a first name basis with State Department experts as to developments in the law of the sea area and ocean scientists at Woods Hole, Mass., on some of their latest work on ocean currents and pollution. Professional meetings are an extremely vital point for keeping abreast of new theories and new studies.

As to keeping current in the estuarine and coastal environmental areas, the 3,000 serials which CRS bibliographers scan every month include The Water Resources Bulletin, Potomac Basin Reporter, Estuaries, Coastal Zone Management Journal, Clean Water Report, Marine Fisheries Review, National Fisherman, Field and Stream, Water Spectrum and Environment. CRS bibliographers also scan research studies by Government and private groups, as well as congressional publications about the Chesapeake Bay.

The various outside data bases consulted in the marine, estuarine and coastal areas are "Enviroline," Oceanic Abstracts, Nexis, and the New York Times Infobank.

In order to carry out its mission, CRS is obliged to tailor its response to the needs of its congressional constitutents. Different situations call for different products or modes. One mode, oral communication, is on the increase. Our researchers not only discuss matters with Members or staffers by phone but often visit congressional offices or committees to provide briefings in particular areas. Seminars and workshops are popular media. As opposed to the printed report; such oral programs provide the opportunity for a dialogue.

Just as the oral communicaton of information ranges from a quick phone call to an all-day seminar, CRS written products are similarly targeted to those being served. One-to-10 page memos are often utilized to answer specific requests, such as "would like the current status of Federal funding for shore protection of the Chesapeake Bay under the Corps of Engineers Rivers and Harbors Act and NOAA's Coastal Zone Management Act;" "supply background information on plans to build a super-tanker port in Texas"; and "supply information on anticipated impact of offshore oil and gas operation on coastal North Carolina."

CRS is also directed by statute to anticipate congressional information and research needs. One of the most commonly used tools is the computerized issue brief. We have at this time approximately 375 issue briefs in the system on all subject areas of substantial congressional interest, ranging from "Abortion" and "Acid Precipitation" to "Urea-Formaldehyde Foam Insulation" and "Yellow Rain." Issue briefs seldom run more than 15 pages printed out or retrieved on terminal screens; they are designed to give a legislative assistant or a Member of Congress a quick overview of a specific issue. "Oil Spill Liability and Compensation" is a typical issue brief: it runs a total of 9 pages; it starts with a definition of the issue. Background and policy analysis of this brief includes a discussion of oil handling trends and spill rates, effects of oil pollution and a discussion of compensation for oil spills. The brief then discusses the current proposals and current issues, which include preemption, liability, coverage, and a discussion of the appropriate funding level and the fund maintenance. The brief concludes with a discussion of specific bills introduced and a chronology of legislative events which affect oil pollution liability and compensation. This issue brief was introduced in April 1981 and, as of the first of this month, had been updated 12 times. The technology of the system makes it possible to update these IB's on a daily basis if necessary and, indeed, in such cases as the Iranian hostage crisis and the Falkland Islands war, this occurs daily on dozens and even hundreds of days. Issue briefs are available to Members and staff not only in hard copy, but on office computer screens.

In addition to the issue briefs, a heavily used CRS product is the CRS report, usually from 20–100 pages in length; reports provide indepth analysis or examination of a specific aspect of congressional concern. Typical of the CRS report is the "Federal Role in Barrier Island Development."

Bibliographies are also a popular item in the congressional community. These, too, are prepared to cover fast-moving issues. In accordance with our efforts to work more closely with Congress in the reference-research areas, we recently developed the research guide. Congressional staff use these guides as a bibliographic road map, which traces the literature best suited to explore a particular aspect of a subject area.

Another product of the Congressional Research Service Library Services Division is the selective dissemination of information system, known as the SDI. This very popular and heavily used system provides CRS researchers and analysts and congressional subscribers, a weekly listing of articles in their particular subject areas of interest. Those subscribers to the SDI who would be interested in estuarine and coastal zone matters would subscribe to the interest terms: "Fisheries, water pollution, water resources development, and waterways." Three by five cards delivered weekly give annotated citations of all current articles in journals dealing with the subject areas. Subscribers can then order the printout of those particular articles in which he or she is interested. This saves an individual from screening or trying to read dozens and dozens of periodicals on a weekly basis.

We continually monitor the usage and effectiveness of our various products by questionnaires and consultations. We have been very gratified that, regardless of political philosophy or party registration, the various services are utilized to a relatively equal degree by all Members; this applies, for example, to the attendance at our seminar programs: We find that a Member-only breakfast seminar on MX missile siting which starts at 8 o'clock in the morning will have a good ratio of Democrats and Republicans, conservatives, moderates and liberals. This not only would hint that our programs are useful to all of the Members regardless of political persuasion, but also that Members of Congress wish to hear the pros and cons—a fair analysis of all sides of the issues. Any information research system should be continually sensitive to these factors and ready to adjust to changing needs of its clientele.

As I have pointed out, the Congressional Research Service is very specifically directed to serve only the legislature; our appropriations limit us to provide information and research to the Congressional community. Members, in carrying out their representational function, sometimes provide CRS materials to constituents; for example, a resident of the Chesapeake Bay region who asks his or her Congressman for information on oil spill liability. In a substantial number of cases, major projects which our research divisions prepare for committees are printed at the request of the committee by the Government Printing Office and are available to the general public. At the direction of Congress, we list twice a year those CRS products which Congress has put into the public domain. Also at the direction of Congress, the Government Printing Office publishes an ongoing series, known as the MLC—Major Legislation of the Congress—which is derived from our issue brief system and gives an overview of how Congress is dealing with major issues of the day. Congress also directs GPO to print the Bill Digest, which is prepared by CRS and gives a listing and summary of bills under consideration. So a substantial amount of CRS work that is most likely to be helpful to the general public does go into the public domain.

In conclusion, I hope this overview of the Congressional Research Service is helpful to your deliberations. We—you and I—and so many citizens of our democratic society have a dedication to the principle of the free exchange of information as well as objective research and intellectual investigation. We believe mankind is best served when these principles are most nearly fulfilled. But the burgeoning growth of all sciences and sophisticated information technology of today makes it difficult for the decision maker, the architects of policy, to always have, in a timely manner, the best knowledge available in the most helpful form. And so we, you and I, can agree on one final point: Our work is cut out for us. Good Luck!●

THE WILD AND SCENIC RIVERS BILL

HON. JAMES WEAVER

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to designate some of Oregon's finest free-flowing streams as wild and scenic rivers. This bill would call for studies of four rivers, to evaluate their potential as wild and scenic rivers, and would immediately designate four others. Those streams designated as wild and scenic are the North Umpqua, the north fork of the John Day, and the south fork of the Owyhee, and the Illinois. The rivers to be studied are the north fork of the Smith, the Grande Ronde, McKenzie, and the Chetco.

All of these rivers, except the North Umpqua, have been inventoried by the appropriate agency and qualify for protection. This inventory took nearly 2 years and encompassed over 280,000 square miles in 7 States. These rivers were identified as having particularly significant resource values. The North Umpqua has been studied extensively by the Oregon State Parks Department and recommended to be included in the State wild and scenic system. It is a superb fishery and attracts steelhead fishermen from around the world.

These rivers are all outstanding streams, offering recreation, fisheries habitat, water supplies, and unbounded esthetic pleasures. These rivers qualify for protection and are favored by a broad cross-section of Oregonians who enjoy the pleasures of free-flowing streams.

I will do my best to see this vitally important legislation passed, and urge all of my colleagues to give it their full support.●

IDA NUDEL

HON. BOB SHAMANSKY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. SHAMANSKY. Mr. Speaker, Ida Nudel serves as a perfect representation of the thousands of Soviet citizens determined to emigrate from the U.S.S.R.

Ida Nudel has been denied this basic right and has been treated unjustly by the Soviet Government. After applying for a visa in 1971, she was not only refused permission to emigrate but was also banned from the job market. Despite the fact that she was under close surveillance by authorities and was barely able to support herself, she dedicated herself to the Soviet prisoners of conscience and earned the heroine reputation as "Guardian Angel of the Prisoners." After 7 years of fighting for human rights, she was sentenced to Siberian exile simply for expressing her wish on a sign: "KGB, give me my visa."

This strong woman was released this past spring and deserves to become united with her only living relative in Israel.

Last year, the number of Jews seeking to emigrate from the Soviet Union rose to its highest level ever. The number permitted to leave, however, sank to less than 10 percent of the 1979 level. The United States, which stands so strongly for the freedom of the oppressed, cannot pass up any opportunity to continue to press the Soviet Union to comply with the international agreements supporting human rights, agreements which the U.S.S.R. has signed.

I recently received a letter from Ida Nudel's sister, Elena Fridman. I would like to insert it in the RECORD at this point.

KIRYAT SHARETT,
Holon, Israel, June 27, 1982.

Hon. ROBERT N. SHAMANSKY,
House of Representatives,
Washington D.C., U.S.A.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SHAMANSKY: I am deeply moved and encouraged by your concern and activity on behalf of my sister, Ida Nudel, as expressed in your letter to Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin dated February 26, co-signed by you and 73 of your colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives. If you receive any response from Ambassador Dobrynin you can well appreciate how anxious I will be to have you share it with me.

Ida's release from Siberian exile and her return to her Moscow apartment on March 26 sparked hope and anticipation in my heart. I thought it might be the first step toward our long-awaited reunion in Israel. Instead, it turned out to be the beginning of a new round of the Soviet authorities' campaign to further embitter her life.

This time they have evidently decided to throw her into a bureaucratic maze which seems to provide no way out and is obviously designed to strangle her hope and spirit.

Immediately after having received her I.D. card from the police in Moscow, Ida went to the Ovir office to again apply for an exit visa to Israel. There she was told that such application could only be received from persons who are resident in the district. Since no address was written into her new I.D. card, she would have to apply for a residence permit. Ida's subsequent application for the reinstatement of her permanent residence status in Moscow has now been turned down. She does not know where she will live if she is indeed forced out of her apartment in Moscow.

Of equal concern is the fact that Ida has expressed her need to enter a hospital for long overdue treatment of her heart condition. This is also impossible because hospital facilities in Moscow are unavailable to nonresidents. During conversations in Moscow, Ida has indicated that what kept her going during her difficult exile were the thousands of letters she received from well-wishers around the world. I believe that continuing the flow of letters now is the most important thing we can do. The only address I can give you is that of her Moscow apartment. I do not know whether letters will actually reach her there, but I believe we must try for as long as this is her only address:

U.S.S.R.
Moscow.
Yunikh Lenintzev St. No. 79.
CPRP. 6, Apt. 28.
Nudel, Ida.
(Personal Delivery—Acknowledgment of Receipt Requested.)

Obviously, I would also be very grateful if you would continue to place pressure on the Soviet authorities so that they might finally relent in this senseless campaign and allow Ida to go.

Sincerely yours,

ELENA FRIDMAN.●

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION PERSONNEL REFORM ACT OF 1982

HON. PARREN J. MITCHELL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, today, I have introduced a bill entitled "The Small Business Administration Personnel Reform Act of 1982."

For at least the last 12 years SBA has been the subject of intense criticism regarding the political abuse of its personnel management system. Generally regarded as a "political dumping ground", SBA continues to fall short of achieving congressionally mandated goals due, in great measure, to a management system which places more importance on political affiliation than management expertise. These problems not only deprive the small business community of the most effective delivery of programs and services, but also deprive SBA's work force of an equitable opportunity to fully develop their career potential. We must put an end to this situation now or continue to face the consequences of an organization which has the reputation of being the most politically motivated agency in this city.

The history of SBA's politically abused personnel system is well known.

In the late 1960's and early 1970's SBA's politically abused personnel system came under attack by the House Banking Committee which had legislative jurisdiction over SBA at the time.

In August of 1974, the U.S. Civil Service Commission—now the Office of Personnel Management—issued a report entitled "Alleged Political Influence in Personnel Actions at the Small Business Administration". The report concluded, among other things, that illegal political considerations resulted in the selection of district directors and that:

A number of improper or illegal personnel actions have been taken by SBA as a result of efforts to provide preferential treatment of some candidates and employees; and in some cases, the personnel actions which resulted from preferential treatment were based on considerations of political support.

In 1979, SBA was again accused of politically motivated personnel actions for its adoption of a rotation policy for district directors. The legality of the rotation system was sustained by the Merit Systems Protection Board. However, persistent rumor exists that the challenge to SBA's actions was not as vigorous as it could have been. Nonetheless, it should be noted that GAO has criticized the policy. In a report dated August 26, 1980 (B199588) GAO concluded:

While SBA's rotation policy, itself, does not violate any law or regulation, we feel that the policy was not adequately developed and implemented. The SBA district directors were not formally consulted on the need for such a policy nor given an opportunity to provide input into its development. Also, alternative arrangements were not considered nor explored with directors who might refuse to accept a reassignment. In the interests of fairness, equity, and cost to the Government, we feel that, at a minimum, these steps should have been taken before implementing the policy.

The "cost" referred to by GAO is quite substantial. Seven district directors were rotated in 1979 at an estimated cost of $117,596, or $16,800 for each.

When the former SBA Administrator took office in 1981 he too continued the tradition of questionable personnel practices. By January 1982, he had directed the reassignment to different geographic locations of 10 employees who were GS-14 or above. No substantive justifications for these actions were ever provided. Employees resigned rather than accept reassignment; hundreds of thousands of taxpayer dollars were spent on those forced to relocate; and yet SBA still cannot even articulate a standard for ordering a reassignment in the first place.

Most recently, my committee staff has uncovered the fact that none of SBA's schedule C employees have performance standards: No schedule C occupying a grade of GS-13, GS-14 or GS-15 is included in SBA's merit pay system and none of its noncareer senior executive service employees are included in a merit appraisal system. These latter two facts may well constitute yet another violation of the Civil Service Reform Act. We are told that the Office of Personnel Management will render a decision on these issues.

In addition to politically motivated personnel practices, the SBA organizational structure is both top heavy and layered with unneeded tiers of political appointees.

As of March 31, 1982, SBA has a total work force of 5,061. Of this amount, 1,207 or 24 percent were carried on the central office payroll and 530 or 10.5 percent were carried on the payrolls of the 10 regional offices. Therefore, we can estimate that about 34 percent of the total work force lies outside of the districts. The districts, however, are the agency's primary delivery system for services to the small business community.

In addition to a top-heavy organizational structure, SBA has imposed layers of political appointees in such a way as to militate against effective management. For example, there are 18 political appointees in the regions and 31 political appointees in the central office: 14 in the Office of the Administrator; 5 in External Affairs; 3 each in the Inspector General's Office and in Minority Small Business; 2 in Management Assistance; and 1 each in Field Management, Advocacy, Finance and Investment, and Policy, Planning and Budget. One additional political appointee not included in the total of 49 is stationed at the White House for purposes not yet fully known. Of the 49 appointees, 39 are in grades GS-13 or higher or in the SES. Since these 39 do not even have performance standards, one wonders whether they are really needed or, if these positions are needed, whether career employees could adequately serve in most of these jobs. Nonetheless, there seems to be no reason in logic why an agency of only 4,200 permanent full-time employees must have a turnover of at least 39 top managers every time a new administration comes to power.

It is my belief that the proposed legislation I introduce today will go a long way to remedy these problems. The bill has seven major provisions:

First, the bill would make it illegal for any employee to take, direct others to take, recommend or approve personnel actions on the basis of the political activity or affiliation of an individual. In addition, an employee directed or solicited to take such actions must report that fact to the Inspector General. Violators are subject to disciplinary action and civil fines.

Second, the bill would reduce from 49 to 7, the number of political appointees employed by the agency. This would make the agency less of a political dumping ground.

Third, the bill would provide a standard for the directed reassignment of all employees and offer specific due process guarantees to those employees above GS-13 who are the subject of a reassignment. Employees above this grade level are most susceptible to politically motivated reassignments.

Fourth, the bill would provide for advance notice and employee participation in all rotation policies.

Fifth, the bill would allow the Merit Systems Protection Board to divest SBA of part or all of its personnel authority upon a "pattern or practice" determination of illegal personnel actions.

Sixth, the bill would impose reporting requirements on SBA to advise the Congress with respect to the planned or actual reassignment of high ranking employees and to advise of possible and actual discipline of employees for engaging in proscribed political personnel practices.

Seventh, the bill would require that at least 70 percent of the work force be assigned to district offices by September 30, 1985, and at least 80 percent by September 30, 1987.

All portions of the bill would become effective on the date of enactment except those provisions which deal with the conversion of noncareer to career positions, which become effective on June 1, 1984.

If we are to provide the small business community the types of services and programs it so desperately needs, we must insure that SBA is well managed. If we are to provide Federal employees the opportunity for full career development, they must be free from political reprisal and other forms of abuse.

I know that many of my colleagues have heard horror stories from their constituents about SBA's politically abused personnel system and about the lack of adequate field personnel, and about tiers and tiers of upper level bureaucrats in Washington whose only qualification for office was their political activities in the last election. This bill now gives the Congress its chance for a meaningful response.●

TERMINATION OF SOCIAL SECURITY COVERAGE

HON. J. J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, hundreds of nonprofit organizations and many State and local government entities are scheduled to terminate social security coverage for their employees during the next 2½ years, primarily to save money. This problem is extremely serious and is growing. When these employers terminate converage, their employees are usually seriously disadvantaged, losing disability, survivor, and possibly retirement protection from social security. The social security trust funds are also harmed by the loss of revenue, potentially over $1 billion per year. For those employees who are already permanently covered under social security by their past work, termination of coverage just means that the cost of their benefits must be borne by all other workers who are still paying taxes into the system; shifting the cost in this way is grossly inequitable, and represents a drain on the payroll tax system that should not be tolerated.

Many of these employers have been convinced by high-pressure consulting firms that they can replace social security for their employees at a lower cost than the payroll tax they now pay. That is just not possible, and I recommend to my colleagues the excerpts from an analysis done by an independent consultant of one such replacement plan that I have inserted in the extensions of remarks in today's RECORD. Opting out is bad for the employee and bad for social security, and it must be stopped.

I submit the following analysis for the information of my colleagues:

TERMINATION OF SOCIAL SECURITY COVERAGE

Employers who terminate Social Security coverage for their employees on the assumption that they can replace social security protection at a lower cost should think again. The following is an excerpt from an analysis of the National Security Retirement Program, a plan that has been heavily marketed by that company as an adequate, lower-cost replacement for Social Security. The analysis was done by Donald F. Smith and Associates of Princeton, New Jersey, at the request of several hospital associations, and underscores the difficulty of "replacing" Social Security, as well as the shoddy selling techniques used by those who are pushing these replacement plans.

THE PROMOTIONAL MATERIAL

National Security's promotional material for the employer generally provides the same benefit information as the employee booklet plus additional information on the mechanics of withdrawal from Social Security and cost information on the alternate program. Since this report is directed at the benefits, the employee booklet will be examined in detail rather than the employer material.

The literature promoting the withdrawal from Social Security and that explaining it to employees is filled with incomplete statements. Every one of us has simplified an explanation of something to save time or to keep from boring the reader. This is perfectly acceptable so long as the whole story is presented. Many of the statements in the employee booklet concerning the alternative plan just plain leave out all the if's, and's, and but's. Much of the material presented to the employer is also over-simplified.

Another problem is the way figures are used. Numbers can almost always be presented in such a way as to show the conclusion the writer would like.

The following pages will examine some of the specific statements made in the literature promoting the National Security Retirement Program in an attempt to see to what extent the entire story is being presented. It cannot help but seem nit-picky because it is the details of Social Security and National Security that are most widely different.

The following excerpts have been cut from the leaflet describing the National Security Retirement Program to the employee. A complete copy of the booklet will be found in the pocket in the rear of this report.

Statement No. 1

Recently published statistics indicate that even with the new taxes imposed by the December, 1977 legislation, the Retirement Fund will be bankrupt by the year 2030, the Disability Fund by the year 2007, and the Medicare Fund by 1989.

This will occur even though the maximum F.I.C.A. taxes will triple by 1987. (See chart below)

Year	Tax rate	Taxable wage	Max. tax
1978	6.05	$17,700	$1,070.85
1979	6.13	22,900	1,403.77
1980	6.13	25,900	1,587.67
1981	6.65	29,700	1,975.05
1982	6.70	31,800	2,130.60
1983	6.70	33,900	2,271.30
1984	6.70	36,000	2,412.00
1985	7.05	38,100	2,686.05
1986	7.15	40,200	2,874.30
1987	7.15	42,600	30,045.90

If the employee looks at the maximum tax column, he sees that the maximum tax goes from $1,070.85 to $3,045.90—it triples. The fact is that you have to be earning $42,600 currently to be subject to this increase. It would appear that this is a point that could be very easily missed. For most hospital employees, the percentage of tax increase is merely the increase in the tax rate which amounts to about 18 percent over 10 years (plus an additional 18 percent for the employer).

Statement No. 2

"2. Are there any savings involved by choosing the Alternative Program?

"The National Security Plan was designed not only to provide more attractive benefits for employees, but also to provide the employee opportunity for substantial savings. With Social Security taxes increasing to 7.15 percent by 1987 and to 7.65 percent by 1990, the National Security Alternative Plan allows the hospital to set a lower contribution rate. For example, setting the rate at 6.13 percent (the same as S.S. for 1979) would still provide more attractive benefits for most hospital employees without the need to increase future years' payroll tax rate as does Social Security."

This statement requires that the future duplicate the present with no benefit increases. If Social Security benefits are increased, the employee is going to want like increases and they will cost more. As mentioned before, changes in interest rates or life expectancy will also affect cost. Since the disability and survivor benefits are insured, poor claims experience would mean cost increases. This answer seems to indicate that the employer is going to pick up all of these costs.

"4. Compare the Survivorship benefit in Social Security with the Alternative Program.

"Under Social Security, Survivorship provides only a lump sum death benefit of $255.00. Any other survivorship benefits are welfare oriented, based on dependent children. The more the beneficiaries, the greater the benefits—up to the family maximum. If the widow is under age 60 and there are no dependent children, she receives no monthly survivor benefits until age 60. If she is caring for a dependent surviving child, she will receive a monthly benefit until the child becomes 18, then goes into a "black-out" period to age 60.

"The National Security Plan provides a substantial death benefit payable to any heir or even the estate—in lump sum or any option selected by the heir without regard to dependency. National Security benefits would be payable in addition to any benefits due from Social Security."

This answer is really incomplete. It does not say that the widow will get a life income starting at age 60 and that the surviving divorced wife may get one also. It stipulates that the Mother's benefit will stop when the child becomes age 18—but it can go on forever if the child is totally disabled before age 22. It also does not stipulate that the benefit can be paid to a father as well. And what about the dependent parent's benefit? Or, the divorced mother's benefit? The answer is really only touching on a small part of the Social Security benefit.

"5. Compare the Disability benefit in Social Security with the Alternative Program.

"The National Security Plan provides an insured disability benefit which is comparable to the Social Security benefit in most cases. For persons without dependent children, the National Security benefit will be greater. For lower income young workers with the family maximum benefit, the National Security benefit will be smaller unless supplemental coverage is provided. Those rare cases would be identified during the preparation period analysis, so proper provision could be made.

"Since young worker disability cases are more likely to be accident originated, integration of benefits is significant. Workmen's compensation in job related cases would be integrated with other benefits, whether other benefits are Social Security or National Security, so that total benefits would be the same. (Social Security Administration statistics disclose that the majority of the claims they pay are to participants over age 50 where little or no dependency is involved.)"

The answer to this question recognizes that there are some problems replacing the Social Security disability benefits and that supplemental coverage must be provided for the younger, lower income worker with several dependents. Obviously, the intention is to take care of the present employees with supplemental coverage. Will future employees be handled so carefully? If the answer is yes, then there is no problem. If it is no, that is another matter. Again, the replacement coverage ignores the Disabled Widow's and Widower's Benefit as well as the Divorced Wife's Benefit.

"6. Compare the Retirement benefits in Social Security with the Alternative program.

"With Social Security, a person has only the right to receive a monthly pension for his lifetime (and a surviving spouse for the spouse's lifetime). He owns nothing and has no asset or estate in the Social Security benefit which he could bequeath to an heir. He has no right to a specified benefit amount or guarantee that it will not be reduced.

"Projected National Security benefits compared with Social Security benefits (using conservative assumptions) show that National Security benefits are substantially better for the participant alone and considerably better for participant and spouse. This is solely on a lifetime annuity basis which is the only method available to compare directly with Social Security. National Security has much more flexibility so that beneficiaries can select any of the various settlement options including lump sum.

"The most notable difference is that the participant owns his National Security account. He is 100% vested from the first contributions. It is part of his estate, which he may bequeath to any heir or beneficiary, it is his property."

These paragraphs stipulate that Social Security benefits are not guaranteed and imply that the National Security benefits are. Neither half of the story is accurate. On the one side, Social Security does stipulate a formula whereby the amount of the various benefits can be determined. Granted, Congress can always revise the formula. However, the formula will be changed to another formula. It is also a great deal harder to get agreement on Social Security changes through Congress than to get a hospital's board of directors to agree to a benefit change.

On the other side, the National Security benefits are not guaranteed. The amount of the retirement benefit depends first on the hospital (and the employee) continuing their contribution rates. Then the insurance company must earn at least the investment rate projected to the employee. Finally, there must be no change in mortality so the cost of buying a life income at the employee's retirement remains the same as it is when the original benefit projection is made. If interest rates should fall rapidly or there is a change in life expectancy, and the employer does not increase its contributions accordingly, then the employee will get a lower benefit. This is a long way from "certainty as to future benefits."

The strongest plus for the National Security plan is that the retirement benefit is funded through a tax sheltered annuity and that the proceeds belong to the employee. This gives the single employee with no eligible survivors an advantage over the Social Security system. However, the answer to the question does not cover any of the problems such as using up the employee's tax sheltered annuity exclusion allowance or what happens if Congress changes the tax sheltered annuity rules. These were discussed under Retirement Benefits on page 30.

The second paragraph of this statement says that National Security benefits are better and "this is solely on a lifetime annuity basis which is the only method to compare directly with Social Security." A lifetime annuity pays benefits for the life of one person. On the death of that person, all benefits stop. If the original annuitant wishes benefits continued after his death, then he must take a reduced benefit himself in order to provide this continuation. the National Security plan requires that the employee's monthly benefit be reduced if a survivor benefit is provided.

When there is a benefit payable to the spouse or other eligible dependent, Social Security is not a lifetime annuity in the normal insurance usage of the term since there is no reduction in the employee's benefit to provide the continued benefits. It is a joint and survivor annuity. This means it pays the full benefit while both are alive and a reduced benefit if neither person dies. However, unlike the normal insured benefit, the employee does not receive a larger benefit if he does not want the survivor coverage of if he does not have eligible survivors. Since any form of survivor annuity costs more than a single lifetime annuity, the projected benefits for National Security are overstated because they are life annuities.

Finally, Social Security benefits are subject to cost of living adjustments once the benefits begin. This means that even in those cases where an employee's projected benefit at age 65 is truly greater under National Security, Social Security may catch up in a very few years and even exceed the National Security benefit if the cost of living continues to increase. This is a valuable and expensive feature under Social Security. Actuaries estimate it would require contribution increases of 25 percent to 50 percent just to add a modest 3 percent annual increase to a plan with no such automatic increases.

"7. Compare the Medicare Benefits.

"Eligibility for Medicare basic benefits (Part A) devolve to persons age 65 who are entitled to monthly retirement benefits under Social Security, or who have received Social Security disability benefits for two years.

"Many employees will be fully qualified for Social Security benefits through prior or subsequent Social Security covered employment, thus be eligible for Medicare basic benefits. Many other employees are married and would derive Medicare basic benefits through a working spouse fully qualified under Social Security.

"Medicare basic benefits (Part A) may be purchased by anyone not covered through Social Security qualification. In the few cases where this might occur, greater National Security retirement benefits would enable purchase of Medicare basic benefits. If the hospital desires, the National Security Program can provide a Medicare benefit through a Medicare Reserve Fund to purchase Medicare benefits for employees not covered at retirement.

"It is anticipate that Medicare eligibility soon will be a moot point, because it seems inescapable that Medicare will become part of some National Health Insurance Program with universal coverage."

Medicare benefits can be purchased for $89.00 per month by persons age 65 and over, but cannot be purchased by a disabled person or one on kidney dialysis who is under age 65. If the employer is keeping a fund to provide Medicare benefits for those not otherwise eligible, then there is no problem other than the question of adequacy of the fund. If the employer is saying that the retirement benefits will be sufficiently large to cover this expense and still equal the Social Security retirement benefits plus the taxes thereon, the figures should be reviewed carefully. The last paragraph about Medicare becoming a part of some National Health Program is pure conjecture.

"8. What about the financial stability of an Alternative program?

"Social Security was on the verge of bankruptcy before the tax increases were passed in December, 1977. Those increases will still leave the system bankrupt in approximately the year 2030. What compounds the situation is the constantly shrinking ratio of workers to beneficiaries. There is little hope for relief from population growth; in fact, the demographic bulge from the post World War II baby boom exacerbates the situation.

"The logical alternative will be reduced benefits. There is no assurance or contractual obligation that Social Security benefits will not change. Benefits and entitlement are as much subject to the whim of Congress as are tax rates and covered wage bases. As Congress acts to keep the System within available resources, some probable changes will be: to raise the retirement age, to tax Social Security benefits, to tax a non-working spouse in order to qualify for a spouse's benefit, to eliminate spouses benefits and compute the benefit solely on the individual's own earnings record, to eliminate or reduce indexing for inflation, to include additional causes for reduction of benefits.

"By contrast an alternative plan, in many ways, has greater financial stability. It is based on contractual obligations so the participants have certainty as to future benefits. The participants own their plan, the assets are part of their estate. They are 100% vested and control disposition of their plan assets. Retirement benefits are funded so that accumulated earnings build up the retirement fund. Future benefits do not rely upon taxes from the future worker pool to pay the benefits in the "chain letter" fashion. Earnings from funding are what produce the financial stability of the private plan which Social Security does not have."

The implied guarantee aspect of the retirement benefit was covered under Statement No. 5.

Statement No. 8

"10. What effect will an alternative program have on the transient employee?

"A transient employee usually has greater combined benefits because the benefits for the period covered by National Security are invariably greater than any reduction of Social Security benefits for that period.

"An individual employee would not be penalized by changing jobs to and from Social Security covered employment. His Social Security coverage does not have to be consecutive. It can be intermittent or whatever, so long as he has forty quarters of coverage at any time prior to retirement."

This answer ignores the currently insured requirement for Social Security. It says the employee will not be penalized which is not necessarily true.

"11. How will an alternative program compensate for the fact that Social Security benefits are tax free?

"During the accumulation years, participants under National Security enjoy reduced income taxes when it is of greater value to most persons. During retirement years, with extra exemptions and other tax advantages, most persons would have limited taxes which would be more than covered by the larger benefits. Also, as Social Security benefits rise in relation to wages and salaries of currently employed persons, there will be increasing pressure to tax Social Security benefits.

"On the other hand, Social Security taxes paid by employees are out of after-tax dollars; and the employee receives no current tax advantage during the working years."

Again, the answer ignores the disability coverage. Social Security disability benefits are non-taxable and the replacement long term disability benefits are taxable after the first $100 per week. Effective this year, the employer must report all "sick pay" payments to the government and the employee on the employee's W-2 form. If the plan is insured, the insurer must have the information to the employer by the 15th of January and the employer must have it to the employee by the 31st of January. If the employee so requests, the employer must withhold income tax payments from the long term disability payments. There is none of this additional paperwork with Social Security.

Statement No. 10

"14. What happens to an individual's eligibility if he stops paying Social Security?

"If an individual stops paying F.I.C.A. taxes, his eligibility for Social Security benefits depends on his individual circumstances. Once he is fully insured (40 quarters of coverage), he is fully insured for life. If he does not have 40 quarters of coverage, he may acquire the needed quarters at any future time to reach fully insured status."

The answer to this question ignores the currently insured requirement for disability coverage. It implies that the employee will not lose anything which is not true.

Statement No. 11

"16. What effect does participation in an alternative program have on a young employee not insured yet under Social Security?

"If a young employee, not insured yet under Social Security, remains under National Security for all working years until retirement, the benefits are better. If, at some point, the employee leaves National Security and goes under Social Security coverage long enough to become fully insured for Social Security benefits, the combined benefits are substantially greater than Social Security benefits alone would have been. This is so because the National Security fund continues to accumulate earnings over the years until retirement age."

This answer must be read carefully. All it says is that the retirement benefits are better because the employee remains under National Security for all years to retirement. That assumes he did not die and did not become disabled so those benefits are not being compared. The new employee has the same problems as were mentioned previously for disability, survivors and Medicare coverage, compounded by the fact that he has to wait longer for Social Security coverage if he should ever leave the National Security coverage.

The last sentence is inaccurate. The reason the person will have substantially higher benefits if he gets a combination of National Security and Social Security is precisely because of the "welfare" aspects of Social Security—the minimum benefit and the PIA structure which favors those with short years of coverage and low earnings.●

MRS. CAROLINE PUTNAM RECEIVES 1982 JEFFERSON AWARD

HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, this morning the American Institute for Public Service presented its 1982 Jefferson Awards for significant achievements in the field of public service in the United States. I am pleased to inform my colleagues that one of my constituents, Mrs. Caroline Putnam of Springfield, Mass., was selected as a recipient of one of this year's awards for outstanding public service benefiting local communities.

The Jefferson Awards recognize the dedication, sacrifice, and achievements of individuals who serve the American people. The award for service in local communities is designed to highlight the activities of those private individuals whose extraordinary efforts on behalf of others have benefited society. I know of no one more deserving of this award than Caroline Putnam.

For more than 35 years, Caroline Putnam has been working to insure that black students have an opportunity to obtain a college education. Long before it was fashionable, Mrs. Putnam established an organization to solicit funds to provide scholarship assistance for black students. Each year 100 students receive a 4-year commitment from Mrs. Putnam's scholarship program. For thousands of men and women, that commitment made their education possible. Their lives, and the life of our society, have been immeasurably enriched by the hard work and the farsightedness of Caroline Putnam.

Mr. Speaker, it was characteristic of Mrs. Putnam that in accepting the Jefferson Award at the Supreme Court this morning she chose to accentuate the work of the scholarship program, rather than take any personal credit for it. She recounted an incident that I think best portrays her assessment of the value of the program. She told of a scholarship recipient who, 10 years after graduation, came to Mrs. Putnam to offer a contribution to the scholarship fund. The graduate said, "I can never thank you enough for what you did for my children when you educated me." That moving tribute is a testament to the value of Mrs. Putnam's efforts. I am pleased that the American Institute for Public Service has chosen to recognize those efforts with the prestigious Jefferson Award.

I would like to include at this point in the RECORD, the other distinguished Americans who received this year's Jefferson Award. The list follows:

THE 1982 JEFFERSON AWARDS

The Greatest Public Service by an Elected or Appointed Official; The Honorable Howard H. Baker, Jr.

The Greatest Public Service Performed by a Private Citizen; Bob Hope.

The Greatest Public Service Benefiting the Disadvantaged; The Honorable Claude Pepper.

The Greatest Public Service Performed by an Individual Thirty-five or Under; The Honorable Henry Cisneros.

Outstanding Public Service Benefiting Local Communities; Dallas Doyle, Montana. Richard Marvin Garrett, South Carolina; Helena Kyle, North Carolina.

Caroline Putnam, Massachusetts; Ruth Heinz and Lorraine Schreck, Wisconsin.●

LET'S NOT PLAY POLITICS WITH SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. DAN LUNGREN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, I have become extremely concerned in recent weeks to learn that the Speaker of the House and other Democrats are attempting to turn social security into a November 1982 election year issue. The unfortunate result from these attempts is to unnecessarily confuse and instill fear in millions of social security beneficiaries.

On July 8, 1982, the Speaker was reported in the Washington Post as calling Republican television ads an effort to "lie to the American people." The implication was that President Reagan truly did not intend to keep his promise that social security beneficiaries would receive their full 7.4 cost-of-living adjustment this July 3.

These accusations are nothing more than false and unfair. Never once during the budget negotiations this past spring did President Reagan officially advocate changing the July cost-of-living adjustment for social security beneficiaries.

Those that would attempt to turn social security into a political football for self-gain will have to stand by their own action and individual records. It is ironic that a review of the facts shows that it was the ranking Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee that offered a proposal on February 10, 1982, to change the social security cost-of-living adjustment. Specifically this proposal offered to defer the cost-of-living adjustment for July 1982, delay it until October for future years, and provide a smaller cost-of-living adjustment in future years until the social security trust fund levels were higher. In addition, last year during the budget reconciliation consideration, it was the Democrat-controlled Ways and Means Committee which reported out a proposal to change the July cost-of-living adjustment. It was also the Democrat-controlled Budget Committee which brought this proposal for consideration to the House floor which contained the same provision.

In order that all the facts be known on this issue, I insert the versions of both committee reports and the House bill regarding the proposed change in the cost-of-living adjustment on social security benefits at this point into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The reports follow:

6. TRANSITION TO COST-OF-LIVING INCREASES ON A FISCAL YEAR BASIS (SECTION 206)

Present Law and Background

The cost-of-living increase provision enacted in December 1973 intentionally put the benefit increase on a fiscal year basis in order to avoid creating a substantial outlay increase in the fiscal year 1974 budget. The fiscal year at that time was on a July to June basis. In 1977, the fiscal year was moved to an October to September basis, but the month in which the benefit increase in provided was not similarly changed.

Explanation of Provision

Section 206 of the bill provides for moving the payment of the cost-of-living increase to October instead of July 1982. In addition, it provides that an ad hoc increase would be paid in July 1982 which would be equal to one-half the increase in the cost-of-living from the first quarter of 1981 to the first quarter of 1982.

In October 1982 a second benefit increase would be computed based on the increase in the CPI from the first quarter of 1981 to the March through May period of 1982 (a fourteen-month inflation period as compared to the present 12-month period) and the remainder of the benefit increase equal to this amount would be paid. The October increase plus the ad hoc increase in July would equal the increase in the CPI over the 14-month measuring period. In this way, beneficiaries would receive a total increase based on 14 months of inflation, from January 1981 to March of 1982. Future automatic increases after 1982 would be based on the CPI change in the March through May period each year and would be payable in October of each year, restoring the payment to the first month of the fiscal year. The changes made by this section would also make corresponding changes in the cost of living adjustments provided under Tier 1 and the survivors and spouses's maximum benefits of Tier II of the Railroad Retirement Service, and under the needs-tested veterans' pension programs.

OMNIBUS RECONCILIATION ACT OF 1981

(Report of the Committee on the Budget, House of Representatives, to accompany H.R. 3982, a bill to provide for reconciliation pursuant to section 3 of the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal years 1982, 1983, and 1984; together with supplemental, additional, and minority views)

In October 1982, a second benefit increase would be computed based on the increase in the CPI from the first quarter of 1981 to the March through May period of 1982 (a 14-month inflation period as compared to the present 12-month period). This increase would be adjusted to reflect the ad hoc increase paid in July, so that the October increase plus the ad hoc increase in July would equal the increase in the CPI over the 14-month measuring period. In this way, beneficiaries would receive a total increase based on 14 months of inflation, from January 1981 to March 1982. Future automatic increases, after 1982, would be based on the CPI change in the March through May period each year, and would be paid in October of each year.

H.R. 3982—AS INTRODUCED

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981".

TRANSITION TO COST-OF-LIVING INCREASES ON A FISCAL YEAR BASIS

SEC. 15206. (a) Section 215(i) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "base quarter" and "cost-of-living computation quarter" each place they appear and in-serting in lieu thereof "base period" and "cost-of-living computation period", respectively.

(b)(1) Section 215(i)(1)(A) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(A) the term 'base period' means (i) the three-month period ending on May 31 in each year after 1981, or (ii) any other three-month period ending on the last day of August, November, or February, in which occurs the effective month of a general benefit increase under this title;".

(2) Section 215(i)(1)(B)(ii) of such Act is amended by striking out "most recent calendar quarter" and inserting in lieu thereof "most recent three-month period specified in subparagraph (A)(ii)".

(3) Section 215(i)(1)(C) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(C) the Consumer Price Index for a base period, a cost-of-living computation period, or any other three-month period shall be the arithmetical mean of such index for the three months in such period.".

(c)(1) Section 215(i)(2)(A)(ii) of such Act is amended—

(A) in the matter preceding subdivision (I), by striking out "effective with the month of June" and inserting in lieu thereof "effective with the month of September"; and

(B) in the second sentence, by striking out "calendar quarter" and inserting in lieu thereof "three-month period".

(2) Section 215(i)(2)(A)(iii) of such Act is amended by striking out "months after May" and inserting in lieu thereof "months after August".

(3) Section 215(i)(2)(B) of such Act is amended by striking out "after May" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "months after August".

(4) Section 215(i)(2)(C)(ii) of such Act is amended—

(A) by inserting "beginning" immediately before "in a calendar year"; and

(B) by striking out "such quarter" and inserting in lieu thereof "such period".

(5) Section 215(i)(2)(D) of such Act is amended—

(A) By inserting "beginning" immediately before "in a calendar year"; and

(B) by striking out "such quarter" and inserting in lieu thereof "such period".

(d)(1) The amendments made by the preceding provisions of this section shall apply with respect to increases in benefits under section 215(i) of the Social Security Act after 1982.

(2) The amendments made by such provisions shall also apply with respect to the increase in benefits under such section 215(i) in 1982; except that the "base period" in 1981 for purposes of computing such increase shall be the "base quarter" in such year determined without regard to such amendments.

(3) Section 215(i)(4) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(A) by striking out "This subsection" and inserting in lieu thereof "(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), this subsection"; and

(B) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(B) Under regulations of the Secretary, in applying this subsection as in effect in December 1978 pursuant to subparagraph (A), the amendments to paragraphs (1) and (2) made by section 206 of the Social Security Spending Reduction Amendments of 1981 shall apply to this subsection as then in effect with respect to benefit increases thereunder as provided in paragraphs (1) and (2) of subsection (d) of such section 206.".

(e)(1)(A) The Secretary of Health and Human Services (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as the "Secretary") shall, in accordance with the provisions of this subsection, increase each monthly benefit payable under title II of the Social Security Act by the amount specified in paragraph (2)(A) of this subsection. Any amount so increased that is not a multiple of $0.10 shall be decreased to the next lower multiple of $0.10. Any increase under this subsection shall be applied before the application of section 215(g) of the Social Security Act (as amended by section 104(a) of this Act).

(B) The provisions of this subsection (and the increase in benefits made hereunder) shall be effective only for months after May 1982 and prior to September 1982.

(2) The increase in social security benefits authorized under this subsection shall be provided, and any determinations by the Secretary in connection with the provision of such increase in benefits shall be made, in the manner prescribed in section 215(i) of the Social Security Act, without regard to the amendments made by this section, for the implementation of cost-of-living increases authorized under title II of such Act, except that—

(A) the amount of such increase, expressed as a percentage increase, shall be equal to one-half the amount of the percentage increase which would, but for this subparagraph, be applied under the preceding provisions of this paragraph to the primary insurance amounts and amounts of total monthly benefits described in section 215(i)(2)(A)(ii) of such Act;

(B) in the case of any individual entitled to monthly insurance benefits payable pursuant to section 202(e) of such Act for May 1982 (without the application of section 202(j)(1) or 223(b) of such Act), including such benefits based on a primary insurance amount determined under section 215(a)(1)(C)(i)(II) of such Act, such increase shall be determined without regard to paragraph (2)(B) of such section 202(e); and

(C) in the case of any individual entitled to monthly insurance benefits payable pursuant to section 202(f) of such Act for May 1982 (without the application of section 202(j)(1) or 223(b) of such Act), including such benefits based on a primary insurance amount determined under section 215(a)(1)(C)(i)(II) of such Act, such increase shall be determined without regard to paragraph (3)(B) of such section 202(f).

(3) The increase in social security benefits provided by this subsection—

(A) shall not be considered to be an increase in benefits made under or pursuant to section 215(i) of the Social Security Act, and

(B) shall not (except for purposes of section 203(a)(3)(B)(iii) of such Act) be considered to be a "general benefit increase under this title" (as such term is defined in section 215(i)(3) of such Act); and nothing in this subsection shall be construed as authorizing any increase in the "contribution and benefit base" (as such term is used in section 230 of such Act), or any increase in the "exempt amount" (as such term is used in section 203(f)(8) of such Act).

(4) Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to authorize (directly or indirectly) any increase in monthly benefits under title II of the Social Security Act for any month after August 1982, or any increase in lump-sum death payments payable under such title in the case of deaths occurring after August 1982. The recognition of the existence of the increase in benefits authorized by the preceding provisions of this subsection (during the period it was in effect) in the application, after August 1982, of the provisions of sections 202(q) and 203(a) of such Act shall not, for purposes of the preceding sentence, be considered to be an increase in a monthly benefit for a month after August 1982.

(5) In the case of an individual to whom monthly benefits are payable under title II of the Social Security Act for May 1982 (without the application of section 202(j)(1) or 223(b) of such Act), and to whom section 202(m) of such Act is applicable for such month, such section shall continue to be applicable to such benefits for the months of June through August 1982 for which such individual remains the only individual entitled to a monthly benefit on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of the deceased insured individual.

HONORING WACIL McNAIR, EDITOR OF THE SNYDER DAILY NEWS

HON. CHARLES W. STENHOLM

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the three things that add the most to the quality of life in a small town are its schools, its churches, and its newspaper. Few towns the size of Snyder, Tex., can boast of better schools, better churches, or a better daily newspaper.

If any one single individual can be credited with the success of the Snyder Daily News, it would surely be Wacil McNair, editor for over 30 years.

On July 30, 1982, McNair will be recognized for his many contributions to the entire community of Snyder. I would like to join his many friends in expressing my thanks and congratulations for his many years of service.

After graduating from Hardin-Simmons University in 1942, McNair began his newspaper career in his hometown, working for the Gilmer Mirror, followed by a brief period of work with the Big Spring Herald. Work at Big Spring was interrupted for 2 years during World War II, in which McNair served in the Coast Guard.

When McNair went to the Snyder Daily News, it was to become the eventual place of his retirement more than 30 years later. The leadership that he displayed in the position as editor of the paper will be remembered for many years to come. As a past president of the Snyder Chamber of Commerce and an active member of the United Way, Kiwanis, and numerous other civic activities, McNair extended his service to the community through various other positions as well.

It is my personal honor to be able to call the attention of this body to such a commendable history of personal service as shown by Wacil and his wife of 39 years, Margie. The McNairs have more than earned the respect and admiration they will be receiving in Snyder on July 30, and I add my hearty congratulations in this special tribute.●

IS THE UNITED STATES UNWITTINGLY SUPPLYING THE PLO WITH ARMS?

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to my colleagues' attention a very serious allegation: that the Saudis have supplied the PLO with arms bought from and manufactured in the United States. If this is true, it violates the provisions of the Arms Export Control Act, and has serious implications for stability in the Mideast and for our relationship with the Saudis.

The Israelis have found evidence in PLO camps they have captured that American M-16 rifles are going to the PLO via Saudi Aradia. The Israelis have also found transcripts of PLO meetings during which a Saudi representative allegedly promised to meet the PLO's arms needs. It is well known that the Saudis provide financial support to the PLO. But to learn that they are supplying U.S. arms is shocking. Our arms agreements, under the Arms Export Control Act, prohibit this. Such exchanges violate every notion of good sense and stability. U.S. arms in PLO hands are an appalling thought.

I have written to President Reagan urging that this highly disturbing allegation be fully investigated. This allegation raises new concerns about the indiscriminate arms sales policies this administration is pursuing, and about our relationship with the Saudis in the aftermath of approval of the sale of AWACS. I would ask that my letter be printed in the RECORD at this point so that my colleagues are aware that the United States may be unwittingly supplying the PLO. Thank you.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 21, 1982.

Hon. RONALD REAGAN,
President, The White House, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The events in Lebanon and elsewhere in the Midwest have obscured a small but significant and dangerous finding: that arms produced in the United States are finding their way to the Palestine Liberation Organization and perhaps to other terrorist groups.

The presence of U.S. arms in the PLO camps in Lebanon has been documented by the Israelis who captured PLO stores. Some of these weapons and ammunition apparently were sold by the United States to Saudi Arabia. The Israelis also have produced transcripts of a PLO leadership meeting during which a Saudi representative allegedly promised to meet the PLO's arms needs.

There have been numerous reports in the past of close cooperation between the PLO and other terrorists groups. Thus the United States may unwittingly and tragically be an arms supplier to terrorists worldwide.

T" 's is despite the fact that the United States has attempted to prevent unauthorized possession of its arms. The Arms Export Control Act prohibits the transfer of U.S. arms to a third party without the permission of the President.

The weapons sold to the Saudis and found in the PLO camps suggest that Saudis may have violated the Act. Given the danger that terrorist groups create for all nations, I recommend that the Administration suspend all arms shipments to Saudi Arabia until a full investigation is made of the movement of the U.S. weapons and ammunition supplied to that country.

I would also recommend greater restraint by the United States in the sale of arms to any nations sympathetic to terrorists groups and a clear warning that any nation guilty of arming terrorists will suffer a complete cutoff of American military supplies.

Failure to restrain the improper third-party use of U.S. arms can result in America's arms being aimed at its own allies, other innocent people and perhaps our own citizens.

Sincerely,

BILL GREEN,
Member of Congress.●

THE CLINCH RIVER PROJECT

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, our colleague from Pennsylvania, the Honorable LARRY COUGHLIN, has been speaking out against the Clinch River project since 1971. We owe him a debt of thanks for his persistence and dedication in defending the interests of the American taxpayer against those of the narrow corporate interest groups that have profited from this boondoggle.

In the past year, an accumulation of new evidence has dramatically underscored what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been telling the Congress for the past 10 years: that the Clinch River project is one of the most economically unsound investments the Federal Government has ever undertaken. In June of 1981, the Department of Energy's Los Alamos Laboratory pointed out that uranium would have to be $165 a pound—about eight times its present cost—in order for breeder reactors to begin to compete with light water reactor technology already on the market. In December of last year, DOE projected that uranium prices in the year 2020—the last year for which DOE has estimates—would be about $88 a pound. In other words, in 40 years we will be just halfway to the point where breeder reactors can even begin to attract commercial interest.

This spring, the Department of Energy's own blue-ribbon Energy Research Advisory Board recommended postponement of construction of the Clinch River project. Finally, in March of this year, the General Accounting Office—once a staunch supporter of the CRBR project—began a series of reports documenting the incredible cost overruns that have plagued the purchase of steam generators for the plant. Last week, the GAO issued a comprehensive blue book report pointing out that the timetable for commercialization of the breeder had slipped far beyond DOE's original expectations.

The controversy surrounding the Clinch River project has attracted attention from the national media, which has rightly noted that the debate over the future of what has become a symbol of pork-barrel politics will test whether the Congress can reject the pleas of corporate lobbyists and stand up for the public's interest. I would like to call particular attention to an editorial featured in the Philadelphia Inquirer last month, which appropriately recognizes the leadership that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has displayed on this important issue. I feel confident that this year the Congress will vindicate our colleague from Pennsylvania and the taxpayers he has worked so hard to represent by voting to terminate the Clinch River breeder reactor. The editorial follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, June 24, 1982]

ROLL CALL ON CLINCH RIVER

In a letter sent to President Reagan last week, 91 members of the House—Republicans and Democrats—argued forcefully for an end to federal funding for the Clinch River Breeder Reactor. "This project alone threatens to drain $2.5 billion from our limited energy research budget over the next several years," they wrote.

Uranium reserves have almost doubled in the decade since Clinch River's inception and nuclear generating requirements have been cut to one-sixth of original projections for the year 2000, according to the letter, producing a glut of uranium. Clinch River was designed to demonstrate fast-breeder technology, which produces enriched uranium for commercial nuclear power plants.

The letter cited a study by the Los Alamos National Laboratory that estimated the price of uranium would have to rise to $165 a pound before breeder reactors would become economical replacements for the standard light-water reactors now in general use in the United States. They also noted:

"The study points out that keeping construction costs under control will be the key to the economic survival of nuclear power. The Los Alamos report also found that fuel costs, which breeder technology is intended to alleviate, are a relatively unimportant component of the cost of nuclear-generated electricity.

"In today's budget climate we are unable to support the expenditure of an additional $2.5 billion to finance the demonstration of a specific technology without convincing evidence that such an investment is a matter of compelling national interest . . . We find no compelling reason to proceed with the construction of the Clinch River Breeder Reactor at this time. We therefore support the deauthorization of this project."

The battle in the Congress to deauthorize funding of Clinch River—on which $1.1 billion already has been spent although no ground has been broken—has been waged for years. Opponents of the project hope this year to garner enough bipartisan support to defeat the project if a vote comes to the House floor. Efforts to that end last year, vigorously led by Rep. Lawrence Coughlin (R., Pa.), failed by a 206-186 vote.

Any member of Congress concerned about making necessary economies in federal spending would be extremely hard-pressed to defend a multibillion-dollar expenditure of tax revenues on a project as superfluous as the Clinch River Breeder Reactor. That Clinch River survives as a drain on the Treasury today is solely a testament to politics. The project is a favorite of Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker, from Tennessee, where it is sited. Pork barrel cannot be tolerated, particularly in today's economy.

A number of names are missing from the list of 91 representatives calling for de-authorization of Clinch River, including the following members from the Philadelphia area: from Pennsylvania, Joseph Smith, Charles F. Dougherty, James K. Coyne and Richard T. Schulze, and from New Jersey, James J. Florio, William J. Hughes and Edwin B. Forsythe. All House seats are up for election this year.●

COMMISSION ON INTERNATIONAL VISITORS

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, I am very much aware that the greatest contributions to international peace and understanding often derive from the efforts of individuals rather than governments. In Springfield, Ill., we are privileged to have a group of dedicated individuals, led by Mrs. Clascenna Hinton Harvey, who comprise the Springfield Commission on International Visitors. President Reagan has rightly paid tribute to the commission in a recent letter to Mrs. Harvey which follows below.

Volunteers from the Springfield Commission welcome visitors of all nationalities to our city, take them into their homes, and befriend them. The lasting impression of the United States and the American people carried away by foreign visitors are in large part the result of efforts of people like Mrs. Harvey and the other Springfield volunteers who care deeply about people and who want to promote international peace and understanding. And the entire community has benefited by the greater knowledge of the world beyond our own frontiers which we gain through these visits of foreign nationals.

We of Springfield can be proud that we have much to share with visitors from every corner of the world: our wonderful city, our Lincoln monuments, and most of all, our concerned and involved citizens such as the volunteers at the Commission on International Visitors.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 1, 1982.

DEAR MRS. HARVEY: For some time I have been aware of the role played by the National Council for International Visitors (NCIV) and its affiliates in furthering United States foreign policy objectives. As a member of NCIV, your organization has helped to strengthen America's relations with other countries. NCIV volunteers across the country have enabled thousands of important international visitors to return to their homelands with a better understanding of the United States and its people. Through their association with NCIV, our foreign guests have learned about the role of volunteers in America and their contribution to the inherent strength of this nation.

The assistance your organization provides to Government-sponsored exchange programs, including the International Communication Agency's International Visitor Program, contributes significantly to the successful partnership between the private and public sectors which this Administration heartily endorses and encourages. I commend your members, staff and community sponsors for their commitment to improved international understanding and cooperation.

You have my thanks and best wishes for the future.

Sincerely,

Ronald Reagan.●

A TRIBUTE TO NIELS ANDERSEN

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to honor a man of great talent who is admired very much by his community. This man is Niels Andersen, secretary of the Dalton Republican Committee of Dalton, Mass., a town located in the heart of the beautiful Berkshire Hills. My pleasure is tinged with sadness, however, since Niels is moving to Michigan at the end of this month.

For many years Niels was the hard-working editor of the Dalton-Hinsdale News-Record, a respected weekly newspaper in my district. As secretary of the Dalton Republican Committee, Niels is responsible for the "Dalton Plan for Social Security Reform," an innovative proposal to solve the problems of the social security system. The "Dalton Plan" is now receiving serious study form the National Commission on Social Security Reform.

I commend Niels for his public-spirited devotion to solving the problems of our society. I wish him all the best in his new position as Dean of Outreach at Jordan College in Cedar Springs, Mich. I am sure that Niels will be as much of an asset to the Wolverine State as he has been to my beloved Bay State, and while I am sorry to see him leave the first district, I am confident that he will continue his good work for this country. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

RESOLUTION OPPOSING EPA RELAXATION OF LEAD STANDARDS

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution addressing a serious danger threatening our Nation's public health. On February 22, 1982, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency proposed a rule to change the amount of lead additives that many be put in motor gasoline. Contradicting the testimony of many American scientists, including the National Academy of Sciences, the EPA has proposed relaxing a regulation that serves as a major defense against the dangers of childhood lead poisoning.

When Congress passed the Clean Air Act in 1970, it authorized the EPA to control or prohibit the sale of motor vehicle fuels or fuel additives if their emission products would endanger the public health. In accordance with section 211 of this law, the EPA in November of 1973 promulgated a rule that decreased the amount of lead antiknocks allowed in motor fuel through a 5-year phased reduction program which began in 1975. This rule was issued after extensive studies of the health effects of lead.

The EPA based its 1973 decision on the weight of scientific evidence proving lead to be a poisonous substance capable of causing brain damage and mental retardation. The Agency concluded that the combustion of gasoline contributed the largest fraction of lead reaching the environment, accounting for at least 90 percent of all airborne lead. In addition, it discovered that lead from gasoline may be ingested in breathing and through the ingestion of dust and dirt in urban areas.

The lead reduction program has been a major success. Since 1976, the amount of lead being added to the environment from gasoline dropped from 190,000 tons to 90,000 tons in 1980, according to the National Center for Health Statistics. The Center for Disease Control (CDD) has reported that this decrease has resulted in a 36.7 percent reduction in the overall mean blood-lead level of the U.S. population.

The studies by the CDC point to a close relationship between the amount of lead in gasoline and the concentration of lead in our bodies. Consequently, it would be a grave mistake to thwart the progress we have made in fighting lead poisoning in the United States by increasing the lead content of gasoline.

New evidence released since the EPA's initial ruling has concluded that the level of lead in human blood that may be considered "safe" is lower than originally thought. In addition, it is established that children are the most endangered segment of the population to high levels of lead in their blood. A report by the National Center for Health Statistics has concluded that 4 percent of all children between the ages of 6 months and 5 years suffer from elevated blood-lead levels, 12.2 percent of all black children have high levels of lead in their systems, and over 18 percent of black children from low-income families have dangerous levels of lead in their blood.

According to Ben Ewing, Chairman of the National Academy of Science's Committee on Lead in the Human Environment, which recently released its major report, "Lead in the Human Environment," we no longer have a sufficient margin of safety to merit the introduction of more lead into the environment. In fact, many other scientists believe there is no safe level of lead for humans.

Mr. Speaker, can we justify increasing the significant hazard to our children's health that would result from a change in the lead standards?

My distinguished colleague from Connecticut (Mr. MOFFETT) has held oversight hearings on EPA's handling of this rulemaking procedure. He has brought forth victims of lead poisoning and their families to testify before his subcommittee on the pain and hardships they have suffered. Can any one of us state a willingness to increase the risk that our own children may never, because of lead emissions, achieve all he or she may be intellectually capable of attaining?

The EPA's proposal would continue an exemption granted small refiners—those whose capacity does not exceed 50,000 barrels per day crude oil or bona fide feedstock—in 1979 in response to the oil shortage of that period. EPA is also considering whether general relaxation or rescission of the 0.5 gram per gallon lead standard, currently being followed by large refiners, is warranted, and is questioning whether small refineries should be allowed a different standard than the large oil refineries.

These proposed changes have been offered in response to the administration's strong interest in easing the impact of regulations on American industries. The lead standard was cited at the beginning of President Reagan's term as a target for the Presidential task force on regulatory reform, headed by the Vice President.

Who exactly will benefit from such a regulatory relief? According to the National Petroleum Refiners Association—the NPRA represents small and independent oil refineries who would be affected by this ruling—the independent refiners it represents have been damaged competitively by the EPA's equivocation on this issue. Some small refiners have already invested in expensive equipment to enable them to meet the October 1, 1982 deadline, at which time they were to have come into compliance with the standard. Thus, the ERA's expressed interest in extending the exemption may penalize those refiners who have complied with the rule.

My resolution also calls attention to the availability of alternatives to lead additives marketed today as alcohol fuel octane enhancers. According to a presentation by an energy analyst at the 1982 NPRA Annual Meeting, ethanol has and will continue to play an important role in meeting today's growing demand for high-octane fuels. In fact, he adds that in may cases these fuels can be highly competitive with lead antiknocks, the most inexpensive octane enhancers currently available.

The EPA has continually claimed that increasing the amount of lead in small refiner's gasoline would not affect air quality, claiming that these small refiners serve rural areas with no lead problems. However, the EPA's own Dr. Joel Schwartz has stated in an EPA memorandum that no less than six major U.S. cities are currently served by small refiners: Mobile, San Antonio, Memphis, Indianapolis, and Shreveport. Second, as I have pointed out, many top scientists agree that there may be no safe level of lead in the human body.

While I recognize the role played by lead in our energy industry by boosting octane inexpensively, it makes little sense to increase our dependence on this highly poisonous substance when alternatives exist in the marketplace. It is important to emphasize that many of the Nation's small refiners have not hesitated to comply with the Federal Register regulation. The role of government in insuring our strong energy supplies has a major impact on the shape of the petroleum industry—let us not impose regulations to aid a small portion of this industry to the disadvantage of the responsible parties who have made good-faith efforts to follow the law.

The health of our children should not be endangered to protect the interests of a small group of businesses. Mr. Speaker, I urge the prompt consideration of this resolution, and I hope that my colleagues will offer it their full support. The text of the resolution follows:

H. RES.—

Whereas, lead is a known toxic metal responsible for approximately $1 billion in national health care costs;

Whereas, the National Center for Health statistics has concluded that four percent of all children aged 6 months to 5 years have an elevated blood-lead level indicating the need for therapy;

Whereas, the National Academy of Sciences concludes that the most important elements in lead control strategies include reductions of lead emissions from gasoline combustion; and

Whereas, viable, environmentally benign alternatives to lead anti-knock additives exist and are currently marketed as ethanol and methanol octane enhancers: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Environmental Protection Agency's current requirements respecting the average lead content of gasoline manufactured by refiners (including small refiners) should be retained in their present form and should not be made less stringent.●

SALUTE TO NANCY PERRY-DUARTE

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the House of Representatives to the recent presentation of the Martinez Junior High School PTA Honorary Service Award to Nancy Perry-Duarte.

Nancy has been an active participant in a wide variety of community activities and services on behalf of young people in Contra Costa County. She has worked closely with Camp Fire, 4-H, and Job's Daughters for many years.

She has also been a longstanding member of the PTA, and served as president of the junior high school group for 2 years. At the John Swett Elementary School, she helped to produce the school newspaper, served as the chair of the health fair, was a delegate to the State PTA, and offered valuable leadership in the playground project.

Mr. Speaker, Nancy Perry-Duarte has earned this award by making extraordinary contributions of service to her community, and especially to the children and youth of our county. I am sure that all Members of the Congress join me in congratulating her on this award, and expressing our appreciation to her for her continuing work on behalf of our young people.

NICE NANCY

Perhaps she herself was modestly surprised, but friends and acquaintances of Nancy Perry-Duarte applauded vigorously with knowing pleasure recently when the busy and attractive Martinez resident was announced as recipient of the Martinez Junior High School PTA Honorary Service Award.

Junior High School Principal Pat Gemma, in making the presentation, told of Mrs. Duarte's many accomplishments and recited a lengthy list of services she had performed for youth in our community. In addition to offering leadership in Camp Fire (Nancy served her first group while still in high school), and assistance to 4-Hand Job's Daughters, she has long been active in PTA, serving for two years as president of the Junior High School group, and giving faithful service in many ways before that at John Swett Elementary School.

There she was invaluable in producing the school newsletter, served as chairman of the school Health Fair, was a delegate to the State PTA Convention, and was a prime organizer in the playground project.

She has also served on the Contra Costa Grand Jury.

Alhambra High School student, Nancy Quadros, seemed to sum up the feelings of many when, presenting a bouquet of roses to the honoree, she stated, "She is a very generous lady and is always doing something for someone else, thinking of them first instead of herself."

The Honorary Service Award has become somewhat of a tradition in Nancy's family; both of her parents, Al and Charlene Perry, have also been accorded the honor.●

REPAIR, REPLACE, OR NO LONGER USE

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, Jr.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, in our cities, towns, and byways, it is painfully obvious that much of our public infrastructure—highways, sewers, ports, bridges, water systems—must be repaired, replaced, or no longer used.

The following article, which appeared in the New York Times on July 18, describes the seriousness of the problem:

ALARM RISES OVER DECAY IN U.S. PUBLIC WORKS

(By John Herbers)

In Pittsburgh, the United States Steel Corporation contends that it is paying at least $1 million a year to detour its trucks 26 miles around a major bridge that the state closed two years ago for lack of repair.

In Albuquerque, motorists are up in arms because sewer lines are crumbling under the streets, many of which have become impassable as the city struggles to make piece-by-piece replacements.

In Houston, the magazine Texas Monthly asserted that it had counted 1.5 million potholes in a city that is a center of great wealth.

In New York, broken water mains, subway failures and the deterioration of other facilities above ground and below have become so common that the seemingly mundane subject of "the infrastructure" has become a prominent issue for both the city and state governments.

News of a neglected and decaying infrastructure—public facilities such as water systems, sewers, streets, highways, bridges and rails, which undergird life and commerce in every community—has taken on a new prominence on the national scene at a time when the country is suffering from a recession, high unemployment, decline of much of its basic industry and the reduction of public services by governments at all levels.

The situation is similar to that of a family whose income has been cut, that is behind on the mortgage payments and unable to buy shoes for the children, and then learns that tree roots have plugged the drainage pipes, the furnace must be replaced and termites have weakened the foundation of the house.

In the urban policy report the Administration made public last week, President Reagan said he wanted to do something about the infrastructure problem but had not decided what.

Meanwhile, a bipartisan coalition is growing in Congress to force action by the national Government, partly on the ground that Mr. Reagan's goal of revitalizing American industry cannot be reached until something is done about inadequate public facilities. Many Democrats say that repairing public works would provide jobs for many of the unemployed.

One difficulty is that public works projects have been so fragmented between the various levels of governments that no one knows the extent of the decay, or how much money would be needed for repairs and new construction necessary to support the economy and quality of life at reasonable levels.

Only in the past year or so has the concern of policy makers about the neglect of basic public works grown urgent. Studies by George E. Peterson of the Urban Institute and by Pat Choate and Susan Walter of the Council of State Planning Agencies documented the inadequacy of public facilities, not only in older, fiscally troubled cities such as New York and Boston but in suburban and rural communities in every region of the nation.

Their findings have been confirmed and expanded by a number of Government agencies and by Congressional investigations. These are some of the more serious deficiencies cited:

Obsolete and decaying bridges. The Transportation Department recently classified 45 percent of the nation's 557,516 highway bridges as "deficient or obsolete." Replacement or repair could cost $47.6 billion, the department said.

Crumbling highways. The 42,000-mile interstate system, begun in the 1950's and not yet completed, is deteriorating at a rate that would require reconstruction of 2,000 miles a year, in addition to a backlog of 8,000 miles in need of rebuilding that accumulated because of cuts in financing in recent years. The condition has contributed to costly traffic jams on the expressways of most major urban areas.

Deteriorated rail facilities. The condition of roadbeds and rolling stock of Conrail and other rail systems is so poor that some officials say there are no reliable estimates available on the cost of replacement and repair. But frequent derailments and delays in shipments attest to the need, according to a range of officials.

Leaking water and sewer mains. The Urban Institute, in a survey of 28 cities, found that 10 of them, Cleveland, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Tulsa, Philadelphia, Hartford, Kansas City, Mo., Cincinnati, Buffalo and Baltimore, were losing 10 percent or more of their treated water because of deteriorated pipes. And the survey did not include New York and Boston, with two of the leading all-time water-leaking systems. Probably a larger problem, from the standpoint of waste, is leaky sewers, in which ground water flows into the pipes, adds to the volume of sewage and greatly increases the cost of treatment.

Shortage of capacity of many facilities. A survey conducted by the Economic Development Administration in 1978 showed that half of the nation's communities had wastewater treatment systems operating at full capacity, meaning they could not support new economic or population growth without costly new construction.

The estimates of need tend to become astronomical. Nationally the figures run into the trillions. Last fall, the New York State Legislature estimated that $8 billion to $10 billion a year would be needed in New York State for repairs, replacement and construction of the infrastructure, which would double current expenditures.

A more precise expression of need was published by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, which said that New York City alone over the next few years would have to service, repair or replace 1,000 bridges, two aqueducts, one large water tunnel, several reservoirs, 6,200 miles of streets, 6,000 miles of sewers, 6,000 miles of water lines, 6,700 subway cars, 4,500 buses, 25,000 acres of parks, 17 hospitals, 19 city university campuses, 950 schools, 200 libraries and several hundred fire houses and police stations.

The causes of neglect and decay are more easily documented than the extent of need. Mr. Choate, an economist and a former Federal official who is now the senior analyst for a giant corporation, said in a paper prepared for the House Wednesday Group, made up of moderate Republican representatives, that investments in capital projects had declined sharply.

"The nation's public capital investments fell from $33.7 billion in 1965 to less than $24 billion in 1980, a 30 percent decline," he wrote. "Public works investments dropped from $174 per person in 1965 to less than $110 per person in 1980, a 36 percent decline, and shrank from 3.6 percent of the gross national product in 1965 to less than 1.7 percent in 1980, a 54 percent decline."

In the 1960's and 70's, public works projects frequently were delayed so that the Government could finance such endeavors as the Vietnam War, social programs, education and space exploration. Nevertheless, the Federal Government assumed a much larger share of public works costs, which previously had been borne by state and local governments. In 1957, the Federal Government paid 10 percent of the costs. By 1980 its share had risen to 40 percent.

RESPONSIBILITY FRAGMENTED

The responsibility for maintaining public facilities, Mr. Choate pointed out, was fragmented between 100 Federal agencies, 50 state governments, 3,042 countries, 35,000 general-purpose governments, 15,000 school districts, 26,000 special districts, 2,000 area-wide units of government, 2,000 interstate compacts and nine multistate regional development organizations.

But the Federal Government, the dominant player, never achieved any rational method for allocating the funds. Mr. Choate said Federal laws favored new construction over repairing of existing facilities.

Public works money, which often has been handed out for purposes of politics rather than need, became increasingly subject to waste and fraud, according to Mr. Choate and others. In 1980 alone, 219 state and local public officials were convicted of criminal abuse of public funds, a figure three times greater than the 1970 level.

At the same time environmental requirements enacted in the 1970's increased the need for higher expenditures for public works.

Many authorities say they believe, however, that the greatest cause for inadequacy of public facilities lies in the spread of the population and industry out of the central city to suburbs and remote communities around the nation.

Retired people moved in large groups into new communities, many in rural recreational areas; factories settled along the freeways and new urban development sprang up near them; state governments spread their colleges over once remote areas; people migrated from the old industrial cities to the South and West, where urban and rural sprawl was greatest; after the 1980 census the Federal Government designated 36 former small towns as metropolitan areas. All this new development required enormous amounts of capital investment for streets, curbs, water and sewer facilities, airports and other facilities.

DEMAND IN CITIES REMAINED

But the new growth did not lessen the demand in the thinned-out central cities. The infrastructures in old cities, which suffered heavy population losses, serve many vacant lots, half-empty buildings and closed factories and warehouses. But the facilities must usually be maintained as though they were being used at capacity.

At a recent conference on land use sponsored by the Engineering Foundation in Rindge, N.H., Philip Finkelstein of the Center for Local Tax Research in New York pointed out that when the city government suggested that it could no longer afford to maintain basic facilities in the South Bronx, where many buildings had been abandoned, there was a storm of protest and the suggestion was dropped.

"I don't think there is any way to do that with any degree of acceptability," he said, in reference to a suggestion that there be a contraction of public facilities in the cities.

Americans in 1982 are separated as never before by great stretches of pavement, communication and electric lines and water and sewer pipes. Many authorities are questioning whether the nation can any longer afford to maintain what it already has built and continue to provide for new communities.

LAND USE AT THE HEART

Harry E. Pollard, president of the Henry George School of Social Science of Los Angeles, said the way it is now, "A bus driver in order to collect one acre of people has to drive five acres to find them. And he has to drive past five miles of sewer pipe instead of one. It is a land-use problem. If you have to finance five miles for every one you will forever be in financial trouble."

According to a number of authorities, no national administration has succeeded in bringing order to the chaos of public works spending. The Carter Administration, they said, was beginning to coordinate Federal spending so that priorities could be established.

The Reagan Administration, according to those officials, abandoned the coordination but to some extent has stopped the use of Federal funds for capital projects in new areas. For example, it refused to finance water treatment plants in new communities around Orlando, Fla. The rationale was that if people there wanted new communities they could finance them themselves.

FUTURE OF FEDERAL ROLE

Yet even high White House officials acknowledged that the Reagan Administration had no comprehensive policy on public works, except that it intends to drastically reduce the Federal role. Richard S. Williamson, assistant to the President for intergovernmental relations, said Mr. Reagan wanted to help the cities with their infrastructure problems, and he ordered that this concern be put in the Administration's urban policy report that went to Congress.

The report, however, sought to show that the picture was not so bleak as had been depicted. It pointed out that demand had lessened for schools and new highways and said many cities were moving on their own to step up capital projects. And it pointed to local innovations. New York, for example, had switched emphasis from new buildings to repairing streets, bridges, mass transit, water and sewage systems. Other cities, such as Boston, were putting the authority for public works in the hands of independent commissions for greater efficiency, while others, such as Cleveland, were enlisting private interests for help.

The Federal Government's role, the report said, was to gather information about more cost-effective methods of financing public works while "other aspects of Federal aid remain to be determined."

Meanwhile, members of Congress have stepped into the void. Some have been spurred by such reports as bridges being closed for long periods in Kansas City, Mo., while motorists drive blocks out of their way and school children in Altoona, Pa., having to leave their bus, walk across a bridge and wait for the empty bus to follow because the bridge can no longer support the weight of both children and bus.

PROPOSAL BY HOUSE MEMBERS

Two Pennsylvania Representatives, William S. Clinger Jr., a Republican, and Robert W. Edgar, a Democrat, have been pushing legislation for a capital budget that would require the Administration to take an inventory of capital needs and assign priorities for spending on public works, as a first step toward long-term recovery.

They were joined in their effort by such diverse leaders as Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. and Representative Jack Kemp, the conservative Republican from Buffalo, who were among a number of Congressmen signing a letter to Mr. Reagan asking him to consider the idea. A similar bill has been introduced in the Senate by Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut.

Meanwhile a number of Democrats around the country have taken up the issue on grounds that rebuilding the nation's capital plant would fight unemployment.

In New York, Assembly Speaker Stanley Fink has made repairing of the infrastructure one of his major concerns and Governor Carey, in the recent legislative session, proposed increases in taxes and fees to help pay the costs. The tax legislation, however, was defeated, in part because it was an election year. Officials on the national and state levels predict the issue will become more heated in the years ahead.

In response to questions about how the nation could let basic facilities decay to the extent that many authorities say they have, Maury Seldin, president of the Homer Hoyt Institute, a nonprofit foundation in land economics, and a professor at American University, said, "We as a nation are accustomed to living on uppers and downers."

He said that in recent years the nation had become accustomed to "taking a fix" for whatever bothers it without much thought to the long-range consequences, especially in response to various special interests that can command support for narrow goals, and policy is fragmented.

He called for a maturing of the political processes so that various interests could reach compromises for the overall good and "be willing to settle for a fair shake." ●

COMPLICATED UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS FORMULA

HON. DON BAILEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, another consequence of the legislative changes enacted last year by the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act was felt this week. Maryland triggered off the Federal-State extended unemployment benefits program, thereby denying extended unemployment benefits to many thousands of workers who have exhausted their regular unemployment benefits.

The cause of Maryland's triggering-off was not that unemployment in Maryland is getting better. In fact, Maryland lost its ability to pay extended benefits because it failed to meet the complex formula enacted last year by the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act. In that act, the Federal Government required the States to show a certain ratio of unemployed workers to the State's total work force. That insured unemployment rate must be at least 5 percent, plus 20 percent higher than the average of the same period of the previous 2 years. In addition to this higher threshold, however, the way in which the insured unemployment rate is calculated was also changed.

The calculation now made does not include individuals who have exhausted their extended benefits or are currently receiving extended benefits. By excluding these individuals, the insured unemployment rate is underestimated and, as a consequence, States like Maryland and Michigan triggered-off the extended benefits program. Other States are expected to trigger-off the program between now and the end of the year. This is not speculation, but a certainty since the thresholds will increase to 6 percent at the end of September.

Mr. Speaker, my friend and subcommittee chairman, HAROLD FORD, and I introduced H.R. 6340 last May 11 to restore some realism and accuracy to the term "insured unemployment rate." This bill will restore previous law, whereby the insured unemployment rates was based on the number of individuals applying for both regular and extended benefits. Using this formulation, States will continue on the extended benefits program and not trigger-off, as have Maryland and Michigan, because of the large percentage of individuals who are receiving extended benefits or have exhausted all their benefits.

In the name of fairness and equity, Mr. Speaker, I encourage my colleagues to support this bill and provide continuity of benefits in this time of high unemployment and deep recession. Before we begin consideration of enacting a supplemental unemployment benefits bill, let us make a change in the way by which the insured unemployment rate is calculated so that we can insure that those most in need will be helped.●

GAVEL TO GAVEL: A REAL CONTRIBUTION

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues a booklet delivered to their offices today. It is entitled "Gavel to Gavel: A Guide to the Televised Proceedings of Congress," and it was produced by the Benton Foundation and printed by the Roosevelt Center for American Policy Studies.

Alan Green and Bill Hogan, two Washington journalists who have studied and written about this body, and about communications and the media, have presented our complicated lives in an interesting and clear fashion, so that anyone who watches us on C-SPAN can better understand what goes on here.

I am particularly pleased with the booklet for a number of reasons, not the least of which is that the two sponsoring institutions have their roots in Illinois. The Benton Foundation has grown from the success and interests of the late Senator William Benton, one of our most illustrious public servants in this century. It is an innovative foundation concerned with communications and public policy. Charles Benton, its president, is himself an exceptional public servant who has been Chairman of the National Commission on Library and Information Sciences. Marjorie Benton has been a stalwart leader of many public-spirited efforts, including serving as Chair of the Save the Children Federation and as the U.S. Representative to UNICEF. I commend them and their board members for their concern and effort to make this institution of democracy better understood by the people of America.

The Roosevelt Center is new, the creation of a young and very successful Chicago businessman, Richard Dennis. While Mr. Dennis is himself a Democrat, he has insisted on a bipartisan board of trustees, running the political spectrum from John Culver, our former colleague, and economist Lester Thurow, to Laurence Silberman, former Deputy Attorney General in the Nixon administration and then Ambassador to Yugoslavia.

The center describes itself accurately as "a nonpartisan institution taking its name and inspiration from three Roosevelts—Theodore, Franklin, and Eleanor—who courageously addressed our national future, brought clarity to America's vision of itself, and thereby gave new strength and direction to our people." I know some of the Roosevelt Center's leaders and expect great things from it.

Both of these institutions represent the best of the American tradition of the independent sector working with those of us in public life. I commend to you their booklet, encourage you to make it available to your constituents, and hope that all citizens who watch the House in action on television will ask one of us for a copy of "Gavel to Gavel" so that they will better understand the processes of this body.●

THE FEDERAL EXCISE TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS SHOULD NOT BE INCREASED

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, one of the many revenue-enhancement proposals being discussed in Congress is raising the Federal excise tax (FET) on distilled spirits. Proposals range from indexing the FET to inflation to doubling the tax rate. For sound and equitable public policy reasons, Congress should avoid any temptation to selectively target the distilled spirits industry for any tax increase.

Distilled spirits products already bear the highest tax burden in the Nation. Fully 47 percent of typical retail bottle price goes into Federal, State, and local treasuries. The Federal tax share of the spirits retail price—26 percent—is double the tax share on cigarettes, 5 times that of airline tickets, 8 times that of gasoline, 4 times that of beer, 15 times that of wine. In 1981, the spirits industry paid $6.8 billion in excise and other product taxes to the government, $3.9 billion to the Federal Government alone. The Federal tax alone is equal to taxpayments of nearly $11 million each day by this industry. Clearly, the distilled spirits industry, which pays income taxes and social security taxes in addition to this tax burden, pays more than its fair share already.

Any increase in the FET will preempt a major State revenue source at a time when the States are being asked to assume new responsibilities and financial burdens. While the Federal excise tax on spirits has not been increased since 1951, State tax rates have increased substantially. State revenue per gallon of spirits has risen by 120 percent since 1951. Today the States are relying preponderately on excise taxes on spirits and other products to help eliminate rising budget deficits. So far this year, roughly three-fourths of the States have proposed some kind of spirits tax increase. Any increase in the FET will cost the States excise revenues from reduced sales. Just as important, the States will find it difficult to rely on this tax source for future revenues if preempted by the Federal Government.

Congress will not find its revenue-enhancement goals furthered greatly by selective and punitive taxation of the spirits industry. The Distilled Spirits Council of the United States, representing spirits manufacturers, has estimated that a 100-percent FET increase would lead to spirits price increases up to 50 percent and a consumption drop of 20 to 25 percent. The "shock impact" of such an unprecedented tax increase could lead to even more serious losses for the industry. This in turn means little revenue gain for the Government. The Senate Finance Committee has estimated that a 100-percent FET increase might bring in about $2 to $2.5 billion. The Joint Tax Committee estimated that indexing the FET to inflation might bring in a mere $200 million in fiscal year 1983. Even these figures probably are overestimates, since the Government will suffer lost revenues because of State tax increases that reduce sales, lost income taxes from reduced industry profits and employment, and potential illegal spirits production. Further, if spirits alone is targeted for a tax increase, this could lead to consumers switching to substantially lower taxed beer and wine, further reducing revenue potential. These impacts are not idle industry guesses. An 80-percent tax increase in Australia in 1978 lead to a 40-percent spirits price increase and a 26-percent drop in consumption. Tax increases in the United Kingdom in 1981 led to a marginal revenue increase—0.6 percent—that was one-seventeenth of what the United Kingdom Treasury predicted. Denmark, following a 37-percent tax increase in 1977, saw its revenues actually fall in 1978 and, as of 1981, revenues have not yet reached pre-tax-increase levels. Such unanticipated, adverse revenue effects could occur in the United States.

Singling out the spirits industry for punitive taxation also punishes the thousands of industry workers, suppliers, wholesalers, and retailers located throughout the country in a time of national economic distress. There are an estimated 826,000 full-time jobs in the beverage alcohol industry as a whole, the majority of them small retailers. There are an estimated 398,000 business establishments which would face economic losses, and in some cases bankruptcy, from further taxation of spirits. Even a 5-percent loss in jobs and business means over 40,000 jobs and 20,000 businesses threatened.

Finally, no one should delude himself that by raising the FET we can deal with the problem of alcohol abuse. The alcoholic has an illness that does not respond to economic reason. He needs treatment, not taxation. Those who use alcohol in excess, and do not respond to the legal and social sanctions against misuse, are least susceptible to price changes. It is the roughly 100 million consumers who drink alcohol responsibly, moderately, and legitimately who will be impacted by a tax increase. Further, excise taxes are regressive taxes which hit low- and middle-income families hardest. Spirits are not a "luxury" item consumed only by the rich. Millions of low- and middle-income Americans use spirits responsibly and can ill afford additional regressive taxes.

Past Congresses, in Republican and Democratic administrations, have recognized the inequity of excise taxes and have eliminated excise taxes on many products. No one is asking for the elimination of the excise tax on spirits. A vote against a spirits tax increase is not giving the industry a special tax break, it is simply recognition that the industry and its consumers already pay more than their fair share in taxes.●

LATEST GAO REPORT CALLS CLINCH RIVER PROJECT AN IMPORTANT AND NECESSARY DEVELOPMENT STEP

HON. ROBERT A. YOUNG

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Science and Technology Committee, I have been deeply involved with the demonstration and development of the liquid metal fast breeder reactor (LMFBR). Recently GAO delivered a report upon the request by Chairwoman BOUQUARD of the Energy Research and Production Subcommittee regarding the LMFBR. This report reassesses the GAO previous determinations regarding the viability and necessity of the Clinch River breeder reactor project. I would like to place in the RECORD at this time the chairwoman's remarks.

REMARKS OF CHAIRWOMAN BOUQUARD

Marilyn L. Bouquard, Chairwoman of the Subcommittee on Energy Research and Production in the House, received a GAO report today entitled "The Liquid Metal Fast Breeder Reactor—Options for Deciding Future Pace and Direction." Mrs. Bouquard requested the GAO study in November, 1981 in order to obtain a reassessment of the GAO previous determinations regarding the viability and necessity of the Clinch River Breeder Reactor Project (CRBRP). This project represents the principal demonstration plant focus with the U.S. Liquid Metal Fast Breeder Reactor (LMFBR) research and development program.

The GAO examined its previous positions on the Department of Energy's Breeder program and Clinch River project in terms of three questions and concluded that:

"The important fact is that a demonstration plant along the size and scale of the CRBR project is an important research and development step. Once this step is completed the next logical step would be to follow it at some future time by a commercial size breeder reactor such as the proposed large development plant."

The most important question which the GAO asked was "Is the Clinch River project still an important step in developing the breeder option?" On this point, Mrs. Bouquard cited the strong GAO endorsement of the Clinch River project. "As it has in the past, GAO continues to believe that a Clinch River-type demonstration project is a necessary step in developing the breeder option. If the LMFBR is to be developed to the point where industry can use it, an intermediate-sized plant such as the Clinch River project is a logical and prudent step to gain important operational experience on breeder reactor performance, reliability, maintainability, safety, environmental acceptability, licensability, and economic feasibility."

The other two questions with the GAO answers are:

(1) "How long can domestic uranium supplies fuel conventional nuclear reactors? Based on the Department's latest projections on the growth of nuclear power and available domestic uranium supplies, uranium supplies appear adequate to fuel conventional reactors well past the year 2020."

Mrs. Bouquard pointed out "Thus, a commerical deployment decision on the breeder will have to be made well before 2020 and this timing matches the present construction timetable for CRBR with a stretched out schedule for the next breeder (prototype) plan."

(2) "When will breeder reactors be economical? The Department's most recent study shows that a commerical breeder reactor would most likely be economical in the 2025 to 2035 time frame."

On the economics issue, the Subcommittee Chairman noted "Low cost breeder designs require Clinch River as a critical intermediate step to provide plant operating experience for scaling up to larger and more economic systems. In fact, the GAO concludes that breeders should become economical just about the projected initiation date for commercial deployment, i.e., 2025."

The Tennessee Democrat also remarked on the GAO's rejection of the option to terminate the LMFBR program. The report states "In GAO's opinion, the uncertainty inherent in projecting far into the future persuasively argues against the termination option." Mrs. Bouquard concluded with a discussion of the program options of continuation under the DOE's present schedule or the possibilities of restructuring the program and concluded "I believe unless the climate for utility investment is changed dramatically, that the program will be restructured and the logical way to do this is to keep the CRBR project on schedule and defer or stretch out the next step, the Large Developmental Plant (LDP). The GAO has provided a service to the Congress by pointing out the significant risk attendant to other options for restructuring the program. There is clearly no substitute for Clinch River as a focus for the breeder reactor technology program!"●

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

Tuesday, July 20, 1982

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, 11 years ago Ida Nudel, a courageous Jew living in the Soviet Union, sought permission to emigrate to Israel. She had a dream of rejoining her only family, her sister, in a country where she could pursue her faith in freedom. In our country we have been richly blessed with freedoms that we often take for granted, so much so that it is difficult for us to believe that people in other nations are denied such fundamental liberties. We can see how reprehensible it is for the Soviet authorities to continually deny Ida Nudel permission to travel to her spiritual homeland, and as an expression of solidarity with her and with all Jews kept in the Soviet Union against their will, I call upon Americans to persist in their criticism of the repression which has been inflicted on this heroic woman and all who wish to emigrate.

Although the case of Ida Nudel is well known in the United States, and our leaders and citizens have publicly supported her tenacious efforts to obtain an exit visa, our outcry has gone unheeded and Ida remains locked in the Soviet Union against her will. In 1978, she was arrested for publicly expressing her desire to emigrate. Nearly 4 years later, she was released from internal exile in Siberia and upon her return to Russia has discovered that she will not be allowed to live in Moscow, where she was raised, and that she will not be able to attain residence in any city. Since March, Ida Nudel, an educated economist, has been homeless and unemployed and reduced to the indignity of having to roam the countryside in search of food and a bed. Now is the time for us to speak out, before the Soviets succeed in breaking her spirit and extinguishing her hope.

As Americans, we cherish our freedom to worship as we please and our freedom to travel. Ida Nudel, who has selflessly comforted and assisted other Soviet Jews who have attempted to emigrate, desires to know that freedom which is so dear to us. And so I call upon the Members of this body and all Americans to join me in publicly expressing our support for Ida Nudel by urging the Soviet authorities to grant her an exit visa and praying for the long-overdue fulfillment of her dream.●

TRIBUTE TO THE 187TH AIRBORNE REGIMENTAL COMBAT TEAM, THE "RAKKASANS"

HON. WILLIAM HILL BONER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. BONER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the famed 187th Airborne Regimental Combat Team, the "Rakkasans," will be celebrating their first reunion in Nashville this week. My hometown is proud to be the host city for this first-ever reunion of over 500 Rakkasans and their families.

The Rakkasans were selected out of seven available airborne regiments and deployed to Korea in July and August 1950. They served there until the armistice and were the only American airborne troops who fought in Korea.

While in combat, and particularly during the two combat jumps, the paratroopers of the 187th earned the respect of their fellow soldiers and allies and that of the enemy as well.

Originally, part of the 11th Airborne Division during and immediately after World War II, the Rakkasans have fought in World War II, Korea, and the 3d Battalion of the 187th, in Vietnam. The battle credits and streamers on the regimental colors are a testament to the heroism of the airborne soldiers of the U.S. Army.

Though only recently organized, the 187th ARCT Association, "Rakkasans," already number in excess of 700 active members and the membership is growing daily. Dedicated to the preservation of the regimental traditions and to the spirit of American airborne forces, the Rakkasans take their place on the roll of associations that honor the proud regiments of the U.S. Army.

Mr. Speaker, Tennessee, the Volunteer State, and the city of Nashville are proud to be selected by these veterans as the site of their first reunion, and I am proud to be able to record this event for history.●

WOMEN IN COMBAT—HEADING FOR REALITY

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I have been inundated with vituperative nonsense over a period of years now because of my opposition to women in combat, and in fact, in combat support units. With the exception, as I have stated often enough, those noble women of the nursing profession, there should not be women in proximity to the combat environment.

It appears that the military is now looking at the reality of the situation, and not at the political animals, who for reasons only they know, continue to expose the potential of the women of America to get killed in combat.

Now comes a current, and I must say, honest article on this situation from Long Island Newsday, issue of June 20, 1982. The author, who should be commended for his objectivity, is Arnold Abrams. There is contained therein the usual claptrap—for want of better terminology—from the National Organization of Women (NOW), that President Reagan is carrying out a war against women. Would that Judy Goldsmith, spokesperson of that organization, volunteer for the next Ranger training course at Fort Benning, in my home State of Georgia. For my part, just as the saying was true in World War II that, "There are no atheists in the foxholes of Bataan," so, too, with the exception of militant ignoramuses, there should be no women in combat.

Would that my colleagues now seriously consider my bill, H.R. 976, that would remove women from the military academies. I do not object to a separate academy for women, but on examining the objective article of Arnold Abrams, and carrying it right down to elementary basic training, my colleagues will see, objectively, a truism that cannot be denied. The article follows:

ARMY STUDIES LIMIT ON WOMEN'S ROLE

(By Arnold Abrams)

Four years after officially integrating women within its ranks, the U.S. Army is reassessing their military role and their effect upon combat readiness.

The far-reaching review is likely to result in a lower recruitment quota for females and, more important, greater restrictions on the range of duties they will be assigned. Those policy changes are expected to be announced by Oct. 1, the start of the next fiscal year.

Prompting the reassessment, which involves various studies that will go into a "Women in the Army" report due at month's end, were field commanders' concerns about the steadily increasing presence of female troops—who now account for nearly 10 per cent of the 789,000-member service—in combat-connected positions.

Those concerns focus largely, but not exclusively, upon the lack of strength and stamina that the Army says were demonstrated by female soldiers during the past decade, when their numbers climbed from about 17,000 in 1972 to approximately 76,000 at present.

Army figures show that the educational and learning ability of female soldiers generally exceeds that of male soldiers. However, Pentagon authorities believe that females' physical differences, coupled with other problems related to them, could prove significance in combat conditions. Although women are barred from battle units, they are permitted to serve in close support contingents—such as supply, maintenance, medical and signal companies—that operate in combat zones and are an important part of the fighting effort.

The Army reassessment, which also is likely to affect the other services—where about 112,000 women serve with more than 1 million men—is described by military sources as a long-overdue measure designed to produce a more effective fighting machine.

"We've let the number of women in this service grow like Topsy without taking a hard look at potential effects," said a field-grade officer familiar with the review process. "It's not the Army's job to serve as a social agency. However worthy the women's movement, its goals are not part of our primary mission. Our concern should be combat readiness, period."

Feminists, however, regard the review—and its likely results—as an assault upon their cause. "It is outrageous," said Judy Goldsmith, vice president of the National Organization of Women. "It is another example of the Reagan administration's war on women. It is a direct slap in the face to women already in service and to those contemplating a military career."

Also expressing unease over the review was Maj. Gen. Mary Clarke, who was the Army's top-ranking female before retiring recently after 36 years' service. "The duty performance of the average woman soldier is a solid, quality performance—too good ever to return to an all-male force, or a force with only a few token women," she asserted in an open letter to army women.

"The bottom line for the Army is the mission," Clarke's letter continued. "Do women really contribute to mission readiness? Anyone who asks that question seriously man or woman, needs to question his or her assumptions and prejudices, and instead face facts. It is the quality of women's service which gives an affirmative answer to the readiness question."

According to knowledgeable military sources, problems concerning female soldiers were brought to the attention of Gen. Edward C. Meyer, the Army chief of staff, during the past year. Meyer's informants were described as "officers who felt secure enough to level with the boss about politically sensitive issues."

Those officers, sources said, also cited specific problems with females and statistics to support their views. The problems included:

Pregnancy. As many as 10 percent of female soldiers are pregnant at any given time.

Attrition. About 45 percent of females do not reenlist, compared with 32 percent for males.

Logistics. That includes the need for separate sleeping quarters, toilet facilities and clothing patterns.

Meyer reportedly was told that the cumulative effect of such problems, coupled with the questions of strength, has reduced combat readiness.

The Army's initial response was to order a recruiting "pause" to hold the number of women in enlisted and officer ranks at about 75,000. That decision, made last year, represented a retreat from President Jimmy Carter's policy, which called for 87,500 women in an expanded Army by 1985.

Although Army officials discount any direct connection, that pause came as the all-volunteeer force started to overcome serious recruiting problems—problems that were partly alleviated in recent years by increased intake of women.

At present, the combination of high unemployment, continuing recession and improved military pay has allowed recruiters to fulfill their quotas while complying with Army educational standards. It also has reduced their reliance upon female volunteers.

Another Army action, formally announced last month but actually implemented at various bases in January, was to eliminate coeducational companies in basic training. Those units were made all-male and all-female, according to a military spokesman, to "facilitate the Army's toughening goals and enhance the soldierization process."

Drill sergeants and training company commanders offer a simpler explanation for that policy change. It is their opinion that significant capability differences between male and female soldiers undermine a training unit's performance.

"Everyone familiar with basic training knows that a mixed unit invariably presents problems," said Capt. Vandon Jenerette, commander of an all-female basic training company at New Jersey's Ft. Dix. "The girls' lack of physical ability holds the guys back and forces trainers to compromise on standards—it's as simple as that."

Jenerette made that point recently as his company was learning to handle live ammunition on Ft. Dix's firing range. Surrounding him was a group of not-so-sharp-shooting recruits describing their difficulties.

"I couldn't help it, sir," said one trainee. "I was so scared, my heart was beating like mad, and my hands wouldn't hold still. And every time I fired, the gun jumped and my eyes closed."

Jenerette, a 15-year veteran at age 33, flinched slightly but kept his voice soft and smile steady. "Well, if you're going to act scared, better do it with your eyes open," he replied. "Watching what you're shooting at will give you a better chance of hitting it."

Afterward, the company commander reflected upon that conversation. "If she had been a guy," he said, "I would have responded differently. I would have stated, in no uncertain terms, that when firing, you don't close your eyes and you keep your goddamn hands steady. But you can't talk that way to girls. They start crying, and you don't get anywhere.

Agreeing with Jenerette was Sgt. Michelle Cork, a female drill instructor who has handled all-female and all-male training companies and now works with a male unit in Ft. Dix.

"I'd prefer a male company any time," said Cork, 34, an eight-year veteran. "Females have too many personal problems and too many physical weaknesses. Their tendency to get weepy doesn't help any, either."

A third major Army measure, initiated earlier this year in response to female-related problems, was to establish separate physicial standards—which will be announced soon—for each of the Army's 350 military occupation specialties.

Although equally applicable to males and females, those standards—which would be distinctly higher for combat zone duties—are expected to have an appreciably greater screening effect upon women.

"People might think, for example, that physical strength has little to do with a medic's duties," said Lawrence J. Korb, assistant secretary of defense for manpower. "But what happens if the body of a big soldier has to be removed quickly from a combat area, and a female medic simply is not strong enough? That would create serious problems—which, by establishing strict physical criteria, is what we want to avoid."

Korb, who will review all suggested policy changes and then send his own recommendations to Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger, denied any link between the reassessment process and the Reagan administration's attitude toward feminist causes.

"No government decision is free of political ramifications," said the 42-year-old Pentagon official, who previously worked at the American Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank, and on the Reagan administration's transition team. "But no pressure has been put on me by the White House or the secretary of defense. I am concerned with personnel and readiness, and my recommendations will reflect that responsibility."●

CAUTION NEEDED ON OVERSEAS MILITARY COMMITMENT

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, the excellent magazine, "World Press Review," which reprints articles and comments from newspapers and magazines around the world, has an article in a recent edition by Christian d'Epenoux which appeared in the newsmagazine "L'Express" of Paris.

It is about the Sudan.

It talks abut the President Gaafar Nimeiri and the country of Sudan, the largest country geographically in all of Africa.

President Nimeiri has shown courageous leadership and has been a good friend of the United States and stability in the Middle East.

But in the article there is one sentence that our policymakers ought to be aware of, and somehow or not, it says: "But a highly visible American presence, with its military assistance mission and large contingent of oilmen, could play into the hands of the opposition."

It was not too long ago when the Sudan, along with Egypt, was considered to be in the Soviet orbit.

President Nimeiri is not a puppet of the United States nor of any other country, but is fiercely independent and we want him and the Sudan to stay that way.

But those who want to put American troops or American Embassy personnel too visibly around the world do a disservice to these countries. Uncle Sam is not uniformly admired and respected.

We simply need to look to Libya and her current difficulties and remind ourselves that a formerly friendly regime in Libya was toppled, many people believe, because of the presence of an American military base in that country.

Let us do what we can to give help to stabilize the Middle East. But let us do it in a low-key way.

STRAINS IN THE SUDAN: A WESTERN ALLY'S TRAVAILS

(By Christian d'Epenoux)

The saying, "patient as a Sudanese," is appropriate: Any other country in a similar condition would long since have exploded, but not the Sudan. This immense, parched land of 500 tribes—seventeenth among the world's poorest countries and a sensitive flank of the Red Sea beside the Horn of Africa—remains united in its resignation.

At regular intervals the country runs out of money for oil. Without oil the economy approaches collapse. Lending countries grudgingly continue sending aid and the government manages to scrape through. France's Elf Aquitaine has invested heavily in oil exploration in the Sudan, but production—if it materializes—is not expected until 1989.

How much longer can President Gaafar Nimeiri—fifty-two but prematurely aged by illness and the crushing weight of his burden—keep this cracked edifice standing? Nimeiri has escaped almost a dozen assassination attempts and two failed coups d'etat in the past thirteen years. Libyan Col. Muammar Gaddafi has named Nimeiri to be killed, and every night Tripoli radio urges the Sudanese to rebel against alleged corruption and privilege.

Last January it seemed that a groundswell would sweep everything away; austerity, popular discontent, and political crisis made an explosive combination. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) warned sternly that the Sudan would receive no new advances without serious fiscal reform. Nimeiri eliminated state subsidies for basic commodities—oil, sugar, flour—and prices skyrocketed.

In December the government had gone a step too far: It reduced students' stipends for trips to their homes. In early January Khartoum University students marched through the city burning shops and overturning cars. For the first time the demonstrations took a decidedly zenophobic turn against the IMF and the U.S., whose cultural center was stoned. But the army intervened, the capital's four universities were closed, and order was restored.

During the next week the provinces erupted. About fifty died in clashes in a dozen cities. On Jan. 13, the violence subsided as suddenly as it had come.

Many believed the shaken president would preach détente. Instead he summoned provincial governors, ministers, party dignitaries, and military leaders to his offices to discuss his policies. Perceiving ambition among the squabbling officials and insolence among the military leaders who questioned his repressive austerity measures, Nimeiri dismissed Vice President and Defense Minister Abdel-Majid Khalil, the Politburo and Central committee members, and other party principals. He also retired twenty-two military officers.

Against this troubled landscape problems in southern Sudan acquired new salience. In 1972 Nimeiri had ended a seventeen-year rebellion that pitted the Moslem and Arab North against the animist, Christian, and African South. Today the South appears to hold the country's most promising oil reserves, and Southerners accuse Khartoum of seeking to appropriate the treasure by readjusting provincial borders.

Who would want to fish in these troubled waters? The young officers are said to be too preoccupied with their promotions and fringe benefits. Their ranks are padded with officers from Egypt—the privileged ally and protector—who would not hesitate to come to the regime's assistance. But in many respects the army remains a mystery.

The Moslem Brotherhood, active in the university, has been skillfully neutralized at higher levels: Three members are in the government. But a highly visible American presence, with its military assistance mission and large contingent of oilmen, could play into the hands of the fundamentalists.

The Mahdists, with three to four million faithful in a population of 18 million, constitute the strongest potential opposition. Saadek al-Mahdi, a descendent of their founder, led a bloody uprising backed by Gaddafi in 1976. Nimeiri has since pardoned him, but this intelligent and learned man again is restless—as if awaiting his hour.

To keep control Nimeiri—with the financial support of the West and the Gulf states—must maintain an exhausting vigilance. That would become impossible were the domestic truce broken.●

PRESIDENT'S POLICIES

HON. ANDY IRELAND

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, as a part of the President's policies to effect Soviet actions toward the Polish people, the administration is considering various options regarding the grain sales to the Soviet Union. I think it's important that each of us become familiar with the issues surrounding this important and controversial foreign policy issue. Therefore, I am submitting the following letter to Business Week by Mr. Richard A. Lenon, the chairman and chief executive officer of the International Minerals and Chemical Corp. regarding this matter. I know that you and our colleagues will find this information very helpful.

INTERNATIONAL MINERALS
Northbrook, Ill., July 8, 1982.

MR. JOHN L. COBBS,
Editor, Business Week, McGraw-Hill Building, Avenue of the Americas, New York, N.Y.

DEAR MR. COBBS: Your editorial "A rough, right decision" (July 5) calls for an embargo on future grain sales to the Soviet Union. Such a step would be a major add-on to the burden already draped around the shoulders of the U.S. farmer and the domestic agricultural community generally. It is unlikely that any intended message would be heard; our allies, with their more pragmatic export policies, could be expected to smile, shrug, and go about their business, while the Soviets would turn, as before, to other readily available sources.

Much of the nearly $1 trillion investment in U.S. agriculture has been made on the premise that upwards of 40 percent of crop output would be sold into export markets. Unfortunately, this country's growth in share of international agricultural markets has come to a halt, and our use of embargos as a political tool has contributed greatly to the problem.

Looking at the most recent one, the 1980/81 Russian grain embargo, a study by Schnittker Associates estimates that this action cost our country $11.4 billion in national output, almost 310,000 jobs, and $3.1 billion in personal income—plus several billions more in direct government costs. The ill effects still linger in product oversupply and international uncertainty as to the reliability of the U.S. as a supplier.

We will applaud and support firm U.S. economic actions for constructive purposes, but an embargo on grain to the Soviets would be counterproductive—ineffective abroad, and severely damaging to the American farmer, struggling to survive in an already difficult economic situation.

Sincerely,

RICHARD A. LENON,
Chairman.

[From Business Week, July 5, 1982]

A ROUGH, RIGHT DECISION

The U.S. will pay a substantial price for the Reagan Administration's decision to ban European licensees of U.S. companies from selling oil and natural gas equipment to the Soviet Union (page 21). But it is a price that has to be paid if our repeated protests against the continued repression of the Polish people are to have any substance. The decision, although it will disappoint some U.S. business interests and anger some allies, deserves support.

The immediate target of the new ban is the Soviet plan for a 3,700-mi. pipeline to transport natural gas from Siberia to Western Europe and thus earn badly needed foreign exchange. General Electric Co. has licensed four European companies to build compressors with an advanced type of rotor for the pipeline. The Administration's refusal to allow sale of this and other equipment to the Soviets will delay the pipeline several years or, some experts think, kill it altogether.

The ban clearly adds to existing strains between the U.S. and its allies and may cause more difficulties in resolving differences on such matters as export credits and subsidized European-made steel being sold in the U.S. But if the U.S. had permitted the equipment sales to go forward, why would the Soviets have taken this country's future protests over Poland, Afghanistan, or other Communist outrages any more seriously than they have taken past ones? Six months have gone by since the crackdown in Poland, and as the President says, "little has changed." In this context the ban adds a welcome measure of credibility to U.S. policies. The Administration now ought to strengthen its stand by imposing an embargo on future grain sales to the Soviet Union. This action would demonstrate to our allies that they are not being asked to carry a disproportionate burden and to the Soviets that their aggressive behavior will bring penalties, not just words.●

THE PLIGHT OF EVGENII CHUDNOVSKY

HON. GERRY E. STUDDS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to participate in the Congressional Vigil for Soviet Jewry.

The Congressional Vigil is a chance for us all to join voices in protest against the gross violations of human rights in the Soviet Union. The freedom to choose one's place of residence and allegiance is the most basic and fundamental of civil liberties. To deny this right—as the Soviet Union has repeatedly done by refusing emigration visas to Soviet Jews—is to demand the attention and condemnation of free peoples everywhere.

There are hundreds of Soviet Jews who currently find themselves in the unenviable predicament of being mistreated in their home country and yet not allowed to leave. Today I would specifically like to address the plight of one of these men—a Evgenii Chudnovsky of Kharkov.

Mr. Chudnovsky was a research physicist at Kharkov State University prior to applying for permission to emigrate in 1979. Mr. Chudnovsky had received an invitation to join his uncle in Israel for a "reunification of the family." Thus planning to relocate his family in the Holy Land, Mr. Chudnovsky applied for emigration visas for himself, his wife Marina, and their 9-year-old daughter Yulia. The visas were denied to the Chudnovskys on the grounds of "insufficient kinship" with their relatives abroad.

Since the time of his unsuccessful visa application, Mr. Chudnovsky has been barred from scientific libraries, forbidden to continue his physics tutorials, and banned from publication in any Soviet scientific journal. Marina's English lessons are now the Chudnovskys' only source of income.

As a result of Mr. Chudnovsky's efforts to establish a Jewish University for young Soviet refuseniks, his telephone has been disconnected, his house searched and ransacked, and many of his papers and belongings confiscated. All of this has had a devastating impact on Evgenii Chudnovsky's health. Several months ago, at the young age of 33, Chudnovsky had a severe heart attack from which he has not yet fully recuperated.

Evgenii Chudnovsky and his family have faced extraordinary suffering, yet they are not alone in bearing the brunt of such religious persecution. Many Jewish leaders unable to leave the Soviet Union are currently being harrassed for their involvement in religious organizations. As morally responsible and concerned individuals, we must make every effort to let Soviet leaders know that we deplore these violations of human rights. I am sure that my colleagues would like to join me in beseeching the Soviet Union to grant visas for Evgenii Chudnovsky and his fellow Jewish refuseniks, and to discontinue such policies of oppression and abuse.●

REVENUE ENHANCEMENTS

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, as we deal with the budget reconciliation process with the House committees making headway toward the goals set in the fiscal 1983 budget resolution, a constituent of mine, Dan Leslie, of Kirksey, Ky., has written me a very thoughtful letter, expressing his strong opposition to increasing taxes. I believe Mr. Leslie's letter is one which should be shared with my colleagues and I wish to do so at this time. The letter follows:

MAY 13, 1982.

Congressman CARROLL HUBBARD,
Mayfield, Ky.

DEAR MR. HUBBARD: I have written to you earlier and appreciate your reply and concern. However, after listening to the President's speech and the Democratic response on Thursday, April 29, 1982, I feel I must remind you and your colleagues of my and my family's stand in reference to the budget.

I am still greatly upset by the tax cut Congress voted for themselves, but angered by the talk of more taxes for the people who are willing and able to work to support this country. It seems to me that raising or adding any taxes will only add to the depression of the existing taxpayers. What is both wanted and needed is some relief or aid to the tax ridden people of America.

I realize I do not understand all the problems and pressures you have concerning the new budget, but I do understand my own problems and higher taxes would only increase them. I also realize we must all share some of the suffering and hard times of this recovery. I just feel that we, the taxpayers, do our suffering each time we look at the 30 to 35 percent deducted from our checks which we seem to have no control over.

Please sir do not picture me as a doom and gloom, hard-hearted, person. I am not. I thank God every day for the privilege of living in this great country. All I ask for is some overdue consideration of the taxpaying public.

Sincerely yours,

DAN LESLIE,
Tax Paying American.●

ABORTION AND THE HIPPOCRATIC OATH

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, being a physician, as well as a Member of this House, I would like to bring a matter of utmost importance to the attention of my colleagues. The Hippocratic Oath has been the guiding influence to physicians since at least 300 years before the birth of Christ. Hippocrates, considered the Father of Medicine, in that oath stated in part: ". . . I will not give a woman a pessary to produce abortion."

It appears that in this latter half of the 20th century, humanist moral-less practitioners of murder of the unborn child are attempting to revise the centuries old solemn Oath of Hippocrates. God forbid if these murderers succeed.

On June 24, 1982, John F. McManus, in his column, "The Birch Log" took to task, those who would, and are, doing their best to conveniently revise the Oath of Hippocrates. Mr. McManus' column dealing with this attempt at a recent graduation of medical degree students at Tufts University in Massachusetts is presented for the benefit of my colleagues and interested physicians who continue to follow the "true" oath. Article follows:

THE BIRCH LOG—THE OATH OF HYPOCRITES

BELMONT, MASS.—The celebrated Greek physician Hippocrates who lived from 460 to 380 B.C. is recognized as the Father of Medicine. Works attributed to him are the oldest medical writings still in existence. Although these technical treatises make interesting reading today, the fame attached to his name derives not from whatever medical procedures he recommended, but from the regimen of medical ethics he penned in his remarkable "Hippocratic Oath."

What Hippocrates gave to the world provides solid proof that both an exemplary code of conduct and a lofty professional ideal characterized the medical profession even from his day. That code or ideal can be summarized best in the simple dictum: "Do no harm!" A doctor has always been expected to be a purifier, not a contaminator; a healer, not a wounder; a life-giver, not a killer. Because doctors swore allegiance to the Hippocratic Oath, their profession deservedly earned noble reputation.

ABORTION PROSCRIBED

The Oath has only a few specific prohibitions in its less than 300 words. These appear as follows: I will give no deadly medicine to any one if asked, nor suggest any such counsel; and in like manner I will not give a woman a pessary to produce abortion.

How significant that the once-sacred Hippocratic Oath would condemn not only the practice of abortion but also the mere suggestion of it.

But these are enlightened times, and today in the United States the most common surgical procedure is legal abortion. The shocking statistics include the snuffing out of the lives of three unborn infants per minute, 182 per hour 4,383 per day and 1,600,000 per year.

OATH ITSELF DESTROYED

It is only a minority of physicians who have become doctors of death. But by turning on an oath that ennobled their profession, they have disgraced it. As might be expected in a profession that allows for such horror, those who sanction abortion have even arranged to destroy the oath itself.

At the May 30th Tufts University commencement in Medford, Massachusetts, the 151 recipients of medical degrees swore a revised and shortened oath which the University had the boldness still to label "The Hippocratic Oath." The corresponding passage in this new version reads: ". . . I will exercise my Art, solely for the cure of my patients and the prevention of disease and will give no drugs and perform no operation for a criminal purpose and far less suggest such thing."

The practice of abortion is not mentioned. In its place we find that these new doctors have sworn only to avoid those operations which have "a criminal purpose." If the law allows for abortion, then the taking of a life is not a crime even if Hippocrates himself thinks it is. Since the Father of Medicine was not enlightened enough to understand this, his oath shall be revised to allow for legalized murder of the unborn. Following on this principle, some doctors obviously could be persuaded to murder the aged, the infirm or the socially or politically unwanted—if doing so were made legal. The revision should be called "The Oath of Hypocrites."

Tufts University medical graduates used this oath for the first time in 1982. Officials at the school say that it originated in 1981 at Duke University, and the Tufts Class of 1982 chose it from several possible oaths and declarations. A 1957 Tufts Medical School graduate who noticed the dramatic change expressed his dismay over the matter to us. He called the entire abortion issue "the Achilles heel of the liberals" which might be their undoing. Coming from a man who formerly delighted in being called a liberal, we considered a small sign of hope for the future.●

UNDERCUTTING U.S. INTERESTS AT THE WORLD BANK

HON. JERRY M. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, the World Bank has served U.S. interests well since its creation at the Bretton Woods conference in 1944. The Reagan administration reaffirmed U.S. support for the World Bank in its recent report, "U.S. Participation in the Multilateral Development Banks in the 1980s."

Unfortunately, the United States is falling behind in its contributions to the World Bank's soft loan window, the International Development Association—IDA. As a result, IDA has been forced to reduce sharply its lending levels to its recipients, the poorest nations on Earth.

In an article published in the Christian Science Monitor on July 4, 1982,

Catherine Gwin warned that U.S. interests could be seriously compromised if we continue to fail to make good on our IDA pledge. U.S. commercial and economic interests could suffer if growth rates in the developing world slow and the demand for our exports contracts. Our ability to influence the policy of the World Bank could also diminish.

The dangers Ms. Gwin is alerting us to are real and pressing. I include her article in the RECORD.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, July 14, 1982]

THE PRICE OF GOING IT ALONE IN THE WORLD BANK

(By Catherine Gwin)

Current United States policy toward the world Bank lacks the support of America's economic allies and diminishes its influence over the course of international financial cooperation.

The immediate cause of this isolation is Washington's failure to meet its part of an internationally negotiated refunding of the International Development Association (IDA) for the period 1981-83. IDA is the "soft loan window" of the World Bank which makes interest-free, 50-year loans to the world's poorest countries. Although Congress authorized the full three-year, $3.24 billion contribution, it appropriated significantly less in 1981 and 1982 than the US pledged and now plans to stretch out payment of the remainder due past 1983.

Other donors disapprove. Therefore, despite a burdensharing provision in the IDA replenishment—whereby a cutback by one major donor would be matched by cutbacks by others—several countries have recently broken with US policy and have committed to their full 1982 IDA installments.

Opposition of others to recommendations in a recent US government report on the World Bank and other multilateral development banks is a second reason for America's growing isolation and declining influence. Despite a generally favorable assessment of the performance of these institutions, the report proposes that the US reduce in real terms future contributions to the "soft loan windows" of the banks; and phase out paid-in capital, which would limit future expansion of the bank's lending capacities. To offset these measures, the report recommends ways that the bank might strengthen its role as a catalyst for greater private flows to developing countries. Desirable as that catalytic function might be, it cannot yield substantially increased resources for development in the near term.

In both making the IDA cutbacks and drafting the recent report, the U.S. seems to have been too quick to assume that other major donor countries—faced, like the U.S., with budgetary constraints—would welcome significant reductions in resource transfers and in the World Bank's role. Although it is now too late to affect the 1983 foreign assistance budget, it is worth considering the costs of the current course of action to U.S. national interests. It is also worth considering how to limit the damage.

At a minimum, the U.S.'s actions reduce the economic benefits it derives from the processes of economic growth and development helped by World Bank loans. Consider two points. Every dollar from the U.S. leverages some $15-$20 in development finance from the World Bank, which borrows, against contributions, from the private markets in order to lend to developing countries. These countries are today the fastest growing markets for U.S. goods and services. Moreover, U.S. firms secure a large share of the contracts offered under bank loans—$6.4 billion in contracts to U.S. businesses for $935 million in total U.S. contributions to the bank.

Washington's present course may also diminish the likelihood that bank financing will continue to suit U.S. foreign policy interests. Over the years, the World Bank has promoted economic development policies supportive of a free, open, and stable world economy. It is in the U.S. interest that these policies be continued, and a dynamic World Bank, able to help countries finance and manage economic adjustment, growth, and the elimination of abject poverty, is one of the best means for encouraging that. Moreover, today's largest World Bank borrowers are countries of importance to America.

Finally, current policy undercuts American ability to influence World Bank operations at a time when reforms are needed to respond to changing international economic relations. The administration wants World Bank resources to be redirected and reserved for countries that have not benefited from the direct expansion of private bank lending. The administration also wants the bank to do more to encourage countries to adopt sounder macroeconomic policies. These are important issues. But the U.S. no longer carries sufficient weight in the bank to enforce it views.

After three decades of playing a dominant role in the bank, the U.S. has let the gap narrow between its share of contributions and votes and the shares of others. This is an appropriate response to the increased economic importance of others.

However, if the U.S. is not to forgo as well its ability to exert constructive influence, it must neither unilaterally back out of internationally negotiated agreements nor try to dictate reforms.

Instead of either paying the piper and calling the tune or going it alone, the U.S. should learn to exercise leadership in the pursuit of common goals. And, as a modest indication of the ability to do that, Washington should commit itself to make good on its IDA pledge by no later than 1984.●

MODIFICATION TO SYNAR AMENDMENT TO H.R. 6030

HON. MIKE SYNAR

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, July 19, 1982, I inserted in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement explaining an amendment I intend to offer to the Department of Defense Authorization Act of 1983, H.R. 6030.

Today I am inserting a slight modification of that amendment so that the intent of my amendment can be better understood by interested Members.

The original language of the amendment requested that the secretary of Defense study the viability of using long-range manned bombers, equipped with antiship missiles, "as an alternative to" aircraft carriers and carrier battle groups in the defense of vital sealanes. The modified version of my amendment makes it clear that the Secretary should also consider the use of bombers as "a supplement to" carriers in that naval defense role.

It was never my intent to limit the Secretary's analysis to a study of bombers as an alternative, since I realize that there are several other naval missions which carriers can perform that cannot be accomplished by other means. The goal of my amendment is to get the Secretary's views on the ability of bombers to perform a sealane defense mission, either as an alternative or supplement to more traditional carrier battle groups.

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 6030, AS REPORTED OFFERED BY MR. SYNAR OF OKLAHOMA

REPORT ON THE USE OF LONG-RANGE MANNED BOMBERS

SEC. 902. Not later than March 1, 1983, Secretary of Defense shall submit to the Committees on Armed Services and on Appropriations of both the Senate and the House of Representatives a report containing an analysis of using long-ranged manned bombers equipped with air-launched antiship missiles to defend vital, strategic shipping lanes (including the United Kingdom, Greenland, Iceland Gap) as an alternative or a supplement to using air-craft carriers and air-craft carrier groups to defend such shipping lanes.●

LEV SHAPIRO—KEEPING FREEDOM ALIVE

HON. BOBBI FIEDLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. FIEDLER. Mr. Speaker, as part of the 97th Congressional Class for Soviet Jewry, I speak today out of concern and in admiration for a very brave man and his family. Lev Shapiro has become one of the most widely known refuseniks through his courage. It is dangerous for any Soviet citizen to meet with foreigners, to write letters abroad expressing his desire for freedom and his opposition to the policies of the regime. For a Jew, it is more dangerous still. For a refusenik, one liable to arrest on almost any pretext, it shows his commitment to freedom for himself, his family and, indeed, for all the refuseniks who wish to leave the Soviet Union. I believe that we in the Congress have an obligation to speak out for Lev Shapiro and his family. To that end, I am proud to have introduced House Resolution 506, calling for their freedom. I urge all my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join in this statement in support of Lev Shapiro and, through that, for all of the beleaguered Soviet Jewish community.

Soviet Jewry has been suffering under the most severe repression since the death of Stalin. In June, only 182 exit visas were issued—the lowest amount in 10 years and down 96 percent from the number of visas issued in 1979. In the past, only pressure from outside the Soviet Union has yielded any results for the pleas of the Jewish community. We must not allow this pressure to be reduced now.

The magnitude of the numbers of people who have suffered for being refuseniks cannot be allowed to blind us to the fact that the statistics are made up of individuals such as Lev and Elizaveta Shapiro and their child, people who wish only to live free. The Soviet Union is a nation plagued by shortages and shortfalls, but nothing is in shorter supply than freedom. In a country where we may live as we please, we can easily forget that each Soviet Jew has his internal passport stamped with his religion, that the privilege of living in major cities is sparingly doled out, that letters and phone calls abroad are routinely censored. These are the conditions under which Lev Shapiro and his family must live. From there, over the years they have been refuseniks, life has become progressively worse, with Lev Shapiro being attacked in print in Soviet publications. There is no promise things will not deteriorate further for this family. That is why it is important that we all join in letting the Soviet Union know that we insist on freedom for the Shapiros. That is why I have introduced House Resolution 506 and why I am proud to speak out, today, for Lev Shapiro and his family. Our American tradition of freedom and justice requires no less.●

JANE FONDA REVISITED

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, in a recent interview—May 6, 1982—in Stars and Stripes, former pro-North Vietnamese radical and war-activist Jane Fonda went to great lengths to explain and justify her antiwar activities.

Fonda unapologetically informs us that she was initially approached by American deserters who had served in Vietnam and that she was "hotheaded and didn't know what I was getting into." But this did not prevent her from going to Hanoi in 1972 and, like a traitor, warning the Vietnamese that the United States was planning to bomb the dike system of North Vietnam. Nor did she hesitate to characterize those POW's who claimed that they were being systematically tortured as liars. Senator JEREMIAH DENTON and James Stockdale, both of whom spent nearly 8 years as POW's, had a far different story to tell than Ms. Fonda upon their release and they have subsequently written movingly of their hellish torture and imprisonment.

As Barbara P. Wyatt, author of an excellent and deeply moving book on our POW's, "We Came Home: POW's of Vietnam," has convincingly pointed out in a followup to the Fonda interview:

People had hoped that Fonda and Hayden had changed, but from the interview in Stars and Stripes, it is obvious that while they have changed their appearance, and are no longer dressed in the frantic attire of the sixties, their ideology is the same.

Mr. Speaker, I would like at this time to submit for the RECORD the eye-opening interview with Fonda in Stars and Stripes as well as the rebuttal essay in Stars and Stripes by Barbara Wyatt.

The articles follow:

FONDA, REVISITED: ANTI-WAR ACTIVIST ACKNOWLEDGES ERRORS IN SEEKING SOCIAL CHANGE

It's an old saw that as the twig is bent, so grows the sapling, and with Jane Fonda, the mighty tree that is the actress, bears the bitter fruit of wisdom learned too late.

Spoiled in her youth, eminently talented yet uncertain, educated to be the role she must play but not knowing who she was to herself, or aware of the seriousness of that other role the individual dons before his fellows, Fonda became the focal point of the Vietnam soldier's anger against the Nation he knew had let him down.

Fifteen years later, in an interview with Stars and Stripes, Fonda and her husband, Tom Hayden, classified their activities and addressed the issues that still remain volatile and unresolved.

Hayden, who is running for a seat in the California assembly, believes that the problems resulting from the use of herbicides should be addressed at the state level via commissions, especially in light of the failure of the federal government to address the concerns.

He also pointed out that the Vietnam veterans as a group, "need to become more involved in the political process" so that they can become educated voters.

Responding to why he thought the anti-war movement had impacted negatively on those who served in Vietnam, Hayden asked if there were polls to substantiate this. He said many of the incidents of cruelty towards returned combat vets were isolated incidents and not representative of the norm.

According to Hayden, "we were all at war during that time."

Hayden said he has met with local groups of veterans and that his plans contain future meetings with others.

Hayden left after the few comments, and Fonda replied for the balance of the interview.

HISTORY OF ANTI-WAR MOVEMENT INVOLVEMENT

Fonda said that she first became involved in 1967 with the anti-war movement while she was living in France, married to a French actor.

She noted that the French had strong feelings against the US commitment in Vietnam, due to their own experiences in Southeast Asia and their withdrawal following the defeat at Dien Bien Phu in 1954.

American deserters who had served in Vietnam, she said, were seeking out public figures to spouse their cause and approached her for support.

Many of them were being harboured in Europe by sympathetic resident Americans who believed their accounts of the atrocities committed against the Vietnamese; Fonda believed them also.

"I was totally non-political at the time and didn't even know where Vietnam was," she said. It was then that she began "to research the situation of the United States' involvement in Vietnam" and her association with a former Green Beret, Donald Duncan.

When her marriage ended, Fonda returned to Hollywood, and in conjunction with Duncan and others, began the Save Our Soldiers (SOS) movement.

She freely admits that elements of SOS were from the far left and that she was "hot headed and didn't know what I was getting into."

Curiously, Fonda says that she began to "realize then that the only way to end the US involvement in Vietnam was to radicalize US soldiers who had served there. They had the credibility to speak on the topic."

It was for these reasons that Fonda began to tour campuses and address their GI audiences, and visit US military installations and read the troops the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Often, she said, "I was thrown off some of these bases, screaming and cursing," because when she first began working with the anti-war movement, she believed that "by screaming, you could bring forum for her concerns.

Instead, she participated in the Winter Soldier project which was an attempt to document the realities of Vietnam, including the atrocities allegedly committed by U.S. personnel in Southeast Asia.

With other entertainers, Fonda informed the Press the Army Campaign to "present a balance to Bob Hope" (who was traveling in Vietnam with the USO shows) and toured military bases in the US and overseas.

She remembers four occasions when she tried to gain admittance to S. Vietnam but was denied entry by the authorities, and believes it was because of the hearty response she received from US troops on her visits to Japan, the Philippines and other bases.

"They received me with clapping and cheering and the authorities were afraid that my presence in the Republic of Vietnam, especially change."

In retrospect, Fonda said she believes she acted unwisely. Simply screaming brings about little, if any change."

It was during this period that Fonda began to work with the Vietnam Veterans Against The War, "before they were a radical left group."

Following the massacre at My Lai, Fonda continued that she was contacted by some European intellectual leaders who were putting together a war crimes tribunal, but she did not find this an appropriate note in the war, would adversly affect military discipline and morale in country.

In answer to the statement that she was and continues to be perceived as being against those who served in Vietnam, Fonda became visibly upset and adamantly stated that during her anti-war activities, she had begun her speeches with the remarks: "Soldiers (those in RVN) are not the enemy."

Telling her audiences that "soldiers are not to blame for the war", should have been sufficient proof of her intentions.

Fonda said she could understand why the Vietnamese were viewed as the enemy by those who were being shot at (US troops), but she did not see the Vietnamese as the enemy.

The strong reaction to her anti-war activities, Fonda blames on the fact that she was viewed by some as the American ideal, particularly following the movie Barberella in which she was a "sex symbol." According to the actress, her activities "were seen as a betrayal of the American dream."

She continues to maintain that FBI files document that she was a target of the "dirty tricks" campaign of the Watergate era and that there was a deliberate attempt to discredit her, personally and professionally.

Firmly stating that she is not now and never has been a Communist, she noted that it was difficult, if not impossible, for her to obtain work during this period.

In 1972, as a result of reading the Pentagon Papers, Fonda went to Hanoi to warn them that the U.S. was planning to bomb the dike system of North Vietnam. "This would have upset the agricultural system of North Vietnam and resulted in the death of over one million of the citizens of the north from famine."

She pointed out that she was not the only one to visit North Vietnam during that period of the war, including veterans groups, government officials and "even Ramsey Clark. But none of them received the publicity that my trip did."

While Fonda was in North Vietnam, she broke her leg and became a patient in a NVM hospital. During her stay, she said she observed many incidents of deformed children, including those with flipper-like deformities and cleft palates, born to women who claimed to have been in areas sprayed by the U.S. with defoliants and other chemicals.

"I began to realize that the same thing must be happening to the U.S. troops in the South."

On the issue of her controversial comments on the POWs, Fonda said that her exact words on the matter were, "Those POWs who implied a systemic policy of torture, were lying."

Yet she was quick to point out that she believes that some of the POWs were tortured. In addition, she notes that many of the pilots went down in remote areas which they could have demolished by their own bombs, and "it is surprising that many of them were kept alive by the illiterate peasants."

Based on what she was told by a POW who was of Chicano-Indian descent, Fonda said that the condition the POW's were found in could have been due to the fact that they were for the most part pilots who were middle class whites and not used to the conditions of the street.

She also believes that racism was a factor as the "pilots were being told what to do by little yellow men."

Fonda continues to believe that Nixon used the return of the POW's to "whip up blinding hatred for the North Vietnamese" and that those with the best stories, were put on tour.

She reiterates that she did not view her visit to Hanoi as collaboration as she did not view the North Vietnamese as the enemy.

When asked whether she believes the families of the POW's/MIA's are owed an accounting, she agreed that it is cruel to keep them in limbo.

She added that the North Vietnamese are experts in the area of public relations, and "I cannot see from a logical viewpoint, what advantage would be in it to continue to hold the remains of POW's of live Americans."

In order to address the POW and MIA issue, and the policies of the government of Vietnam, including the re-education camps, Fonda thinks the U.S. should follow the example of Sen. Ted Kennedy (Mass.) and call for normalization of relations with Vietnam.

"We should establish diplomatic pressure there," she added.

When asked what she thinks the U.S.-Vietnam combat veteran deserves, she replied, "Help; financial, moral, and psychological support."

She agreed that in many cases the media had created a negative image of the Vietnam veteran and that this had been a grievous handicap.

Fonda sees the most expeditious route to achieving the goals of Vietnam veterans as that of becoming unified and educated political force.

TRAITOR: "ONE WHO BETRAYS A CONFIDENCE OR TRUST; ONE WHO ACTS PERFIDIOUSLY OR TREACHEROUSLY; SPECIFICALLY, ONE WHO VIOLATES HIS ALLEGIANCE AND BETRAYS HIS COUNTRY; ONE GUILTY OF TREASON."

—WEBSTER.

(By Barbara P. Wyatt)

Fonda stated in the interview that she was living in France and the "American deserters who had served in Vietnam were seeking out public figures to espouse their cause and they approached her for support."

Why would they choose her? What made them believe that she was ripe for their cause? Why would she want to be the spokeswoman for them?

She listened to their tales of atrocities, she was not an authority on government, history, wars, politics, international relations—yet she seized this self-serving opportunity to make a name for herself. She spoke to anyone who would listen.

She knew, of course, the good name of her father was known, but Fonda was not well known, so off she took with the bevy of malcontents as her cheering crowd.

Taking the paragraph from the interview is Stars and Stripes, curiously Fonda says, she began "to realize then that the only way to end the U.S. involvement in Vietnam was to radicalize U.S. soldiers who had served there. They had the credibility to speak on the topic." Why did she think that she knew more about where and why we should be involved in Vietnam than the U.S. Government?

Somehow her priorities were reversed. She felt a greater obligation to go to Hanoi to warn them that the U.S. was planning to bomb the dike system of North Vietnam, stating that "This would upset the agricultural system of North Vietnam."

She apparently felt little compassion for the families of Americans who had given their lives or for the POW's who were held incommunicado in the prisons, nor the Americans who believed that once you make a commitment to help a nation, you live up to that promise.

An act such as hers would be similar to handing over the plans for the fortification of West Point during the Revolution. For such an act Benedict Arnold was branded a traitor!

Fonda noted that while being a patient in a North Vietnamese hospital, she observed many incidents of deformed children born to women who claimed to have been in areas sprayed by U.S. defoliants. That any child must suffer from the acts of war is cruel, yet such was the cost of the Communist take-over, not the help that the Americans were trying to render the South.

Has Fonda noted the number of boat people, the concentration camps, the massive restrictions by the Communists to allow any freedoms, especially to those who wish to leave?

There is evidence of much brutality. Ask the little Cambodian children who have been terrorized by seeing their parents slaughtered. I do not note any charge by Fonda against the Communists for those evil deeds.

She spoke of the POW's, stating "Those POW's who implied a systematic policy of torture were lying." How does she know?

I'll take the words of a Jeremiah Denton, now a U.S. Senator, who spent 7½ years as a POW. Having to appear on television in North Vietnam, threatened with further torture if he didn't condemn America for being in the war, he blinked the Morse Code Torture for the world to know why he was submitting to such indignities.

I believe a James Stockdale, a POW who can readily tell of the torture team who, with their deadly dramatic art, knew how to tie a man in ropes. Listen to the description by Admiral Stockdale who was the recipient of such horrors.

Note if you meet Jerry Driscoll or Dick Stratton the permanent rope marks on their wrists and the cigarette burns on Dick's arms.

Kneeling on bricks for hours, being kept awake for days and nights in front of an open window in the winter, sitting on a stool and being knocked off by your captors, time after time, to see how far you will go, having your appendix taken out without sedation, spending almost five years in solitary, having deadly foot-long centipedes and scorpions, six foot cobras, bamboo vipers and spiders as big as a man's outstretched hand, leave their tracks as they crawl through your cage. Those are some of the tortures that our POW's were forced to endure.

How do I know this? When the POWs came off the plane, I watched them and thought their messages should be saved and thus, I compiled a book with a response from each of them. Throughout the book, there is a sense of mission from these men. They returned home with honor. They, in all but several isolated cases, had sought to be a credit to their country.

It hurt them deeply to be bombarded over the loud speakers by their captors with the propaganda that Fonda was promoting. It was very difficult to languish in a prison cell with a person from America visiting your captors and telling the world you were being well treated.

Fonda stated that she believed there was a racism factor as the "pilots were being told what to do by little yellow people." There is no doubt that the POWs didn't like those "little yellow people," but it wouldn't matter the color—an enemy is an enemy.

There was a hatred of the Dutch for the Germans, the Moors for the Spanish, the South Vietnamese for the North Vietnamese, so to make such a statement displays not only a lack of clear thinking, but a basic inability to understand human beings in a time of war.

Californians are aware that Fonda with Tom Hayden, strongly suggested to Governor Jerry Brown that he appoint Edison Miller to the Orange County Board of Supervisors.

Who was Edison Miller and why would they promote such a person? He was one of two officer POWs who allegedly cooperated with the enemy . . . helping the captors and refusing to help the other POWs.

The governor abided by the Fonda/Hayden choice and Edison Miller was given the honor.

Americanism was expressed at the polls because when he had to run for the seat, he was soundly defeated.

People had hoped that Fonda and Hayden had changed, but from the interview with Stars and Stripes, it is obvious that while they have changed their appearance, and are no longer dressed in the frantic attire of the sixties, their ideology is the same.

These latest comments merely remind us where they stood when Americans were responding to their country's call.

Rather than attempt to summarize the deep-seated feelings of those who experienced the hardships and frustrations of Vietnam, I will conclude with a page from my book. This was written by Captain Darrel E. Pyle, an Air Force Captain who was imprisoned from June 13, 1966, until his release in 1973.

"The day was February 12, 1973. The location was Gia Lam Airport, North Vietnam. The sky was broken to overcast, and the air was chilled by the winds which swept down from China. I sat in a bus beside a bombed-out hangar and watched a plane taxiing toward the runway. The plane was a 141 and had big letters which said, United States Air Force.

"I was crying. Before the plane could take off, another 141 broke through the overcast and roared over my head. My plane . . . my chariot had come to take me home.

"Home. What is home? Home is America. What is America? Is America 200 million people who will look at me in disgust and throw things at me because I've given seven years of my life to a cause I so fervently believe in?

"Is America thousands of people carrying Viet Cong flags down the main streets of America? Is America Jane Fonda and Ramsey Clark who tell me I've been well treated when I can too vividly recall the horrors of the past years? What is America?

"America. America is thousands of people holding signs which say, 'We Love You.' America is people holding Old Glory and shouting, 'Welcome Home!'

"America is a bumper sticker, a bracelet, a hand shake, a hug, a letter. America is a tear drop in the eye of a stranger. America is a huge sign: You Were Never Forgotten.

"As you read this hold your head high and puff out your chest. What is America? You are America . . . be proud."●

IMMIGRATION REFORM AND CONTROL ACT OF 1982

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1982, H.R. 6514, attempts to focus U.S. Government efforts against illegal immigration on those areas where enforcement is likely to be effective.

Under present law, every visitor from abroad must obtain a visa from a U.S. Embassy or consulate before entering our country. This is true whether the applicant is a short-term business visitor from a country with strong ties to the homeland who is very likely to return home, or whether the person is from a country who might be using the business-visitor status as a ruse or dodge to enter the country and never return home.

H.R. 6514 proposes to change this and allow certain short-term visitors into the United States without having to obtain a visa if they come from a country whose citizens return home at the end of their visit abroad—if they have low visa refusal rates.

Specifically, the legislation provides for a 3-year pilot program which would enable visitors from five countries, selected by the Attorney General and the Secretary of State, with low visa refusal rates to come to the United States without first obtaining a visa.

These visitors would have to purchase nonrefundable, nontransferable airline tickets. Each visitor would still be required to undergo an examination by an official of the Immigration and Naturalization Service at the port of entry. Should the immigration offical determine that the visitor is inadmissible, the visitor would have to immediately return to his or her country.

This nonimmigrant visa waiver proposal will allow U.S. Consular officials abroad to deploy their thin resources more appropriately to concentrate on countries where there are historical patterns of fraud and where the Consular Officer is an important obstacle to illegal entry into the United States.

Before the nonimmigrant visa waiver program can begin, however, H.R. 6514 requires that the Immigration and Naturalization Service develop a workable system for tracking the arrival and departures of visitors. The Service is hopeful of having such a system operating next year, and the immigration reform bill gives them the added incentive to get it in place.

For reasons of balance and reciprocation, nations which permit U.S. citizens to enter their borders without first obtaining a visa feel strongly that their citizens should be able to enter the United States without visas.

Recently I met with Lord Bethell, a citizen of the United Kingdom and a member of the European Parliament. He described the significance of the nonimmigrant visa waiver program for America's European allies. A copy of Lord Bethell's recent article in The Times of London about the nonimmigrant visa waiver program is included at the end of my remarks.

Senator ALAN SIMPSON and I feel this pilot program is the proper approach to the nonimmigrant visa waiver issue. It would be foolhardy to abolish totally visa requirements. But it would also be unreasonable and rigid not to experimentally lift visa requirements for qualifying nations.

[From the Times of London, July 12, 1982]

GIVE ME YOUR JET-LAG MASSES

(By Nicholas Bethell)

Thanks to Sir Freddie Laker and the cheap satellite telephone call, North America is no longer a mere dream for Britons. In several early years of this century, we are told, a million Europeans went to the United States and stayed there; three-quarters of its people are of European origin. In the 1940s and 1950s the invasion was the other direction: first the soldiers, and then the tourists.

Now we are reciprocating. Two million west Europeans will have been to the United States by the end of 1982. Our huddled masses yearn to breathe the air of San Francisco's freedom. The wretched refuse of our teeming shore feels at home, it seems, along the Miami coastline. The Americans, almost as badly hit by recession and unemployment as we are, welcome this new trade, but there is one way in which they do not reciprocate. They insist on each of us obtaining a visa before starting our journey.

We know of course that the "all others" channel at Heathrow's Terminal 3 makes an unhappy first impression on American visitors here, especially after an all-night flight, but at least neither we nor the other west European countries impose on them the indignity of the visa. The simple fact is that the relationship between the old and the new world has changed since the last century.

"Give me your tired, your poor," the Statue of Liberty is supposed to be saying. Nowadays this means those who cannot afford a travel agent to get the visa painlessly for them. There are few things more calculated to make one feel tired and poor than a day spent queueing in the July heat outside the Grosvenor Square embassy in London.

Consul General Robert Maule has a staff of 74 exclusively engaged in issuing us with nonemigrant visas. Gone are the days when each applicant had to swear that he was not a communist, would not assassinate the President and did not intend while in the United States to commit any immoral sexual act. Things are simpler today—a quick computer check and if you come out clean, you get your visa, valid indefinitely and without fee.

Mr. Maule will issue about 75,000 this year, nearly as many as all the consuls in the other nine European Community countries combined. It is boring, repetitive, cursory work. When I told him last week that American law will probably be changed to allow British citizens to enter his country without visas, he said this was the best news he had heard for months.

The good news as outlined by Congressman Romano Mazzoli during a European Parliament visit to Washington on June 23 is that a Bill to reform the Immigration and Nationality Act will establish a pilot programme under which the citizens of several countries, including Britain, will receive visa waiver privileges. If it is passed—and Mr. Mazzoli seems optimistic—it will be a step towards ending a humiliating and unfair piece of non-reciprocity in European-American relations.

The Bill's passage will be complicated. There are some 6 million illegal immigrants in the US and unemployment is touching 10 per cent of the work-force. Of course the immigrants are mainly from Mexico and the Caribbean rather than from Europe, but the European Community is still being blamed for many of America's ills, in particular by subsidizing food and steel exports. Congressmen are in no mood, either to relax immigration laws or to do Europe favours, especially in an election year.

But the question of imbalance over visas continues to press. It was raised by Mrs. Thatcher with Mr. Reagan in Washington in February last year. "We regularly take up this question with the Americans," wrote Lord Carrington last December and the Belgian Foreign Minister, Mr. Leo Tindemans, also broached the subject last month. On June 14 the 10 European Community foreign offices informed the US government of their concern at a small but basic injustice. It is therefore possible that the Bill may be swallowed by the Congressmen.

The State Department, led by Ambassador Diego Asencio, has long favoured a reform abolishing visa requirements for what they term the "Top 25" visitors from countries whose citizens are seldom refused entry and who seldom violate immigration law. A cut-off point of 2 per cent refusals or violations, as provided in the Mazzoli bill, would leave on the right side of the line all west European countries except Portugal.

Their representations, it seems, are no longer being dimissed as the "storied pomp," of "ancient lands", in the harsh words inscribed above New York harbour. West Europeans still flow across the Atlantic by the million, but their landing points are the Empire State Building and Disneyland, rather than Ellis Island, and they contribute to rather than threaten America's economy. US officials in the European consulates would be better employed on more productive work, perhaps in preventing illegal immigration. During the rest of this year the passage of the Mazzoli Bill will be watched in Europe with interest and its signature by Mr. Reagan will be greeted with more than a symbolic transatlantic cheer.●

FTC USED CAR RULE PROPERLY REJECTED

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that national reporting of Congress rejection of the Federal Trade Commission's "used car rule" obscured both the real meaning of the votes and the merits of the rule itself.

Instead, reporters largely emphasized the national consumer lobby's innuendo that the outcome in both Houses of the Congress—even though nearly 70 percent of the Senators and Congressmen opposed the rule—was dictated by the volume of campaign contributions that had flowed from the automobile dealers in the last election.

While any group of 535 people undoubtedly contains some "bad apples," in my judgment the overwhelming majority in Congress are honest, hard-working people whose votes cannot and are not bought by contributions. To suggest that they can be in advance of a particular vote on an important issue, undermines the faith in representative government that is so important to the functioning and future of our country.

In fact, campaign contributions flow to those who generally share the same philosophy of government as the contributor. And in this case, although it was not widely made known, this was an issue of great moment philosophically regarding the role of the Federal Government.

The FTC "used car rule" would have required used car dealers—but not private sellers—to post a sticker on all their used cars informing buyers of known and suspected defects in 52 prescribed areas. Dealers would be faced with fines by the FTC of up to $10,000 for each violation.

Rejection of the rule by overwhelming margins in each House was made under a new law adopted in 1980 giving the two Houses of Congress the right to veto FTC regulations thought to be unwise or unnecessary. This was the first test under this new law and therein lay the significance of this vote on the "two House veto."

In my judgment, the used car rule, on its merits, was properly rejected. The small promise the rule contained to help consumers was clearly overwhelmed by the realities of a huge new bureaucracy in Washington, further damage to an American industry already reeling from heavy regulation and multiple business failures, and the further undermining of individual initiative and a sound free market economy.

You and I know that a large percentage of buyers of used cars from dealers having a problem, would file a complaint with the FTC. Why not? It would cost them nothing and maybe the dealer would settle for something just to get the agency off its back, even when the dealer knew nothing about the particular defects in the car it sold. Dealers would become, under the rule, almost guarantors that the used cars they sold were free of any defects. To avoid liability they would have to inspect every car at a cost of $150 to $350. And who would pay that cost? You and I as consumers, with the attendant discouragement of trade-ins, reducing discounts offered the new car buyers and further depressing the new car market.

For the FTC in Washington, not only would a huge bureaucracy of inspectors be needed to police American's 2,000 used car lots, but a whole new phalanx of administrative law judges would be needed to handle the tens of thousands of cases that would be filed. For the dealers, legal help in abundance would be needed. The winner: The lawyers.

No, it seems to me at some point we have to trust ourselves as individuals and trust our free market system. Nothing requires any of us to buy used cars from any particular dealers, or indeed from any dealer at all. In fact, 50 percent of the used cars purchased every year in America are bought from private sellers through classified ads not covered by the FTC rule. If a consumer is unhappy or unsure about used car dealers, the choice is easy—do not buy from them. If enough people feel strongly this way, the message will get through loud and clear. In fact, many used car dealers already offer warranties and some allow unconditional returns within certain time limits.

Finally, I know of no dealer who has remained in business for long who would not permit his prospective buyers to take a used car to a mechanic for a thorough inspection before purchase. I have bought many used cars, but never have I purchased one without having it inspected independently of the seller, whether a dealer or a private party.

Yes, there are unscrupulous dealers in the industry. Perhaps a large new bureaucracy in Washington would ultimately ferret them out. But the cost to our system, and to ourselves as consumers and taxpayers, would have been incredibly high. Democracy depends upon each one of us being able to make reasonably sound individual judgments. That is the premise of our entire economy and political system. In a sense, the FTC "used car rule" ultimately was a test of our belief in this system we hold so dear.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. JOSEPH F. SMITH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. SMITH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join with my colleagues in expressing my utter abhorrence of Communist oppression and aggression throughout Eastern Europe. It is our duty, as elected representatives of the freest nation known to man, to continually remind the so-called leaders of the Soviet Government that we do not and will not accept the blatant denial of innate human rights. The unfortunate persons who happen to be imprisoned by Soviet domination are unable to speak our for themselves or make civil attempts to bring about a positive movement toward world peace and freedom which is why we, the inhabitants of the free world, have an obligation to speak out for them.

Through misinformation and virtual brainwashing, the inhabitants of these captive nations, as well as the populus of the Soviet Union itself, are led to believe that the United States of America is the supreme embodiment of evil and the biggest threat to world peace. Do these deprived people know that, during the recent and ongoing international emergencies concerning the Falkland Islands and the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, the United States has been the supreme negotiator, making ever attempt to be fair to all parties involved, in order to achieve a long-lasting peace. Where has the Soviet Union been during these crisis situations? As usual, the U.S.S.R. did release idle threats aimed more directly at the United States rather than at the specific nations involved in the conflict. I openly challenge the Soviet Government to broadcast these daily proceedings of the U.S. House of Representatives in their country in order for the Soviet people to see what democracy is all about. After that fantasy is complete, I would then turn the cameras on Mr. Brezhnev and company to see in what direction they intend to further the sin of Communist oppression.

It is of vital importance that we verbalize our discontent of Soviet policies, not just during this Captive Nations Week, but during every week of every year until oppressed people such as Ida Nudel and Pavel Zaslzvsky have the opportunity to live out the rest of their lives in freedom.

No appropriations have to be made for us to continue our outcries against Soviet confinement behind the Iron Curtain. No debates or partisan splits need take place over this issue. All members of the free world must rally together to form a diplomatic siege around the Soviet Union.

In ancient times, a word equal to the word "rights" did not exist. Instead they had words equating responsibility and oligation. Today, we in this country do have a word for rights as well as the ideology behind it. But by attaining this standard of human rights, we must not lose sight of the responsibility that goes along with it—the obligation to promote freedom and human rights in every corner of the world until Soviet oppression, as we know it, ceases to exist.●

A DRAFT ISN'T NEEDED

HON. RON PAUL

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, when our Government prosecutes young Americans for refusing to register for the draft, the sacred cause of liberty is undermined. It is freedom which makes America special and worth fighting for. So long as we take care to keep America free, there will be no shortage of volunteers when America is threatened.

How can we have so little confidence in our young people? Could it be that they are wiser than those who urge conscription? Perhaps they recognize the difference between what is morally justified—defending our own freedom—and what is morally repugnant—projecting American interests abroad, and intervening illicitly in foreign conflicts.

I believe that the draft is pernicious and self-defeating. Registration was reinstituted in order to send a signal to our so-called allies and the Russians. I cannot imagine a more preposterous pretense for subverting the freedoms of American citizens. I urge my colleagues in Congress, and those responsible in the administration, to reconsider this damaging policy.

In a recent editorial in the New York Times, Mr. Doug Bandow made the case against the draft with all the clarity and logic which those familiar with his work have come to expect. He argues persuasively that the draft would not only be morally wrong, but imprudent, and uneconomical.

Doug Bandow has recently moved from his post at the White House to the editorship of Inquiry magazine. What is a great loss for the White House will be a boon for Inquiry. I highly commend the following excellent piece by Doug Bandow to my colleagues:

[From the New York Times, April 19, 1982]

A DRAFT ISN'T NEEDED

(By Doug Bandow)

WASHINGTON.—The All-Volunteer Force was created in 1973, but the issue of how to man our military has not died. Despite the success of the All-Volunteer Force, there are still many people calling for a draft to strengthen our national defense.

A draft, however, would do nothing of the kind. Coercing people to serve would increase costs, decrease retention of military personnel, fail to improve both the quality of the armed forces and the degree to which they represent a cross-section of our society, create national disunity, and destroy fundamental values that make America worth defending.

Conscripting labor doesn't reduce costs; it increases and shifts them. Instead of paying a volunteer, say, $15,000—enough to convince him to forego or delay other career opportunities—the Pentagon would pay a draftee, say, $7,500. That means that the draftee in effect is taxed $7,500. Indeed, a defense cost supposedly too great to be borne by the entire society would instead be borne by 18- to 26-year-old males. Such economic expediency is unworthy of a free society.

A draft would not even significantly reduce budgetary costs. Though more than half of the military budget goes to personnel—$80 billion out of $156.1 billion in fiscal 1981—most of that is for career servicemen, civilians, and retirees. Only $6.6 billion was used to pay first-term active-duty servicemen—those who would be drafted.

Thus, if draftees' pay were slashed 50 percent, the savings would be only $3.3 billion. Cuts in recruiting costs might save a half billion dollars more. But there would be added costs of registration, classification, induction, and enforcement of the draft, as well as higher training costs caused by the inevitable decline in retention of first-termers.

A draft would also exacerbate the military's severest personnel problem: retaining skilled noncommissioned officers. The draft cannot directly increase the number of skilled career noncoms because it brings in only untrained 18-year-olds. Also, it hikes the cost of retaining a career force of a set size because of higher turnover among first-terms. This is so because draftees, resentful, re-enlist in smaller numbers than volunteers.

Reinstituting the draft would not increase the quality of armed forces personnel. The proportion of 1981 enlistees scoring highest in intelligence tests is as high today as it was during the draft in the 1960's and 1970's. In 1981, 81 percent of the people entering the armed forces were high school graduates.

Since the military already is nearly a cross-section of our society, conscription would be unlikely to increase that representativeness. For example, the overall educational attainment of military personnel is higher than that of their civilian counterparts: 69 percent as against 36 percent are high school graduates, and 14 percent as against 16 percent are college graduates.

Moreover, the parents of young servicemen are only slightly more blue-collar and less-educated than parents of the servicemen's civilian contemporaries, according to an Ohio State University poll. The educational aspirations of the young servicemen exceed those of their civilian counterparts, it shows.

Finally, though blacks are overrepresented in the military—while 12 percent of the population is black, 19 percent of the overally military and 30 percent of the army is black—the proportion of those serving edged downward in 1981. Indeed, because qualified blacks volunteer and re-enlist in greater numbers than whites, a draft would significantly affect the military's composition only if virtually no volunteers were accepted and if blacks were actively discouraged from re-enlisting.

As for coercion, with the history of violence and controversy it has engendered, it would seriously divide America again. To face the possible challenges in years ahead, we need to forge a consensus on foreign and defense policy. Reinstituting conscription would make acquiescence, let alone consensus, unattainable.

Most important, a draft is inimical to the fundamental principles that constitute the foundation of our country. We have manned our forces with volunteers for most of our history, and for good reason: Requiring involuntary service violates fundamental individual rights.

Indeed, even if free citizens in a free society owe service to the state, why should only the young be liable? National defense benefits everyone; therefore, everyone should be liable. A volunteer military financed by universal taxation, and not the draft, spreads the burden.

A draft will not enhance our national security. Indeed, if America has lost the moral authority to persuade its people to voluntarily defend their freedom, then it has lost something that no amount of coercion will restore.●

OBSERVING CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK, 1982

HON. JOHN LeBOUTILLIER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. LEBOUTILLIER. Mr. Speaker, as has been the tradition for the past 24 years, the U.S. Congress has once again observed Captive Nations Week with a special order on July 21, 1982.

Without question, the remarks entered into the RECORD are of value in demonstrating the sincere intent of the United States to always hold that the countries under the Communist yoke are not free.

Regrettably, the number of captive nations has not diminished since Armenia first lost its freedom in 1920 along with numerous other Eurasian republics. Most recently, Afghansitan was added to the list of captive nations in 1980 when 100,000 Soviet troops arrogantly invaded that nation. To the credit of the Afghani people, the cost to the Soviets for their war mongering has been considerable.

Twenty-four years and 31 countries after the first Captive Nations Week was proclaimed, the United States and the West have at their disposal the resources to free the 31.

By making use of the ever-growing trade dependency of the Soviet Union on the West, the United States must exact a great price from the Soviets if they wish to continue to benefit from technological, economic, and agricultural exchanges with the United States and the West.

Until such time as the Soviets withdraw from Afghanistan, release their vice-like grip on Poland and desist from their unrelenting program of revolution for export, the United States and the West must play their trump card and force the Soviets to moderate their actions by cutting off all trade.

In effect, by trading with the Soviet Union, the United States and the West are providing the Soviets with the material and capital by which they finance their totalitarian empire. By forcing the Soviets to rely more heavily on their own resources to meet the needs of their own people, the United States and the West can bring about a moderating of Soviet designs—the beneficiaries of which would be the Russian people and the citizens of the 31 captive nations.

Captive nations will be freed only when the Soviet Union is forced to back down from its aggressive armament, infiltration, subversion game plan. That day of freedom can be hastened by forcing the Soviets to grant more and more freedom to the people they currently subjugate. The means to moderate Soviets designs exist.

For the sake of the 31, the United States and the West must undertake that mission. Failure to do so amounts to complicity in the enslavement of millions of human beings. While the profit motive is an enormous factor in this question, the principal motive commands far greater consideration.

By forcing the Soviets to divert resources from their military to the needs of their people, greater freedom can be achieved—which is after all the objective of Captive Nations Week, to make these nations free once more.●

HON. BILL NICHOLS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, during the July Fourth recess many Alabamians expressed to me their frustration over our present tax laws. They are too complicated, they are confusing, and many believe they are unfair.

Many here in Congress have proposed scraping our present system in favor of a so-called flat-rate tax system. While there are many variations on this theme, each concept does have merit. It offers simplicity, a perception of fairness, and the opportunity to restore confidence to the tax system.

I have consponsored H.R. 5868, which calls for a comprehensive study of the flat-rate tax system by the Department of the Treasury. This study may help to resolve some of the confusion surrounding the various provisions of the bills pending in Congress and may provide insight for Members of Congress so that we better understand the alternatives available to us.

The Alabama Legislature has also embraced this legislation and has urged the U.S. Congress to support H.R. 5868.

For the benefit of the Members of this body, I submit for the RECORD a copy of the Alabama resolution. I believe it will be of interest to all of my colleagues.

S.J.R. 11

(By Mr. Kirkland)

Enrolled,

S.J.R. 11, Encouraging the Alabama Congressional Delegation and the Entire Congress To Support H.R. 5868 and S. 2376.

Whereas, H.R. 5868 and S. 2376, introduced respectively in the United States House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate, are companion bills designed to initiate the most significant change in our Federal Tax System since the first Income Tax Law was adopted almost seven decades ago; and

Whereas, the aforementioned bills call upon the Treasury Department to conduct a study detailing the economic and administrative consequences of adopting a flat rate Gross Income Tax System; and

Whereas, preliminary studies by a prominent Washington economist indicate that the GIT rates would not exceed 7½% for any class of taxpayers, a far cry from the tremendous burden now heaped upon the shoulders of the American taxpayer; and

Whereas, this legislation also would serve to drastically reduce or eliminate the complicated tax paperwork now required of individuals, business and government as well; and

Whereas, following completion of the Treasury Department's study, a compehensive bill to change from our present net income tax system to the new GIT system would be introduced in the 98th Congress (1982-83) to provide for a fair and simple income tax system for all Americans; now therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of Alabama, both houses thereof concurring, That we strongly urge the Alabama Congressional Delegation and the entire Congress to support legislation for the Gross Income Tax System and direct that copies of this resolution be dispatched to each member of the Alabama Delegation, and to the presiding officers of each House of Congress, with a further request that this resolution be placed in the Congressional Record evidencing Alabama's support of a fair and equitable system of taxation.●

NUCLEAR NONPROLIFERATION POLICY

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, last week marked the 37th anniversary of the detonation of what by current standards was a crude nuclear explosive device. This past Monday we were informed by the Washington Post that a computer manufactured by an American company is destined for use in a plant which will produce heavy water in Argentina; that heavy water will be essential to the operation of an Argentine reactor capable of producing plutonium like that used in the first nuclear explosive detonated at Almogordo in 1945. Unfortunately, the Reagan administration seems reluctant to take the steps which might forestall acquisition of nuclear weapons by countries that might still be persuaded of the folly of their course. Today's New York Times carries an excellent article by Mr. BINGHAM who succinctly summarizes both the dangers and opportunities of our predicament. I am inserting this article in the RECORD for those of my colleagues who have not yet seen it:

[From the New York Times, July 21, 1982]

DON'T LET ARMS RACE MUSHROOM

(By JONATHAN B. BINGHAM)

WASHINGTON.—Horrified by a world in which two nations are unable to halt a lethal arms race? Imagine trying to work out arms control among half a dozen or more third world countries convinced that it is in their national security interests to build up nuclear arsenals.

Unless the exporters of nuclear technology and fuel become increasingly circumspect, this horrendous task could soon be necessary.

Argentina and Brazil, rival South American neighbors, have ambitious nuclear power programs that seem to have military as well as commercial ends. Significantly, neither country has agreed to inspection of all its nuclear facilities—so-called full-scope safeguards—by the International Atomic Energy Agency, which is responsible for verifying that nuclear fuel and technology are used strictly for commercial purposes.

Similarly, South Africa, Israel, Iraq and Pakistan—all nations facing sharp regional tensions—are widely believed to be pursuing a nuclear weapons capacity through their commercial nuclear programs. Again, none has agreed to full safeguards.

In recognition of the dangers, the Reagan Administration has advanced a quid pro quo formula for nuclear trade: The United States will be a reliable supplier of nuclear fuel and technology if recipient nations, many of them also nuclear suppliers, cooperate in curbing nuclear sales to countries that present proliferation risks.

Unfortunately, that policy has to date added up to all quids and no quos.

Last year, just before the economic meeting of heads of state in Ottawa, the Senate and the House, without a dissenting vote, passed resolutions calling on President Reagan to work out concrete ways to restrain all nuclear suppliers. The President, however, did not raise the issue at Ottawa. Instead, he joined in a final declaration that skimmed over the dangers.

Before the Versailles economic meeting this year, the House and Senate again unanimously passed resolutions calling on the President to discuss nuclear-supplier restraint. This time the declaration did not mention the issue.

Meanwhile, South Africa, unable to receive nuclear fuel it contracted to buy from the United States because of its record in the fight against the spread of nuclear arms, has bought uranium from Switzerland and other European countries. France is fabricating the uranium into fuel assemblies. Brazil, in a similar situation, has acquired nuclear fuel from West Germany for a new reactor. In neither instance did the United States try to dissuade its allies from helping these countries. In fact, the United States waived a $20 million penalty against Brazil for putting uranium that had not been enriched by the United States into its reactor, contrary to agreement.

Now the Administration has approved a policy to permit the export of reprocessing technology, used in extracting plutonium from nuclear fuel, to Japan and Common Market countries and to allow them to reprocess American-supplied nuclear fuel without obtaining American approval in each case. Republican and Democratic administrations have opposed such moves because plutonium is the material from which modern nuclear weapons are made.

While the Administration has been explicit in saying what concessions it intends to make to other countries, it has yet to indicate what cooperation it wants in return.

Fortunately, it is not too late. The United States should ask suppliers to agree not to export nuclear fuel and technology to any country that does not have nuclear weapons and that does not permit full-scope inspection of its nuclear plants.

As a collaterial measure, the United States would also need to urge nuclear suppliers to provide more money to the international inspection agency. Today, the agency's $30 million annual budget, smaller than that for the Portland, Ore., Police Department, is inadequate. A small contribution from each supplier nation could double its money.

These proposals could be expected to have wide acceptance. Canada and Australia as well as the United States already require full-scope safeguards as a condition of their nuclear exports. West Germany has promised similar restrictions providing that all other suppliers agree to them. Even the Soviet Union, also a nuclear supplier, has indicated a willingness to go along under such conditions. At the very least such proposals would signal our concern, which has not been given concerte affirmation by this Administration.

To continually miss the opportunities for voicing these concerns and for pressing a proposal for restraining nuclear trade is to risk an even more difficult challenge later—arms control negotiations on a far wider scale than any of us care to contemplate today.●

MR. PAVEL ZASLAVSKY

HON. JOSEPH F. SMITH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. SMITH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in an effort to improve emigration for Soviet dissidents and refuseniks. Countless Soviet Jews are victims of the oppressive Soviet system. As soon as they file an application for an exit visa to emigrate to Israel, almost as a rule, they are immediately fired from their jobs. Without jobs and a source of income to support themselves, the Soviets arrest them on charges of "parasitism." Once charged, it is impossible to be granted an exit visa. Forced into the role of outcast in society, they become victims of harassment, persecution, and physical and mental abuse. This is an intolerable situation that we, as Americans who deeply value human rights, must not let go unnoticed and uncensured.

Today, I would like to focus my colleagues' attention on the case of Mr. Pavel Zaslavsky, who had been subject to brutal harassment by the Soviet authorities. Mr. Zaslavsky has been driven by the one goal of raising his child in Israel with his wife, Irina. However, after he made his wish known to the Soviet authorities by applying for an exit visa in 1979, he was promptly fired from his job as an aeronautics engineer, and he was forced to terminate his activity in Jewish cultural activities in Moscow. Mr. Zaslavsky and his family face many new obstacles in their quest for freedom, but I strongly believe that by making this human injustice public, and by not waivering in our determination to press for his freedom that we can move closer to the day when free emigration is possible for Mr. Zaslavsky and all refuseniks.

Our effort to secure the right of emigration for all those daring to face new lives as free men and women must be renewed and continued. For Mr. Pavel Zaslavsky and his wife, Irina, and their daughter, Lina, let us dedicate ourselves to helping them realize their wish of living together in Israel.●

WILDERNESS PROTECTION MEASURE DESERVES OUR SUPPORT

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, for over a year there has been an intense debate taking place on the question of whether to allow oil and natural gas leasing in wilderness areas. The debate arose because the present administration in their rush to open public lands, proposed granting leases in several environmentally fragile areas. The outcry that resulted from this proposal crossed party lines and included Democrats and Republicans alike united in their concern to see that the essential wilderness character of these areas was not compromised.

The House Interior Committee held a number of hearings, including one I chaired in St. Paul, Minn., to gather information on the need and desirability of allowing oil and gas leasing within wilderness areas. The result of these hearings was to repudiate the plan set forth by Secretary of the Interior James Watt in H.R. 5603 and substitute bipartisan compromise legislation, H.R. 6542 to provide for the continued protection of wilderness areas.

I commend to the attention of my colleagues, the following Minneapolis Star and Tribune editorial, which outlines the actions taken to date on the wilderness issue and the further hurdles that remain before the necessary safeguards for wilderness areas from the harmful effects of oil and gas drilling are in place. I urge my colleagues positive support when H.R. 6542 is brought to the floor.

[From the Minneapolis Star and Tribune, July 12, 1982]

CLOSING A WILDERNESS ACT LOOPHOLE

The House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee has passed important, bipartisan legislation to close a loophole in U.S. wilderness protection. The resolution soon will come before the full House. It likely will pass. But to survive the Senate the legislation will need active support from influential Republicans like Minnesota Sen. Dave Durenberger. The resolution gives Republicans running for reelection, like Durenberger, a chance to demonstrate their environmental concern.

The Wilderness Act permanently closes existing wilderness areas to mineral leasing at the end of 1983. To date, few leases have been allowed. By seeking to speed up the tempo, the Reagan administration has aroused bipartisan opposition. Congressional pressure induced Interior Secretary James Watt earlier this year to impose a moratorium on leases for 1982. Thus, only in 1983 are leases possible without congressional consent.

Watt followed up his moratorium with a widely publicized profession of concern for wilderness protection. He proposed making all wilderness off-limits to oil and gas leases until the year 2000. But except for 1983, existing wilderness areas already are off-limits—not to 2000, but for good. And Watt's plan did not specify what would happen after the turn of the century.

Wilderness supporters in Congress rightly recognized the hollowness of Watt's plan. They also recognized that the easiest solution is congressional action to close the 1983 lease window. The resolution now before the House does that. It is sponsored principally by New Mexico Rep. Manual Lujan Jr., ranking Republican on the House committee, and Rep. John F. Seiberling, D-Ohio, chairman of the public lands and national parks subcommittee.

The resolution is a barebones compromise. It would cover 32.6-million acres of designated wilderness and land being considered for designation. Alaskan lands and those administered by the Bureau of Land Management would be exempted. The resolution would allow mineral exploration "compatible with the preservation of the wilderness environment." It also would permit wilderness mineral development, with congressional approval, in the event of "urgent national need."

That last provision is just right. Congress defines and designates wilderness; Congress should have a role in deciding when and for what purposes that designation is withdrawn.

The resolution's biggest hurdle is Sen. James McClure, R-Idaho, chairman of the Senate Energy Committee. McClure wants to add a deadline for deciding what additional lands will be designated wilderness. After the deadline, all nondesignated land would be released for mineral exploration and other uses.

The release provision deserves examination, but separately. The Lujan-Seiberling resolution is a narrowly drawn, sound response to the 1983 lease loophole. It deserves to be considered on its merits by both houses, not used as a bargaining chip. It also deserves discussion by senators seeking reelection, and by those who would take their place.●

THE PLO MUST GO

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, the continuing very delicate negotiations now in progress to achieve a peaceful resolution of the critical situation in Lebanon tend to obscure what is really at stake there. For the first time in more than a decade, the world has a chance to eliminate a nest of terrorism which has actively supported, encouraged, and conducted terrorist activities against not only Israel, but against freedom-loving governments around the globe.

I have been greatly encouraged by President Reagan's recognition of the fact that the PLO is an instrument of international terrorism actively supported by the Soviet Union. However, it appears to me that many Americans are overlooking this vital fact, when they condemn Israel for its actions of self defense in Lebanon. The Israelis have given us the chance to clean out this nest of terrorists. The PLO must leave Lebanon as part of any peaceful settlement.

A recent New York Times article by Israel's Consul General in New York, the Honorable Naphtali Lavie, details the grim history of the PLO's activities in Lebanon. I find Ambassador Lavie's article most illuminating. It deserves the thoughtful consideration of every Member of the Congress interested in a peaceful solution of the current situation in Lebanon. I ask that Ambassador Lavie's article be reprinted in full at this point in the RECORD, and I urge every one of my colleagues to give it thorough study in considering future U.S. policies in the Middle East.

THE EFFECT OF THE P.L.O. ON ITS LEBANESE HOSTS

(By Naphtali Lavie)

It will take a convoy of trucks several weeks to remove the weapons and ammunition Israel has captured from the Palestinian terrorists in Lebanon. But even now we know enough to confirm what many have long suspected: that within the past decade, the military arm of the Palestine Liberation Organization has been transformed into a quasi-army, organized in battalion and brigade formations, supported by Soviet-supplied guns, rocket launchers, mortars and tanks, and providing, in the meantime, an umbrella for like-minded terrorist organizations from Europe, Asia and the Arab world.

Much of what has been said about the invasion has dealt with Israel's motives, the death of Lebanese civilians and prospects for a more lasting peace. But it is worth reflecting on the nature of the enemy Israel confronts.

The Palestinian terrorists, backed by the Syrians, destroyed the delicate fabric of the Lebanese society so that Lebanon ceased to exist as an independent entity. The P.L.O., by force of arms, seized whole areas of the country, evicting residents, terrorizing the population and usurping Lebanese governmental authority. This violent suppression of sovereignty was euphemistically labeled "a state within a state." The Syrian troops assigned by the Arab countries to perform their so-called "peacekeeping" mission soon became one of the warring factions. Arriving to save the Christians from P.L.O. massacre, they joined forces with the P.L.O. onslaught. Instead of bringing peace, the Syrians intensified the fighting in pursuit of their aspirations to annex Lebanon as part of greater Syria. Even today the Syrians do not recognize Lebanon as an independent nation.

Under the protection of the Syrian troops, the P.L.O. expanded its occupation in southern Lebanon and in the Beirut area, turning farming villages and urban centers into bases of international terrorism. Members of the West German Baader-Meinhof gang, the Italian Red Brigades and the Japanese Red Army are only some of the terrorists trained and armed by the P.L.O. in Lebanon. Among the thousands of terrorist captured in Lebanon were those from Iran, Iraq, Yemen, Libya, Kuwait, Bangladesh, Jordan and Europe. And this is by no means the full extent of the evidence attesting to the dimensions of the terrorist activities originating from P.L.O. bases in southern Lebanon.

Documents carried by captured terrorists confirm the statement by Zehdi Labib Terzi, the P.L.O.'s United Nations observer, on Sept. 11, 1979: "There's no secret about it. Our boys go to the Soviet Union and socialist countries for military training. We get direct consignment of Soviet weapons."

Years of P.L.O. terror aimed at targets in Israel, Lebanon, Europe, Africa and Asia resulted in the loss of hundreds of innocent lives. Civil air traffic became an insufferable burden for passengers because of the constant threat of hijacking. The cause of the Palestinians has not been advanced; on the contrary, P.L.O. activities have brought more suffering to them. According to Lebanese reports, nearly 100,000 people were killed in the civil war, begun in 1975, in which the P.L.O. and the Syrian forces played their diabolical role.

Israel's operation in southern Lebanon was undertaken to remove the threat of terror against its citizens. At the same time new options for the Lebanese people and for the Palestinians have been created. Without military intimidation from Syrian troops and P.L.O. gangs, and effective central government can now reassert itself. All foreign troops—including Israel's—should leave Lebanon. Only in this way can the Lebanese reestablish their social and cultural institutions, and only then will an effective Lebanese government be restored. In the interim there may be a need for a multinational task force to assure that the explosive conditions that existed before June 6 do not recur.

The Palestinians in areas under Israeli control will not be free to negotiate self-government in accordance with the Camp David procedures. Those Palestinian leaders who privately expressed concern that P.L.O. coercion prevented them from reaching a settlement with Israel now have this opportunity.

The Egyptian-Russian connection, which precluded reconciliation between Egypt and Israel, was severed after the 1973 war. This paved the way for the peace between Egypt and Israel. Like Egypt, Lebanon, once again master of its own destiny, can renew and strengthen its ties to the United States and to the West.

The Lebanese, like Israelis, have the legitimate and elementary right to exist as a sovereign people in their own country, safe and secure. Lebanon and Israel used to have a peaceful border. In restoring this peace a great contribution will have been made toward a reasonable and promising solution to the Israel-Arab dispute. Only in this way can an equitable and lasting settlement for the Palestinian people be reached.

GEOGRAPHIC DISTRIBUTION OF FEDERAL FUNDS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. BONER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today legislation which seeks to continue and improve the information citizens have on the distribution of Federal spending throughout the U.S. economy. This information is even more vital today as Congress is making major changes in Federal spending and is considering sweeping changes in the responsibilities of Federal, State and local governments. We as legislators, as well as citizens at all levels, need to know how these changes will affect the different regions, States and localities. I know that I need to know and understand the regional implications of policy changes which are presently being proposed.

For about two decades, the United States has compiled data on the distribution of Federal outlays by varying levels of government. Reports entitled "Geographic Distribution of Federal Funds" have been published annually by the Community Services Administration for the Executive Office of the President. These reports have been an invaluable resource for Members of Congress and others who want to understand the regional impact of Federal activity.

For the past 2 years, the Office of Management and Budget has been hostile to the collection of such data. The data had been used by several Members to dispute OMB's claims that the President's budget cuts were fair and equitable to all regions. In fact, States in the Northeast and Midwest lost about $95 on a per capita basis as a result of the budget cuts last year, while Western States gained approximately $45 per capita according to the data collected.

Late last year, the data for fiscal year 1981 had already been prepared by Federal agencies and was ready to be submitted. Then, on December 14, 1981, Federal agencies were ordered not to report the data for fiscal year 1981. I felt then, and feel even more strongly now, that the decision by the Office of Management and Budget was a grevious mistake in that it greatly harmed the ability of Congress to understand the economic impact the congressional budgetary decisions were having on the various regions and levels of our governments.

Last December my colleague from Tennessee, (Senator SASSER) requested that the General Accounting Office both review the decision to terminate the publication of the geographic distribution of Federal funds reports as well as making a recommendation as to possible legislative remedies of the problems created by the OMB decision. Mr. Speaker, without objection I would seek unanimous consent to insert the letter from the Comptroller General at this point in my remarks.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., March 10, 1982.

Subject: Maintenance of the Geographic Distribution of Federal Funds (GDFF) Information System.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. SASSER: In response to your December 17, 1981, request, we have reviewed the Geographic Distribution of Federal Funds information system and several others in relation to the need for maintaining such information continuously. In doing so, we generally agree with you and your colleagues that a need exists for a comprehensive and quality information system on the geographic distribution of Federal funds. Such a system would assist the Congress, the executive branch, and others in understanding and assessing how congressional budget decisions affect regions, States, and localities. An information base is especially needed today given the rapid changes being proposed in Federal budget policies and the associated redefinition of the Federal-State role in conducting programmatic activities. An information base similar to the GDFF would help policymakers and legislators at all levels of Government in assessing the effects of funding shifts between and among Federal program areas.

Consistent with this view, we have developed two legislative alternatives for your consideration in addressing the maintenance of a GDFF type information base, see enclosures I and II. The legislative proposals address and delineate roles and responsibilities of the General Accounting Office (GAO) and the executive branch in maintaining an information base. Additionally, the alternatives address some procedural and standards development and audit activities necessary to improve the quality of data captured by the information base.

Notwithstanding the legislative alternative pursued, personnel and data processing resources will be required to successfully perform the requisite functions associated with the maintenance of this type of information base. Under legislative alternative I, in which the GAO is assigned the primary responsibility for operating the system, we estimate the first 3 years' cost to be $2.5 million. In each of the first two years the estimated costs would be $800,000 and in the third year costs would rise to $900,000. Under alternative II, in which the executive branch is assigned the lead responsibility for system operations and GAO an oversight and audit role, we estimate that for the same 3 year period costs would total $2.55 million. In this case, costs total $750,000, $850,000 and $950,000 in the first, second, and third year respectively. A more detailed breakdown of these cost estimates is included in Enclosure III.

ELIMINATION OF THE GDFF INFORMATION SYSTEM

To date, the GDFF had been the only fully operational system that attempted to capture and report obligations of all Government administered funds at the local level. It reported data from approximately 32 Federal agencies, including the Departments of Defense and State and the Agency for International Development, in the following programmatic and administrative areas: (1) domestic financial assistance, (2) procurement activities and (3) salary and expense payments to Federal employees. Given this system's scope and coverage, notwithstanding some of its known imperfections in data coverage and accuracy it had been used as a significant resource for several years in assessing the regional impact of Federal spending. The elimination of the GDFF information system as directed by OMB in December 1981 has created a short-term gap (1 to 3 years) in the availability of these data. As a result, not only are these data currently not available for analytical purposes, but the effect of Federal spending over time can no longer be assessed (trends).

Currently, the executive branch operates and maintains two information sources that are similar to the GDFF. Additionally, it is in the process of implementing a third source which when fully operational will capture and report a significant amount of the budgetary data previously reported by the GDFF. Although these sources are more likely to report a more accurate and complete set of data in their specific areas, neither of the two operational sources nor the one being implemented will be capable of depicting a global view of Federal expenditure activities as did the GDFF. These other sources are highlighted below.

The Federal Procurement Data System (FPDS) is fully operational and it assembles, organizes, and reports contract data from all Federal agencies and commissions. Agencies' contract and procurement divisions report procurement data on each transaction over $10,000 and summary data for contract actions less than $10,000. Each transaction is reported by zip code, county, city, State, territory and by principal place of performance.

The Federal Aid to States (FAS) which is an annual Department of Treasury publication, captures outlays for grants-in-aid to State and local governments. However, it reports data at the State level only. Being grants-in-aid oriented, this publication does not capture and report Federal obligations or expenditures for loan programs, procurement activities, Federal salaries and Administrative expenses, and several major agencies including the Department of State, the Agency for International Development and significant portions of the Department of Defense.

The Federal Assistance Awards Data System (FAADS) is a Federal domestic assistance oriented data system. It is currently in the implementation stage. It is estimated to be fully operational sometime during calendar year 1983. When fully operational, it will report Federal obligation data quarterly at the local recipient level. Because the system is "domestic assistance oriented," it was not designed to capture related Federal obligations or expenditures such as salaries and expenses of Federal employees, Federal procurement activities, and significant portions of the Department of Defense.

In viewing these other data sources singularly, none approximate the scope and coverage of the GDFF. However, from a collective view the potential exists for approximating the scope and coverage of the GDFF. Specifically, when FAADS is fully operational and used in conjunction with the FPDS, essentially the same data set can be captured and reported as was that by GDFF, except salary and expense payments to Federal employees and portions of the Department of Defense.

Table 1 depicts the areas of source coverage and the approximate dollar level of Federal funds for fiscal year 1980.

TABLE 1.—AREAS OF COVERAGE BY SOURCE AND APPROXIMATE FISCAL YEAR 1980 DOLLAR VALUE

Source	Grants, loans, other assistance	Procurement	Federal salaries and expenses	Dollar level (billions)
GDFF	Yes	Yes	Yes	[1] $528
FPDS	No	Yes	No	110
FAS	Limited	No	No	96
FAADS	Yes	No	No	[2] 377

[1] Dollar value and areas of coverage for FAADS, FPDS, and FAS are reflected in the GDFF, along with Federal salary and expense obligations.
[2] Assumes FAADS was fully operational in fiscal year 1980.

A significant disparity can be seen between the GDFF and any of the others. A smaller difference would exist between the dollar value of GDFF and the collective dollar value of the FAADS and FPDS. Given these differences, the status of the FAADS system, and the absence of GDFF, the Congress, the executive branch, and others will lose some ability in assessing the economic effect of congressional budgetary decisions in regions, States, and localities over the next few years.

OVERLAP AMONG THE SEVERAL DATA SYSTEMS

If the executive branch were to continue operating the GDFF in addition to FAADS, FPDS, and FAS, a high degree of overlap and redundancy would exist. The following examples illustrate this potential overlap:

Both the GDFF and FAADS systems capture budgetary data on all domestic assistance programs at the local level.

The GDFF and FPDS systems both capture and report Federal procurement activities at the local level.

The GDFF and FAS both report budget data on Federal grants-in-aid programs to State and local governments, although the GDFF captured and reported budget data in more detail.

FAADS captures and reports data on all domestic assistance oriented activities, which includes grants-in-aid programs data published in the FAS.

Clearly, a significant amount of unnecessary overlap and duplication would exist among these data sources. In the current budget environment, it is imperative that we get the most out of every dollar invested in capturing and reporting information. Accordingly, opportunities should be explored to maintain comprehensive and quality budget information by program area at the local level. At the same time, unnecessary redundancy in data collecting, processing, and reporting should be eliminated.

MAINTAINING THE GDFF INFORMATION SYSTEM

As indicated earlier, the elimination of the GDFF has created a short-term gap in the availability of Federal expenditure data at the local level. Accordingly, it should have been maintained at least until other executive systems are (1) fully operational, (2) integrated, and (3) approximate the current scope and coverage of the GDFF. Maintaining this system would insure the ability of the Congress, as well as others, to assess the economic effect of Federal budget decisions at the local level. During the maintenance period, the executive branch should explore alternatives for phasing out undesirable redundancy in data gathering and reporting activities. In doing so, it should remain sensitive to the continuous information needs of the Congress.

LONGER TERM CONSIDERATIONS

To insure the continuous collecting, processing, and reporting of geographic distribution of Federal funds systematically and comprehensively, we have developed two legislative alternatives. Both alternatives recognize the critical need for improving the quality and consistency of the type of budgetary data captured and maintained. Accordingly, they both delineate the promulgation of procedures and standards for data collection and verification. Additionally, both alternatives recognize the need to insure adherence to standards. In general, the legislative alternatives are:

Legislative Alternative I—The primary responsibility for maintaining and operating the geographic distribution of Federal funds information base would be assigned to GAO. The GAO would be responsible for performing all functions associated with developing, implementing, updating, and maintaining the information system. The executive branch would only be required to collect and report data to the GAO in accordance with prescribed standards, guidelines, and procedures.

Legislative Alternative II—This alternative would direct the GAO to promulgate data collection procedures, guidelines, and standards. Also, the GAO would monitor and conduct periodic audits of the adherence to these standards. On the other hand, the executive branch would be charged with carrying out and performing all operational activities associated with maintaining the geographic distribution of Federal funds information base. These operational activities would include, but would not be limited to (1) collecting, reviewing, validating, and processing input data; (2) updating and maintaining the information systems; and (3) generating required outputs for users, including the regional data analysis centers.

If either of these alternatives is to be pursued, we strongly recommend that it be alternative II. That approach would create the opportunity to consolidate, streamline, and reduce undesirable overlap and duplication among existing systems. There are other reasons for preferring alternative II (1) executive agency program managers possess the knowledge and awareness of program activities, (2) data collection would be closer to the source in which programs are operated, and (3) computer facilities are in place. I would find it very difficult to support alternative I.

This information has been forwarded to the Honorable Donald W. Riegle.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES A. BOWSHER,
Comptroller General of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation I am introducing today is the same as reported by the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs last May 12, and is the product of extensive hearings by the other legislative body as well as being based on the recommendations made by the General Accounting Office. I wish to stress that the GAO's report indicated that there is a great need for continuous information about the geographic distribution of Federal funds so that "* * * policymakers and legislators at all levels of government (will have help) in assessing the effects of funding shifts between and among Federal program areas." Without such information, it will be impossible to discern the effect of Federal spending over time and thus no proper assessments can be made.

Without such information we, as policymakers, will be left floundering in our own ignorance. And while I admit that even a blind pig will find a truffle every once in awhile, policy decision should not be left to such whim. Therefore, it is imperative that the Congress have as solid an informational base as possible on which to make judgments about forthcoming New Federalism proposals. It is my belief that this legislation will provide that necessary informational base.●

A TRIBUTE TO GASTON FAISON

HON. EUGENE JOHNSTON

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Gaston Faison served his friends and neighbors in Guilford County, N.C. as a chairman of the Board of County Commissioners. Most of the time he was known simply as "Brother."

Brother Faison knew how to help people in need of a friend because he understood human weakness. Many years ago, Brother Faison fell into a deep, dark hole—addiction to alcohol. But he pulled himself out of that hole and dedicated himself to service to others ever since.

Brother Faison recognized what was important in life and what was not. The fact that he was stricken with cancer was not so important to him. He set his goals and he stuck to them. It always added up to doing something for others and never worrying about himself. But he never tried to change other people. One of his favorite bits of philosophy was this:

Accept with grace the things in life you cannot change, such as other people's attitudes.

Another was this:

Change the things in life you can, such as your own attitude.

Brother Faison didn't try to change other people's attitudes, but he did despite himself. He taught everyone who knew him that people can change themselves and that in every person, no matter how deep or dark his own problems may be, there is that glorious human potential. Brother Faison reached his human potential. He died Saturday, July 17, his body destroyed by cancer but his soul and spirit never conquered. He was a man as fulfilled as any could ever be, for he left thousands of friends who were proud, as I was, to call him Brother. Truly Guilford County, the people of North Carolina, and the Nation have lost a "Brother."●

WHERE'S THE OUTRAGE OVER "YELLOW RAIN"?

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Ernest Conine, an editorial writer in the Los Angeles Times, raises a useful point for discussion in his commentary, appearing July 19 in the Times, on the Soviet use of chemical warfare. He asks "Where's the Outrage Over Yellow Rain"?

Mr. Conine's discussion of the Soviet violations of two international agreements presents a clear understanding of why there has been so little public criticism of the Soviets. I urge my colleagues to review his thoughtful analysis.

[From the Los Angeles Times, July 19, 1982]

WHERE'S THE OUTRAGE OVER "YELLOW RAIN"?

(By Ernest Conine)

Sometime this fall, a U.N. investigating team is supposed to issue a final report on whether the Soviet Union and its allies have used deadly chemical and biological weapons in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan.

The known evidence is damning, especially in the case of Laos and Cambodia. But if you expect the U.N. report to trigger worldwide condemnation of Moscow and demands for a new, cheatproof treaty to prevent such violations of international law, you are almost certainly going to be disappointed.

To begin with, the U.N. report is unlikely to be a hard-hitting, unambiguous indictment—for several reasons.

The investigation itself has been a lethargic exercise. This is not too surprising, considering that it has been conducted under the administrative control of U.N. Under Secretary-General Viacheslav A. Ustinov, a Soviet citizen.

Even if this were not the case, the investigators were denied access to the Communist-run areas where, according to witnesses, so-called "yellow rain" and other killing substances were used. The detectives, in other words, were not allowed to visit the scene of the crime.

The real problem, however, is not lack of evidence—information collected by American and other non-U.N. investigators supports a presumption of guilt—but the absence of political will to do anything about it.

That reluctance is especially pronounced among Third World nations—which is peculiar, considering that the target populations have all been people with yellow or brown skins—but it also exists within the American and allied governments.

Considering the horrible nature of chemical and biological weapons—the State Department's "conservative" estimate is that at least 10,000 people have died—the outrage gap is itself outrageous.

A defecting Laotian air force pilot told of being on chemical-dropping duty for two years. U.S. investigators have collected many eyewitness accounts of gas bombs dropped on villages in Laos and Cambodia by Soviet-made planes.

In accounts that were remarkably similar in detail, refugees described the death throes of victims suffering from burning of the eyes, nose and throat; diarrhea; internal hemorrhaging; profuse external bleeding through the nose and other orifices, and, finally, "jerking like fish when you take them out of the water."

Various kinds of chemicals appear to have been used. But samples of vegetation, rock scrapings, blood and urine smuggled out from battle areas in Laos and Cambodia have been identified by Shester Mirocha, a University of Minnesota expert on the subject, as an organic toxin called T2.

According to scientists, the fungus that produces this family of poisons does not occur in nature in Southeast Asia, but has long been known in Russia.

Author Sterling Seagrave reports that when he was in Thailand collecting material for his book, "Yellow Rain," Thai and American radio monitors picked up radio intercepts from Soviet and Vietnamese military transmissions mentioning four separate chemical-warfare depots.

One identified the Soviet Union as the source of the chemicals in the depots. And satellite photographs of the four sites "showed them to be high-security areas surrounded by barbed-wire and chain-link fences."

Physical evidence from Afghanistan so far is missing, but eyewitness accounts bear a strong similarity to those in Southeast Asia.

If the Soviets have manufactured biotoxins and used them directly or distributed them to Vietnamese and Afghan government forces, they are clearly in violation of two international agreements that they have signed.

One is the Geneva protocol of 1925, which outlawed the use of poison gas and "bacteriological methods of warfare." The other is the Biological Weapons Convention of 1972, which made it illegal "to develop, produce, stockpile or otherwise acquire or retain" biological weapons.

The Soviet Union, of course, indignantly denies guilt. In his recent message to the U.N. disarmament conference, Leonid I. Brezhnev piously pronounced his country the "convinced champion" of the elimination of chemical weapons from "the face of the Earth."

But neither the Soviets nor the governments of Laos and Vietnam have seen fit to accept President Reagan's proposal that they grant "full and free access" to their territories so that the truth may be determined.

Actually, way back in the 1960's witnesses who were considered reliable by both the British and American governments told of Soviet use of mustard gas and what appeared to be nerve gas in the civil war in Yemen, on the Saudi Arabian peninsula. But the world paid little attention.

Intelligence agencies and other outside experts did perk up in 1979, however, when an outbreak of anthrax occurred at Sverdlovsk, in an area of the Soviet Union closed to foreigners. At least 200 people were said to have died.

The Soviets admitted the outbreak, but claimed that it resulted from careless handling of contaminated food. U.S. intelligence sources said then, and say now, that the real cause was an explosion at a bacteriological-weapons factory. But no international inspection was permitted. Against this background, it is disgraceful that the world may be willing to let the Soviets off the hook.

Many Americans have been reluctant to accept the allegations against Moscow for fear that the result would be to help the Reagan Administration make its case for resumption of nerve-gas production, which was unilaterally halted by President Richard M. Nixon in 1969.

Others are seemingly unable to comprehend the difference between the criminal carelessness with which Agent Orange and other defoliants and herbicides were used by U.S. forces in Vietnam, and the Soviet-sponsored employment of far more deadly gases for the specific purpose of slaughtering human beings.

Finally, there are those who do not want anything, including a squabble over Soviet violations of international conventions on biological and chemical weapons, to get in the way of negotiations to reduce nuclear arms.

Even the Reagan Administration, which has been vigorous so far in pushing the case against the Soviets, may well lose its zeal as its political commitment to the strategic arms reduction talks grows deeper.

That is unfortunate, but the sense of priorities that it reflects is respectable. Much less defensible is the see-no-evil, hear-no-evil tendency that appears to be prevalent in the Third World.

After all, the Soviet Union has not yet used the horrible stuff against its predominantly white adversaries in the West. T2 and other deadly gases have been used only against men, women and children in Asia and the Near East—including Muslim Yemen and Afghanistan.●

TAXPAYERS COALITION AGAINST CLINCH RIVER

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, last month the Taxpayers Coalition Against Clinch River was initiated and its plans for terminating funding for the Clinch River Breeder Reactor were announced. I would like to take this opportunity to endorse the coalition and to bring to your attention the coalition's arguments against the Clinch River project.

Given the facts outlined in the following coalition publication, which I am inserting today in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I believe we cannot rationally justify continued substantial investment in Clinch River. This breeder reactor escaped termination by a 20-vote margin in the House and an even closer 2-vote margin in the Senate last year. I urge you to join me in calling for a vote again this year on this issue and in supporting an end, once and for all, to the dubious and expensive Clinch River Breeder Reactor. We can no longer afford to gamble on a project that will adversely affect our economy and our entire energy outlook in the long run.

TAXPAYERS' QUESTIONS ABOUT THE CLINCH RIVER BREEDER REACTOR

A breeder reactor is a nuclear reactor that produces fuel while it generates electricity. A Liquid Metal Fast Breeder Reactor (LMFBR) is a breeder reactor that uses a liquid metal, most often sodium, to cool the reactor and keep the nuclear chain reaction going. Most current reactors, called Light Water Reactors (LWRs), use water for these purposes.

Breeder reactors have long appealed to nuclear physicists because they offer the promise of inexhaustible energy, with each successive breeder reactor producing more fuel for the next reactor. With this goal in mind, the federal Atomic Energy Commission conceived the Liquid Metal Fast Breeder Reactor Project in 1969. In 1972, President Nixon announced the federal government's commitment to building an LMFBR along the Clinch River near Oak Ridge, Tennessee. In 1973, the AEC signed an agreement with TVA and a consortium of over 700 public and private utilities to build the Clinch River Breeder Reactor (CRBR) as a cooperative demonstration project.

Since 1973, the CRBR has been controversial in Congress and among energy experts. In 1981, Congress approved the project's funding by the closest margin yet—20 votes in the House of Representatives and only 2 votes in the Senate.[1] Senators and Representatives of both political parties, and all philosophical views on government spending and nuclear power, charged that continued federal funding of the CRBR in the face of record budget deficits would be wasteful, unnecessary and unwise.

Q: Do energy experts rate the CRBR as a high priority research project?

A: DOE's own blue-ribbon Energy Research Advisory Board, in a 1981 report on "Federal Energy R&D Priorities", ranked the CRBR as a lower priority item. "The ERAB believes that the construction of a breeder reactor demonstration at this time is not an urgent priority and thus, under current budget constraints, recommends that such a demonstration be delayed until a future time."[2]

Q: How much has the CRBR's cost escalated over the past decade?

A: The estimated cost of the CRBR has increased more than seven-fold.

The original estimate in 1971 was $400 million.[3]

The estimate rose to $700 million in 1972.[4]

It jumped to $2 billion in 1977.[5]

The current estimate is $3.57 billion, and ground has not yet been broken.[6]

Q: How much will the CRBR finally cost?

A: The CRBR's final cost could be over $7 billion. The first-full scale commercial fast breeder reactor, the French Super Phenix, is expected to cost at least $6 billion when it is completed in 1983.[7] A 1981 Rand Corporation report prepared for the Department of Energy emphasized that, for pioneer energy projects, capital cost estimates are poor predictors of actual capital costs. According to the Rand report, these projects average 100 percent cost overruns.[8]

Approximately $1.1 billion had been spent on CRBR by September, 1981; $2.5 billion still must be appropriated to complete the project at current cost estimates.[9] Once construction begins costs can be expected to rise even further.

Q: How much of CRBR's cost will private industry pay?

A: American taxpayers will bear over 90% of the cost. The ceiling on the private utilities' share is frozen at $257 million—only 7.2% of the projected total cost. The CRBR project was originally portrayed as an equal partnership between the U.S. government, the nuclear industry, and the nation's electric utilities. However, in the 1973 Letter of Agreement between the Atomic Energy Commission and the utility consortium, the government agreed to be responsible for all cost overruns beyond the initial estimate.[10] In addition, the private utilities' lawyer indicated in a Congressional hearing last year that, because of recent delays in the project's construction, the utilities feel free to renege on even that limited commitment.[11]

Q: How much would it cost the taxpayers to terminate the Clinch River Breeder project?

A: In 1981, the House Science and Technology Committee voted to defund the CRBR and set aside $44.5 million to cover the project's closeout costs.[12] This amounts to 1.74% of the cost to complete the project.

Q: Will CRBR help the nuclear industry out of its current slump?

A: Building the CRBR will not make nuclear power more cost-competitive with other ways to generate electricity or with improved energy efficiency. It will not hasten progress toward nuclear waste disposal, nor produce solutions to and of the safety and reliability problems now plaguing light water reactors.

Mason Willrich, Vice-President for Corporate Planning of the giant West Coast utility, Pacific Gas and Electric Company, recently put the industry's needs in perspective: "U.S. electric utilities may be understandably reluctant to order additional nuclear power plants as long as the cleanup of the Three Mile Island accident remains stalled . . . It seems to me ironic that the federal government is now pushing ahead with the Clinch River demonstration breeder reactor at a time when a disabled light water reactor immediately threatens the future of the light water reactor industry. There will be no market for breeder reactors unless there is a prolonged period of expansion in the market for light water reactors. If the Reagan administration intends to revive and maintain a viable nuclear power option in the United States, the Three Mile Island cleanup should have, in the near term, a higher priority in the use of scarce government funds than breeder reactor development."[13]

Q: Would any federal reactor research programs prove more beneficial than CRBR to the nuclear industry and its consumers?

A: A more promising research area according to Henry D. Sokolski, visiting scholar at the Heritage Foundation, is DOE's extended burnup program, which is aimed at improving the efficiency of existing reactors. Sokolski pointed out in recent House testimony that the extended burnup program could save utility customers at least $13 billion by the year 2000, at a cost of $33 million in current dollars—a 385/1 benefit/cost ratio! However, the administration proposes to impair this program's effectiveness, drastically reducing its funding by 80%.[14]

A: During the 1970's, the U.S. energy picture changed in ways that have invalidated the basic assumptions on which CRBR was justified.

Assumption: The 7% annual electrical growth rate that prevailed between 1960–73 would continue through the rest of the century.

Reality: Electricity growth rates have dropped below 3% annually. A November, 1981 House Science and Technology Committee report concluded that overall U.S. energy use is dropping, and this trend is not temporary. This report also predicted that electricity demand growth will increase at a rate well below 2% per year.[15]

Assumption: Nuclear power would account for much of that electricity growth.

Reality: The Energy Information Administration now predicts that nuclear power will contribute 145–185 gigawatts of electricity in the year 2000, less than 15% of the previously-projected 1200 gigawatts.[16] Most outside experts consider EIA's current estimate to be high.[17]

Assumption: Uranium would be scarce and expensive by the year 2000.

Reality: The cancellation of over 60 U.S. nuclear power plant orders since 1975, together with the drop in electrical demand growth and the development of new uranium reserves, has created a uranium glut.[18] During 1980, twice as much uranium ore was mined as was used in U.S. reactors.[19] Meanwhile, DOE's National Uranium Resource Evaluation (NURE) program report points to a 50% increase over previous uranium resource projections. An additional 50% improvement in efficiency of uranium use would result from fairly simple modifications in the fuel design and management of existing LWRs and advances in enrichment technology.[20]

Uranium now costs much less than was projected in the 1970's; the most recent spot market price is only $23/lb.[21] A June, 1981 study by Los Alamos National Laboratories found that the breeder will not be economical until the price of uranium reaches $165/lb.[22] A November, 1981 Energy Research Advisory Board report concluded that the break-even price may reach $400/lb.[23]

Q: Will breeder reactors ever cost less than standard light water reactors?

A: A 1979 update of a 1975 American Enterprise institute economic analysis concluded that the breeder will provide no cost savings over LWRs in the foreseeable future. This analysis indicates that the breeder cannot be economically viable until well into the next century.[24]

The General Accounting Office recently advised Congress that "a commercially deployed LMFBR will probably not be needed until well past the year 2020—the furthest that DOE now makes nuclear power projections."[25]

The original argument for developing the CRBR was that more efficient fuel utilization would make it cheaper than an LWR. However, construction costs, rather than fuel, represent the largest share of a nuclear reactor's total cost. The world's first and only commercial-sized breeder (in France) will cost more than twice as much to build as an LWR.[26]

Q: Will the Clinch River Breeder Reactor reduce our dependence on foreign oil?

A: The CRBR will not lessen our dependence on foreign oil. U.S. oil demand is largely for transportation and other liquid fuel uses. Only 7% of the oil we consume is used to generate electricity.[27]

Oil-generated electricity dropped from 16.6% of all U.S. electricity in 1978 to 10.6% in 1980. (In 1981, it dropped again to 8.9%). In that same 1978–1980 period coal-generated electricity increased from 44.3% to 50.4%, but nuclear-generated electricity dropped from 12.5% to 10.9%.[28] These figures demonstrate that coal, not nuclear, is replacing oil as a fuel for electric power plants. This has already happened in the TVA region, which CRBR would serve; TVA does not now operate any oil-fired baseload power plants.

If the $2.5 billion that is needed to finish CRBR were instead spent on insulating American homes, we would save the equivalent of 48 million barrels of oil each year for the next 25 years, at a cost of only $2 per barrel of oil equivalent saved.[29]

Q: Do we need to build the CRBR to keep up with foreign breeder programs?

A: The foreign breeder programs have not proceeded as rapidly or as successfully as anticipated. The Japanese and European programs have been plagued by significant schedule slippages and enormous cost escalations. The French Super Phenix reactor, scheduled for completion in late 1983, will cost an estimated $6 billion.[30] As James L. Cochrane of the CIA Office of Economic Research said in January, 1981, ". . . the French Breeder program faces strong economic problems that portend a bleak future for its survival, much less its expansion—contrary to what is presented in the popular and trade press."[31] Since then, the French government has deferred plans to build four more commercial breeder reactors.[32]

Q: Is CRBR an essential element of our nuclear energy research and development program?

A: Building the CRBR is not necessary to continue advanced breeder reactor R&D. LMFBR research could focus on the Fast Flux Test Facility that is now operational at Hanford, Washington, and other active breeder research and development projects. The federal budget includes sufficient funds for an ongoing breeder research program without the Clinch River Breeder. The 1983 DOE budget allocates $1.016 billion for nuclear fission programs, of which $324 million is for the breeder research program—in addition to the $252.5 million for the Clinch River Breeder.

Q: Is the CRBR's design technically up to date?

A: Conceived more than a decade ago, the CRBR relies on outdated technology. The CRBR "loop" type reactor vessel is already six or more years behind the "pool" designs the French have built, and when complete will be at least sixteen years out of date.[33]

In a 1976 design review, Burns & Roe, the CRBR architect-engineer, and Rockwell International, a major CRBR subcontractor, indicated that the "pool" design is safer, faster to build, and less expensive than the "loop" method. Despite their analysis, DOE and Burns & Roe continue to employ the "loop" technology in the CRBR design.[34]

Q: Is the CRBR's development proceeding smoothly and economically?

A: CRBR has severe technical and management problems. A 1981 investigation by the House Energy and Commerce Committee's Oversight Subcommittee staff revealed that CRBR's prime contracts are inadequately drawn and badly administered. Contracts were approved without cost ceilings, firm schedules or performance guidelines.[35] More recently, the U.S. Comptroller General concluded that "many aspects of the contracting process are questionable". As a result, key components, such as the prototype steam generator, have come in years late and 1000% over cost.[36]

The Comptroller General, Congress' watchdog over federal spending criticized in a May 1982 report, DOE's plan to buy a full set of steam generators without thoroughly testing the prototype, a financially risky move that DOE adopted on the basis of advice from a panel of nuclear industry consultants.[37] The safety and reliability of the CRBR will depend heavily on the performance of the steam generators, key components that have prematurely failed in a number of conventional reactors.

As early as 1973, Burns & Roe, the major subcontractor, debated whether to continue with the Clinch River project. In an internal document, Burns & Roe admitted that "the PMC General Manager has privately advised Burns & Roe to get out of the LMFBR job now, since it does not have a chance of success and could harm us badly" and that "the PMC organization has lost much of its desire and determination to manage the project and, perhaps, the ability to do so."[38]

Q: Is federal funding of the Clinch River Breeder Reactor (CRBR) consistent with a free-market energy policy?

A: The case against federal funding for the CRBR is stronger than ever. "After a careful, in-depth review of the economics of the project, I have come to the conclusion that it is totally incompatible with our free

The Clinch River Breeder Reactor has never been an economically sensible project, and yet it continues to be funded by an administration that claims to reject government subsidies for energy development.●

TERMINATION OF SOCIAL SECURITY COVERAGE

HON. J. J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an analysis of one of the plans being offered to employers as an "alternative" to social security. As that analysis shows, there is no alternative to social security as far as the beneficiary is concerned. The committee, and I know many Members, are concerned that State and local governments and nonprofit organizations which currently have the option of terminating coverage for their employees are under much pressure now to do so.

As a further aid to Members in addressing this problem I enclose today a further analysis of the decision process faced by employers who are considering terminating coverage for their employees and replacing it with one of these "alternative" plans. Both portions of this analysis were done by Donald F. Smith and Associates of Princeton, N.J., at the request of several hospital associations.

ALTERNATIVE TO SOCIAL SECURITY

SELLING THE EMPLOYER

This section examines the various arguments which are used to sell the employer on opting out of Social Security. They fall into three major categories—to save money; to have more control over the benefits; and because Social Security is going bankrupt.

TO SAVE MONEY

1. The rising cost of Social Security is widely cited as the reason for looking for an alternate program. Actually, the tax rate is only scheduled to increase 18 percent from 1978 through 1987.

2. The high increase in Social Security costs has forced employers to reduce pension benefits. It is very difficult to reduce the benefits provided under a pension plan and it is doubtful that many employers have done so because of the rise in Social Security costs. Even when Social Security benefits were decreased by the 1977 amendment, the large majority of employers maintained their benefit level and paid the additional cost.

3. An employer can control costs by excluding temporary and part-time employees. The employer can legally exclude part-time and temporary employees. However, since the employer is already providing Social Security benefits for these people, just dropping their benefits would seem to be bad public relations provided the employee understands the extent of his loss. Many part-time employees intend to return to full-time work when family responsibilities change. These employees work just enough to keep fully and currently insured status for Social Security so this would be a major loss for them. For other employees, their part-time hospital employment is a second job which boosts their overall earnings. They also would lose benefits.

4. The millions of dollars that could be saved by the hospital over the next ten years is often pointed out. This looks better on paper. When you look at the actual dollar savings as a percent of total budget, it is really quite small. The savings figures also fail to mention the increased administration burden that falls on the employer. The employer will never be able to accurately estimate the increased time spent in explaining the system to new employees, handling claims that previously were handled by Social Security, filing reports with ERISA, having to deal with employee requests for benefits and with all the claim review procedures required by ERISA instead of letting the Social Security administration take care of all that.

There is no motivation for an employer who has withdrawn from Social Security even to try to measure these items since it cannot rejoin Social Security. It is also unlikely that anyone would be willing to stand up and say that they made the switch but it was more costly than they anticipated.

The future administrative burden would appear even heavier than the current one. Just project the current turnover rate 20 years into the future and add ERISA's requirements and you have a nightmare. The employer has a continuing responsibility for every dollar collected for every employee who ever worked for it, no matter for how short a time. Every time one of them gets disabled, even 5 or 10 years after they terminate, they are going to be looking for a benefit and someone at the hospital will have to take time to answer them or else answer to the Department of Labor. The alternative is to force payment of account balances under a certain amount at the time of termination. Then the employee must roll the amount over into an Individual Retirement Account in order not to lose the retirement benefit or have additional taxable income. Chances are many employees will not make the rollover unless they already have an established Individual Retirement Account.

National Security will service the account by enrolling new employees, answering questions and processing terminations. How? By mail? By hotline? By personal visit once a month? How much compensation do they get to do it? If their service slows down, or they go out of business, with whom does the hospital replace them? There is not much competition in this field. What happens if future legislation requires the employer to change back to Social Security in a few years? The record keeping will go on forever with no new money coming in. Who pays the costs then? The employee pays the cost through reduced earnings on his invested funds.

MORE CONTROL

1. Employers have control over National Security but they do not have control over Social Security. This is fanciful. If the employer wants to stay in business, it needs to stay competitive with Social Security to stay in the job market. This substantially limits the employer's control.

2. Because of this presumed "control over costs," planning and budgeting can be precise. This is not true. An employer gets far more notice of an impending change in Social Security than the 30 days notice it will get from an insurance company if the long term disability, survivor benefits, or life insurance need a rate increase. The interest rates credited to the Tax Sheltered Annuity contracts used for retirement benefits follow the general trends in long term interest rates and are subject to change annually after the initial guarantees run out.

3. The literature selling the alternate plan to employers stipulates that the employer can control the contribution rate and wage base. This is really not accurate if the employer is going to provide benefits which actually replace Social Security. Every time Social Security goes up, the employer's plan must respond and that is going to cost more money. On the other hand, if interest rates paid on Tax Sheltered Annuities fall, the employer may have to increase contrubutions to maintain benefits that are equivalent to Social Security. Another factor which will affect the employer's cost is its claims experience under the survivor and disability coverages. These are insured benefits and subject to rate increases if claims experience is bad. Most employers have only to look at their medical care or disability cost for the past 5–10 years to realize what little chance they have of controlling the costs.

The employer can set a rate and stick with it. That just means that benefits will reduce if costs increase. Consider the cost of living adjustments under Social Security disability and retirement benefits. Granted, the cost of living adjustments are currently causing problems for Social Security. However, it is also what is making Social Security work for today's beneficiaries. The alternate plan is not solving any difficulties by saying "maybe excess interest earnings will help take care of the problem." It is avoiding the problem.

Actually, long term disability coverage is a very volatile coverage. It is particularly susceptible to economic downturns. The market for it runs hot and cold. Hospital's have a class of employee that is a worse than average risk. In addition, the size of the employer is relatively small so there is no effective spread of risk. These factors combine to produce a very unstable cost.

SOCIAL SECURITY WILL BE BANKRUPT

The Social Security retirement fund will be bankrupt by the year 2030, the disability fund by 2007, and the Medicare fund by 1989. Some estimates are even worse than these. This is a favorite with everyone. However, it is difficult to see how the U.S. Government could let the Social Security system go bankrupt and default on its promises to its citizens. It would produce collapse of our domestic economy. In addition, it would ruin our credit with other countries. If you would default on your own taxpayers, what would you do to another country?

The Social Security system is becoming more and more important politically. As we rise up the pyramid toward one retiree for each worker, the political power of the retirees increases. An example of this was the recent drop in President Reagan's popularity which was attributed almost entirely to his proposals to cut back Social Security.

Statistics on bankruptcy do not mean that it is going to happen, only that something is going to change—either benefits, costs, or funding methods or some combination thereof. Depending on what happens, the alternate plan will become more or less attractive. Financing Medicare differently is the most likely first step. Moving the retirement age to 67 or 68 is also likely.

The benefits from the alternate plan are already taxable in total, so if the benefits provided by the employer's half of Social Security become subject to income tax, the two plans would be equal in that respect. If Social Security is funded in whole or part from general revenues, non-covered employees will be paying twice.

MAKING THE DECISION

There are no independent "experts" on the subject of opting out of Social Security. The situation is further complicated by the fact that while the Social Security Administration is usually given a chance to present their side, their employees do not know enough about insurance, tax sheltered annuities, actuarial assumptions, and tax law to argue their case effectively. This means that the employer must rely on the information presented by the selling company.

This section of the report will examine the typical decision process briefly. Then, the information on which the decision is made will be examined in more detail.

THE DECISION PROCESS

The typical employer who is considering opting out of Social Security files its notice of intention to withdraw from Social Security after some preliminary investigations into the subject. During the two year waiting period before the withdrawal becomes effective, most employers have massive studies conducted to prove that they can get out of Social Security and still provide better benefits (or at least comparable ones) and save money for both the employer and the employee as well.

The study usually includes individual benefit illustrations for each employee, showing the anticipated benefits under Social Security and the alternate plan. These illustrations, along with the employee booklet, are presented to the current group of employees for their reaction. If the reaction is positive, the employer usually goes ahead with the alternate plan. If it is negative, the employer stays with Social Security.

Because of this, it is vitally important to examine the information given to the employee to see if he really has all the information needed to make a decision which will affect all of the present and future employees for the forseeable future. The next part of this section will examine the employee promotional material in detail.

There is one further question that should be considered. Is the employee capable and willing to look as far into the future as this decision requires? It could easily be argued that the current national mentality is to grab it now and spend it quickly. It will cost more or be worth less tomorrow. Our present high level of inflation has made it difficult for the average person to look five years down the road. This has a decided effect on the employee's ability to make a decision which is as awesome and long term as opting out of Social Security.

The average employee probably does not look five years down the road to see the disability benefits he may be losing (if he is even aware he is losing them). He probably does not even look two years down the road. In fact, he may not look past the 1 percent additional take-home pay or the 6 percent of pay he no longer has to pay income taxes on. He gets a nice illustration that shows he will have higher retirement benefits 10, 20, or 40 years down the road. He probably does not even believe that. He just thinks that if his employer has checked it out and says it's okay, he will believe it. After all he reads in the paper, he does not have too much confidence in Social Security either!

What is actually happening is the employee is passing the buck back to the employer, not making a real decision. It is easier to go along with your employer and not rock the boat than to fight. In the absence of a union, probably only a small majority of employees would risk their jobs by standing up against an idea like this—especially when they have been kept informed right along so nothing was secret. The problem is compounded by the fact that they cannot possibly have the expertise to rebut such an idea. The best they could offer is their gut reaction to the subject and that is not considered valid for making a decision.

This report is not going to touch on the subject of who should have responsibility for this decision. But an employer considering a change should examine just how the decision will actually be made and upon what information the decision will be based. The answer may be surprising.

Comment

A major undercurrent of all of the above statements is that the retirement benefit is the only one most employees will ever enjoy, so concentrate on that. The argument is true. However, most people carry fire insurance but only 1 house in 1,200 will burn down. That is what insurance is all about. It lets the insured person sleep at night.

The alternate plan focuses on the savings element of Social Security—the retirement benefit—and a few of the other major benefits and ignores many of the insurance aspects which are present in all of the other coverages. It is rather like buying a standard fire insurance policy instead of homeowners coverage. What happens when the pipes break?

The government has accepted the role of our keeper by designing a program which provides for both savings and insurance. If the employer is going to replace government, he should be willing to accept the responsibility as well. It is agreed that people are lulled a little because the Social Security benefits are not as great as they think, but the benefits are a lot better than none at all.●

HAIR-TRIGGER MISSILES

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, a recent editorial in the Los Angeles Times discusses the dangers related to Soviet intentions to place its strategic missiles on "hair trigger alert" so that they could be fired on extremely short notice. It also describes U.S. intentions to deploy the MX and Pershing II missiles to offset the Soviet advantage of their SS-20 missiles aimed at Western Europe.

The editorial presents a thought-provoking analysis of the best approach to arms reduction negotiations in order to reduce the level of nuclear tension between the two nations. I urge my colleagues to give thoughtful consideration to this commentary.

The editorial follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, July 18, 1982]

HAIR-TRIGGER MISSILES

Defense Minister Dmitri F. Ustinov is the sort of dominant figure in the Soviet Military-industrial complex that Robert S. McNamara was in his heyday as defense secretary in the Kennedy and Johnson administrations.

It follows that, when the Communist Party newspaper Pravda devotes a full page to his ruminations on the strategic balance and the strategic arms reduction talks with the United States, it's worth taking notice.

Ustinov, defending the Kremlin's announced policy not to be the first to use nuclear weapons, strongly hinted that the Soviet Union was increasingly inclined to put its strategic nuclear missiles on a hair-trigger alert so that they could be fired on extremely short notice.

Western analysts believe that Ustinov's article was to some extent intended to reassure Soviet military men that, despite the Kremlin's propagandistic no-first-use declaration, the Soviet Union would not be left vulnerable to a U.S. attack.

It is important to recognize, though, that Ustinov's article also contains a sobering message for both the Reagan Administration and its critics as the START negotiations proceed in Geneva.

The strategic nuclear missiles in the Soviets' arsenal outnumber the Americans' by about 2,350 to 1,700. The warheads on missiles on each side number about 7,500, but the Soviets could put many more on their superheavy missiles that have no counterpart, at present, on the American side.

On the other hand, the United States enjoys a numerical edge in bombers, and a qualitative advantage in cruise missiles and submarine-fired ballistic missiles.

U.S. strategic planners have become increasingly concerned by the theoretical ability of the Soviet land-based strategic missiles to knock out the American fleet of 1,000-odd Minuteman missiles in a surprise attack. At the same time, the Soviets have deployed a large force of SS-20 missiles capable of hitting any target in Western Europe.

The U.S. response has been the development of the larger, more survivable MX missiles for deployment within the continental United States, and acquiescence in West Germany's desire for a European-based fleet of ballistic and cruise missiles to counterbalance the Soviet SS-20s.

The problem is that both the MX and the Pershing 2 missiles conditionally scheduled for deployment in West Germany can be seen by the Soviets as threatening first-strike weapons. From Moscow's view, they could be used to knock out the Soviet Union's command and control system and its land-based nuclear deterrent.

In other words, the deployment of the MXs and Pershing 2s would give the Soviets the same reason for nervousness, if not a bit more, that the United States already feels as a result of the superheavy Soviet missiles aimed at the United States.

From the war-avoidance point of view, this is about the worst possible situation: each side possessing weapons that are capable of knocking out the other's basic nuclear deterrent, but that are themselves vulnerable to preemptive attack.

Some well-meaning Americans, in arguing against the MX, have suggested that a theoretical Soviet first-strike capability is meaningless, since the U.S. President could launch the Minuteman missiles on a warning of attack, leaving nothing but empty holes for the Soviets to hit.

Given the chance of computer or human error, that is a frightening prospect—just how frightening should be obvious when you hear the same idea coming from Ustinov. Human survival should not be allowed to depend so heavily on the reliability of glitch-prone computer and radar systems.

Reagan, in his opening negotiating proposal, has suggested that the MX and the Pershing 2 are bargaining chips that can be canceled if the Soviets dismantle their SS-20s and a substantial portion of their land-based missiles. He has also offered to consider Soviet counterproposals dealing with the areas in which the United States is ahead—presumably including bombers and sea-based missile technology.

The rational thing would be for the two sides to work out an agreement that would place the strictest limitations on weapons that could be used for first strikes by either side—weapons that increase the chance of accidental war.

The Soviets show no indication so far of being willing to negotiate that kind of agreement.

The challenge facing the Reagan team is to persuade the Soviet leaders to change their minds. That will require firmness and flexibility—plus a willingness to control the elements in the American defense establishment that look on the MX and the Pershing 2 as "must" projects that cannot be bargained away even for major Soviet concessions.●

DANGER IN FDA

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I am a Democrat who in principle supports many of the economic objectives of the Reagan administration. The administration makes a good case that we in Congress have had a hand in creating many of our current economic problems: High taxes, inflation, overregulation, and a bloated Federal bureaucracy; a bureaucracy that has come to be called the unelected government.

In his book "The Twilight of Authority," Dr. Robert Nisbet points out that bureaucrats unanswerable to either the executive or legislative branch of the Federal Government pose perhaps the greatest challenge to what remains of the American representative public created by the Nation's founders.

However, while I agree with Dr. Nisbet, I find the Reagan administration is, in too many instances, to blame for helping to perpetuate unelected government. In other words, the Reagan administration has, for reasons that remain a mystery, retained in key Government posts bureaucratic holdovers from a previous administration. Many of these holdovers do not share the Reagan administration's stated political philosophy of maximizing free choice and minimizing coercion.

Recently, the columnist Jeffrey St. John, for the Washington Report, a weekly national newspaper, highlighted one example of the Reagan administration retaining a key bureaucratic post, an official who disagrees with the stated goals of the administration. According to Mr. St. John in the July 1982 issue of the Washington Report, Food and Drug Administration Commissioner Arthur Hull Hayes retained Dr. Sanford Miller at the FDA. He is the Director of the Bureau of Foods and was appointed by President Carter back in 1977. Dr. Miller, by his own admission, is a liberal activist from New England, who was prepared to pack his bags and go back to Boston when the Reagan administration came to power to January of 1981. But oddly, according to Mr. St. John, Dr. Miller was asked to stay on by the administration. Mr. St. John noted that, since staying on, Dr. Miller has continued to advance policies and programs which run counter to the Reagan administration's philosophy regarding the fight to reduce inflation.

I recommend to my colleagues Mr. St. John's Washington Report article, and also an interview with FDA's Chief of the Bureau of Foods, Dr. Miller, that appeared in the June 1982 issue of Food Engineering magazine. Perhaps, after reading both of these articles, my point might be clearer. Perhaps Shakespeare's words in Julius Caesar are a message for the Reagan administration and Commissioner Hayes, when it comes to the problem of what to do with unelected bureaucrats. Shakespeare wrote:

The trouble dear Brutus, is not in the stars, but in ourselves • • •

For the benefit of my colleagues who have expressed similar concerns, the two articles follow:

BUREAUCRATIC HOLDOVERS ARE GUARDING THE FORT AGAINST REAGANOMICS

(By Jeffrey St. John)

"The experience of the past," observed historians Will and Ariel Durant, "leaves little doubt that every economic system must sooner or later rely upon some form of the profit motive to stir individuals and groups to productivity.

"Businessmen left relatively free from transportation tolls and legislative regulation can give the public a greater abundance of food, homes, comfort and leisure than has ever come from industry managed by politicians, manned by governmental employees, and supposedly immune to the laws of supply and demand."

The Durants' dictum better than anything sums up the Reagan philosophy of government in principle, as opposed to practice. The distinction between principle and practice is important because of bureaucratic holdovers who are immune to the lessons of history, evidence, experience and voters' changes in the White House.

In just about every department of the executive branch, officials appointed by the Carter administration continue to occupy important positions. They also continue to make policy contrary to stated White House desires or directives. However, the problem of bureaucratic holdovers cannot be blamed entirely on circumstances outside the administration's control.

FDA OFFICIAL STAYED

Take, as an example, the case of Carter liberal holdover Sanford A. Miller, director of the Food and Drug Administration's Bureau of Foods. In an interview published in the June 1982 issue of Food Engineering Magazine, he admits that he was prepared to move back to Boston when the Reagan administration came to town with its pledges of business deregulation.

However, Miller also admits that after conversations with Health and Human Services Secretary Richard Schweiker and Reagan-appointed FDA Commissioner Arthur Hull Hayes, Jr., plus consumer advocates, he changed his mind.

"Although I don't believe that anyone is indispensable, there are times when an individual can make a difference, and this seems to me to be one of those times," he said.

Decoding this is not difficult. What Miller means is that he can seize the initiative and pursue policies of the past while co-opting Schweiker and Hayes, the latter appointed with no food experience. Miller has apparently "educated" the HHS secretary and the FDA commissioner.

"To this day," Miller states, "no one in Washington understands why this administration put the pressure on me to stay. I simply don't agree with the administration on many issues, yet I must say that the FDA has been treated better now relative to past administrations. Secretary Schweiker has been a tower of strength supporting us right down the line. Furthermore, Commissioner Hayes is one of the most outstanding the agency has ever had."

Miller has spent the last year and a half gathering allies in Congress, the media and the consumer movement in a campaign to gut efforts at deregulation of the food industry in several critical areas.

Part of this campaign has included public attacks on the food industry. "The industry occupies a position in which few of its claims are accepted by the public," he said recently, adding. "The problem of industry credibility is one of concern. To solve it, the industry must begin to develop a greater sense of its own responsibility and importance to the community."

AGENCY HAS COST CONSUMER

The FDA's past public record of responsibility and credibility is well worth reviewing, especially the costs it has created for consumers in overregulation and endless delays in granting approval of new drugs. By contrast, the food industry's record when it comes to inflation has been one reason why the administration has been so successful in reducing inflation.

At least this is what President Reagan's chief economic adviser, Murray L. Weidenbaum, told this writer recently. "The food industry has one of the lowest rates of inflation of any part of the American economy. And that has really helped in important ways in getting down the overall rate of inflation," he said. However, if Miller at the FDA has his way, he will help return us to double-digit inflation by continuing past regulatory policies.

INTERVIEW WITH FDA'S SANFORD MILLER

(By Mel Seligsohn)

One of the most significant features of the Reagan Administration has been its ongoing purge of bureaucrats appointed by previous liberal administrations. FDA's Dr. Sanford Miller has been with the agency as Director of the Bureau of Foods for four years. As both a hold-over from the Carter years and a self-professed liberal, Miller should have been on his way home to Boston on the first train after the inauguration.

Instead, Miller has stayed on—and on. According to the following exclusive interview, Miller says he really has no choice since he feels compelled to help the agency resolve "the great issues that are in the process of discussion and resolution," and which he has helped shape since he came to Washington.

This may be true, but the same might have been said by hundreds of other liberal thinkers in the government—just about all of whom are gone with the wind. Miller has been able to hang in for several-additional key reasons: he is extremely popular among both his staff, consumer groups, and the food industry, and he has been an indispensable help to FDA Commissioner Arthur Hull Hayes, Jr., who came to his job with virtually no food experience.

Indeed, Miller says that it was a series of conversations with Hayes that convinced him that though he sometimes feels like a "black sheep" politically in Washington, he should hang on for at least three more years, after which he hopes to resume his teaching at MIT. His and the agency's challenge he outlined for his Bureau of Foods colleagues in a memo announcing his intention to stay, stemming finally rumors that his exit was imminent.

"We have accepted a significant portion of the burden in determining the future of food safety and quality in the United States. As a result of this challenge and other developments, we are being asked to review the entire philosophy on which our activities are based. At the same time, we are also being asked daily to perform tasks better with fewer resources."

It's Miller's fate to have head the Bureau at a critical time. Changes in science and food technology have made a review of current food safety legislation imperative. Historically, major changes in the laws governing this area occur about every 20 years. Since the last change was made in 1958, a new law is overdue. Framers of the law will have to tackle the problem of what to do about the Delaney clause, the inflexible anticancer stipulation that the food industry has found so burdensome and hard to work with over the years.

Miller believes, despite the seemingless endless battle of words, that a change in the law will happen, although he won't put a date on when. "It might take a year. It might take ten. You never know when an issue is this complex," he says. If the process does take 10 years, no one would be surprised if the man heading the Bureau of Foods is still Sanford Miller.

FE: When we interviewed you four years ago, you said that you would not stay on in your post for more than two or three years. What happened to change your mind?

Miller: I still feel that this job should not be viewed as a career situation, however, since that time a number of things have happened. I was supposed to leave just after the 1980 election but at that time I was asked to stay on until a new commissioner was appointed. When he came he asked me to stay on basically because he didn't have any experience in the food area.

I was glad to because I didn't want to see two years of my work go down the drain because of the unfamiliarities with food issues of the new people. The fact is, however, I was preparing to move back to Boston early this year and had enrolled my daughter in school there. Then after conversations with the new commissioner, Secretary Schweiker and people in the consumer movement, I changed my mind. Although I don't believe that anyone is indispensable, there are times when an individual can make a crucial difference, and this seemed to me one of those times.

The Bureau, after all, has been working for years on issues such as food safety legislation, and more rational use of scientific activities. Now we have both a Commissioner who listens and a sympathetic head of the Department of Health and Human Services. So, it seemed to me that this was the time to push these ideas through.

FE: What changes is FDA pushing for?

Miller: There is a real need for the re-organization of our food category system. Now, the law provides for different standards of safety for different food substances. For example, Congress decided in 1958 that substances such as additives that are incidental but unavoidable contaminants to the food supply ought to be regulated in a different way than ordinary food additives. The standards are different because it was felt that food additives are more easily controlled and therefore ought to be subject to tighter standards.

Since that time, however, I think we've come to understand that people are consuming more and more processed and formulized foods. At the same time, we're beginning to see things that might be considered harmful in such natural foods as spices that we didn't know existed until recently. Under the current law, for example, we probably should ban black pepper, but we don't because it's not a rational thing to do. The Commissioner has a certain area of regulatory discretion and this is one of the areas he prefers to use it.

But you can only stretch an interpretation so far. So we think it's time to evaluate this matter and establish, for instance, a category of substances called Traditional or Basic Foods, substances that have a long history of use in society, which we need to get out from other parts of the current law.

With Delaney—and here's where the problem is best illustrated—no one argues that carcinogens shouldn't be regulated differently than anything else. There are some people, of course, that pooh-pooh the whole issue, but they don't suffer from cancer. Nevertheless, everyone who knows something about this agrees that science in the past 25 years has changed to such an extent that we really must broaden the scientific inquiry upon which we make decisions regarding carcinogens in the food supply. The question is how do we open this up without leaving any loopholes for something really dangerous to slip through?

FE: Is anything new on the horizon at the bureau in the area of food irradiation?

Miller: Only what is generally known. We are going ahead with a proposal allowing the use of irradiation under 100 krad. However, having said that I must add that I have no idea how long this proposal will take going through the agency.

FE: What will the Administration's budgetary cutbacks mean to the Bureau of Foods and its programs?

Miller: Of all the regulatory agencies in Washington, the FDA has probably been treated the best. This is due to several factors, but perhaps most importantly is that our Commissioner is so special, and so highly thought of by the Administration. The doesn't mean we haven't been affected. While none of our programs have been cut, we haven't received any additional funds to expand or start new programs.

In fact, I would say that there have been no cutbacks but reduced resources to deal with problems. If we were actually cutback, we would have even less. The truth is, however, we've been doing less for the last several years anyway, particularly in the area of economic issues—food adulteration, for example. But this is not a result of the current Administration. FDA has not been treated well for the past 10 years in terms of funding. Indeed, we're doing better with Reagan than with Carter in this respect.

FE: Is it indeed true that inspectors from FDA are coming around less often to food plants?

Miller: Yes, in some industries it's true. We've tried, however, to maintain our activities in what we call high-risk areas, for example, certain low-acid canned foods, but in other areas we've cut back.

FE: Does this relate in any way to your statements that there have been more major recalls of food recently than any time in memory?

Miller: It may, but I don't really know. It would be easy for me to surmise that the food industry is getting sloppy because they know we don't have the resources to deal with them, but I can't say for certain. It might also be one of those crazy statistical glitches. If it is food industry policy, however, then processors must be among the stupidest people ever to walk on earth, because eventually the government would come back supported by even the most conservative congressmen with the most rigorous food safety regulations ever. Again, however, I have no idea if this is the case.

There's no question, however, as to the extent of the problem. Since the first of this year, we've had five major recalls. We've had nothing like this in the memory of anyone now here at FDA, certainly not in my four years. It's hard to say whether these recalls involve either major or minor food companies, but in either case if a company is cutting back on quality control because the inspector is not coming around as often, it is making a grave mistake.

FE: There's some question now that despite all the talk and debating that food safety legislation is a dead issue. How do you view this?

Miller: There are two aspects to this. In the first place, we're very close to public hearings on new legislation. This is a major step forward. These hearings will give the main antagonists a chance to be heard. They, of course, include those who simply want agency activity of any kind pulled back as a matter of principle, and those on the other side who see any changes in the food safety law as cause for alarm, fearing that once the process begins the door will open too wide.

Interestingly, critics of the first kind in the food industry seem to be growing fewer and fewer as their lawyers point out that if FDA moves out of certain areas related to food safety the personal and corporate liability of the processor increases tremendously. There has been a lot of re-thinking about this in the food industry recently.

However, the debate that will ensue from the hearings could go on for one year or 10 years before a law is produced. Nevertheless, the fact that Senator Hatch and Senator Kennedy, both representing differing views over what should be done can sit down and discuss the issues, leads me to believe that it won't take that long before a new law is produced. The story being circulated that Senator Kennedy had disavowed any interest in a revision of the law at this time is simply not true, by the way.

FE: How do you feel about the voluntary sodium labeling program? Will it work?

Miller: I think it will. I have always felt that the food industry has a special role to play in our society. This program has been an opportunity for it to express its social responsibility. I believe the industry is coming through beautifully. On the other hand, both the FDA Commissioner and HHS Secretary Schweiker have made it clear how important this issue is and made it clear that a voluntary program doesn't work, regulation by the government will surely follow. Through voluntary efforts, about 40 percent of the food supply will be labeled within a year, perhaps as much as 70 percent. I believe that pressure from the public will force completion of the program.

FE: Your political orientation is liberal, and you were brought in by a liberal President. With the on-going purge from the bureaucracy of people such as yourself, do you ever feel like a black sheep?

Miller: To this day no one in Washington understands why this Administration put the pressure on me to stay. I simply don't agree with the Administration on many issues, yet I must say that FDA has been treated better now relative to past Administrations. Secretary Schweiker has been a tower of strength supporting us right down the line. Furthermore, Commissioner Hayes is one of the most outstanding the agency has ever had, including my friend Don Kennedy.

FE: How will the Food Safety Council's proposals relate to the debate over new legislation? Will it have any impact?

Miller: The Council's activities involving the development of the "tree decision," the process by which food safety decisions are made, was a very successful activity. The agency has its own method of making such decisions, and in time we'll be publishing a document spelling out how the amount of testing should be commensurate with the potential risk. The Council's approach is valid, but not necessarily the one the agency will take.

The second issue that the Council tackled—how to evaluate the social and economic climate in which a food safety decision is made—was not so successful. The problem is infinitely more complex. It's simply not quantifiable. Everyone, it seems, wants the agency to be completely efficient and at the same time they want total control over what the agency does.

Those who talk about public input into the regulatory process should keep in mind that the most laborious and difficult process we have is in setting tolerances. We've used it once in 25 years. It's so complicated because it insists that everyone has to have a chance to participate. The second most difficult process is for standard setting, which is extremely slow. Yet both these are the ones that permit the most public input.

FE: What have you accomplished in the past four years that you feel strongly about?

Miller: We've re-organized ourselves so that we believe we're better prepared to deal with what's coming down the line. Several years ago we put out a research plan that outlined what problems we saw ahead and what resources we felt were necessary to deal with them. It was the first time that this had ever been done in the federal government.

We've also tried to make regulatory decisions in a more rational manner. We now believe that decisions are being made at FDA using the most up-to-date state-of-the-art techniques. In addition, I've done everything I can to allow our very competent staff of scientists here the room to express themselves. When I got here, there was a different environment. We've had no major personnel changes in the past four years.●

R. & D. IN THE FISCAL 1983 BUDGET

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the Members' attention a most important collection of remarks concerning the fate of the Nation's research and development policy and activity for the next 3 years. In his editorial in the July 16 issue of Science magazine, Dr. Willis H. Shapley, consultant to the American Association for the Advancement of Science, spells out the disastrous effects of our budget resolution on R. & D. "Even under optimistic economic assumptions, total funding available for nondefense R. & D. faces a reduction in constant dollars of as much as 30 percent over the 5-year period fiscal year 1983 to fiscal year 1987," says Shapley, "unless continued high deficits, substantial increases in taxes, a major cutback in defense, or some combination of these becomes acceptable economically and politically."

Equally important from my personal perspective, and the perspective of the Congressional Caucus for Science and Technology, is the current crises in science and engineering education. Shapley points out a serious challenge in this area. "There is the challenge to all of us to see that something, besides talking, is done about the problems of science and engineering education at all levels. Our decentralized education system needs leadership. Will the Federal Government provide it? If not, who will?"

I urge my colleagues to read carefully the entire editorial, which follows. Shapley's message is a call to all of us for responsibility.

The President's budget for fiscal year 1983 treated R & D fairly well, given the economic exigencies and the policy orientations of the Reagan Administration. Within these policies, some fine-tuning of the amounts for R & D deserves serious consideration; some of this may be done by Congress as it acts on the details of the budget. What will be the outcome in Congress? The spending targets in the budget resolution leave open the possibility that the R & D budgets finally approved by Congress could approximate closely the recommendations in the President's budget.

For budget function 250, the only category that consists entirely of R & D (National Science Foundation, Department of Energy general research, and NASA), the resolution provides exactly the same amounts as in the President's budget. This is preferential treatment. The general congressional guideline of freezing 1983 budgets for discretionary spending at the fiscal 1982 budget levels would have meant a cut of about 10 percent.

Totals for most of the other functions also seem adequate to include the amounts budgeted for R & D, except for national defense R & D, where the 3.6 percent reduction in total budget authority could mean a cut of as much as $1 billion in the $4.4 billion increase recommended in the budget.

The final outcomes, however, will depend on how R & D is treated by Congress in the detailed authorization and appropriations bills, and whether the appropriations bills as passed are acceptable to the President. Detailed congressional action could produce R & D budgets that are revised, perhaps improved, versions of the President's budget. But a presidential veto and another standoff between the President and Congress would probably result again this year in percentage across-the-board reductions applied indiscrimminately to R & D along with other programs.

The longer term outlook for R & D is, at best, bleak. Even under optimistic economic assumptions, total funding available for nondefense R & D faces a reduction in constant dollars of as much as 30 percent over the 5-year period fiscal year 1983 to fiscal year 1987, unless continued high deficits, substantial increases in taxes, a major cutback in defense, or some combination of these becomes acceptable economically and politically. The establishment of plans and priorities for federal support of R & D within a total level of resources that is declining in real terms is the single greatest challenge facing the scientific and technical leadership in the government and the scientific and technical community as a whole.

There are plenty of other challenges. I will mention only three:

(1) There is the challenge to all of us to see that something, besides talking, is done about the problems of science and engineering education at all levels. Our decentralized education system needs leadership. Will the federal government provide it? If not, who will?

(2) There is the challenge to industry to show that the U.S. private sector, in the favorable regulation and tax environment of the Reagan Administration, can match competition from other nations in developing and marketing new and improved products based on advances in science and technology.

(3) There is an urgent challenge to Congress and the Executive Branch to find ways to temper the operation to the budget process. I counted 160 distinct steps in the budget process as it now "works." At a minimum, we must insulate from controversies on overall budget policy the core of largely noncontroversial functions of government for which the range of likely budget adjustments does not have an appreciable impact on the size of the deficit, the level of revenues, or the state of the economy. We should be able to conduct important activities like R & D within the framework of approved long-range plans and clearly defined fiscal envelopes, without the continual disruptions and uncertainties that characterize the present budget process.

FOOD STAMP ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1982 (SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY)

HON. FREDERICK W. RICHMOND

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to enter into the RECORD a section-by-section summary of the Food Stamp Act Amendments of 1982 (H.R. ——) that was reported out of the Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition Subcommittee on July 20, 1982.

SECTION 1—SHORT TITLE

Provides that the Act may be cited as "Food Stamp Act Amendments of 1982".

SECTION 2—ROUNDING RULES

Requires that in calculations of the Thrifty Food Plan, both deductions and the individual case computations will be rounded down to the nearest dollar, rather than rounded to the nearest dollar. As in the past, the unrounded number will continue to be used as the basis for updating the deductions the following year (after the October 1983 adjustment, in which the $85 standard deduction figure and $115 shelter CAP figure specified in law are used as the base).

SECTION 3—DISABLED VETERANS AND SURVIVORS

Expands the definition of "elderly and disabled member", wherever it appears in the Food Stamp Act, to include a veteran, a surviving spouse of a veteran, or a child of a veteran who is disabled or receives veteran's compensation.

SECTION 4—COORDINATION OF COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS

Requires that cost-of-living adjustments provided on July 1 in Social Security and other federal programs not be counted against food stamp benefits until October 1, when the cost-of-living adjustment to the Thrifty Food Plan is made.

SECTION 5—ADJUSTMENT OF DEDUCTION

Provides that the adjustment to shelter/dependent care deductions will take place on October 1, 1983 and every October 1 thereafter. Current law provides that the standard and the shelter/dependent care deductions will be adjusted on July 1, 1983; therefore, under the amendment, the adjustments to both deductions and to the Thrifty Food Plan will take place on the same dates, reducing the work required by state food stamp administrators.

On October 1, 1983, a new series of adjustments will begin, using $85 for standard deduction and $115 for the shelter CAP as the base. Each adjustment the following years should use as the base the unrounded numbers from the previous years.

SECTION 6—ELIMINATION OF STUDIES

Eliminates the requirements for the Department of Agriculture to conduct studies of the financial resources requirements of the Food Stamp Program, the effect of the elimination of the purchase requirement; the feasiblity of recoupment, and the Consumer Price Index. These are studies or reports that have been completed by the Department.

SECTION 7—CATEGORICAL ELIGIBILITY

Establishes at state-option, categorical eligibility as to resources for AFDC households in which all members of the household are AFDC participants.

SECTION 8—IMPROVEMENT IN COST-EFFECTIVENESS OF MONTHLY REPORTING SYSTEMS

Expands the number of households who are exempt from monthly reporting.

SECTION 9—JOB SEARCH

Establishes State option to require job search at the time of application for benefits.

SECTION 10—ALTERNATIVE ISSUANCE SYSTEM

Authorizes the Secretary the authority to require that state agencies develop alternative issuance systems when the Secretary, in consultation with the Inspector General, determines that these systems will protect the integrity of the Food Stamp Program. The Secretary will also be given the authority to test innovative methods of delivering food stamp benefits.

SECTION 11—ELIMINATION OF INITIAL MONTH ALLOTMENTS OF UNDER $10

Eliminates benefits of less than $10 for the initial month or period of food stamp eligibility; households affected would receive the full amount to which they are entitled for the following months or periods

SECTION 12—PROMPT REDUCTION

Permits a State agency to take immediate action to reduce or terminate benefits if the agency receives clear, written information from the household that indicates such a benefit reduction or termination is required.

SECTION 13—DUPLICATION OF BENEFITS

Requires states that have cashed-out the SSI portion of their food stamp caseload or who operate pilot programs in which cashing out the food stamp benefits is tested to match their "cash-out" files with those of regular Food Stamp Program to determine if there is any duplication of benefits.

SECTION 14—STATE ERROR RATE REDUCTION

Sets targets for error reduction by States and imposes sanctions for States failing to meet the targets. All States would be required to lower their error rates to 5 percent or less by fiscal year 1985. During fiscal year 1983 and fiscal year 1984, interim error rate targets would be set which would require steady error rate reduction toward the goal of getting error rates down to 5 percent by fiscal year 1985. States failing to achieve their error rate target in any year would lose a portion of the Federal share of their State food stamp administrative costs. The greater the amount by which the state's error rate exceeds the target, the larger share of administrative funds that the state would lose. An incentive feature would be retained for States achieving exceptionally low error rates.

SECTION 15—AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS

Extends authorization for the Food Stamp Program through September 30, 1985, consistent with the Farm Bill. Removes funding ceiling or "cap".

SECTION 16—PUERTO RICO

Prohibits cashing out of food assistance in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico after October 1, 1983. Directs the Secretary of USDA to conduct a study, at no additional cost to the program, to assess the impact of the current food assistance block grant program and to report to Congress on the findings six months after enactment of this law.

SECTION 17—AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE OMNIBUS BUDGET RECONCILIATION ACT OF 1981 AND THE AGRICULUTRE AND FOOD ACT OF 1981

The amendments in the 1981 Reconciliation Act and the 1981 Farm Act, except for the amendments concerning retrospective accounting and periodic reporting, will take effect upon enactment of this Act.

SECTION 18—EFFECTIVE DATES

Except as otherwise provided the amendments made by this Act will take effect upon enactment.●

A BILL TO REPEAL EXPORT CONTROLS

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing, along with the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) legislation to repeal the unilateral U.S. sanctions imposed on December 30, 1981 and June 22, 1982 by the United States on the Soviet Union.

This legislation is a revision of H.R. 6564 which Mr. BONKER and I introduced on June 10, 1982. After further consideration and the extension of the sanctions on June 22, we felt it necessary to modify the language to make it clear that all foreign policy controls imposed on those two dates, not just those which relate to oil and gas construction and pipeline equipment, should be terminated. I would stress that the controls which would be ended are foreign policy controls. This legislation does not weaken in any way national security controls or protection of U.S. defense secrets.

As I have long argued, unilateral U.S. export controls on goods which are widely available from other nations have no impact on Soviet behavior. They merely send U.S. business and jobs overseas to competitors such as Komatsu of Japan. The United States should not rely on the crutch of U.S. unilateral export sanctions to demonstrate that it is reacting to events in Poland but should devise more effective strategies for influencing global events.

Simply, these sanctions have never worked and they will not work in the future. The Soviet pipeline will be built, and American companies will continue to suffer because of unilateral sanctions that do not have the support of our allies.

The pipeline sanctions represent a foreign policy travesty and an economic injustice. The United States should convince the Soviet Union to respect U.S. interests through a strong U.S. defense and a coordinated effort with our allies to restrict credits and subsidies for the Soviet Union.

American companies and workers should not be punished by the misguided foreign policy of the U.S. Government. The answer to influencing Soviet behavior in Poland is a multilateral, unified Allied effort. The answer is not to impose sanctions on U.S. goods while Japanese and European sales of the very same goods to the U.S.S.R. remain unfettered.●

OIL PIPELINE DEREGULATION

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I along with several of my distinguished colleagues from the Public Works and Transportation Committee are introducing legislation to deregulate the transportation of oil and oil products through pipelines.

Mr. Speaker, in the absence of any competitive forces in the markeplace, Government regulation has stepped in to play an important role as the guardian of the American public against unfair or monopolistic rate setting. However, in the 75 years since the Interstate Commerce Commission first began rate regulation of oil pipelines, the growth of competition in this industry has flourished. Additionally, when the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission—FERC—assumed the regulatory responsibilities in 1977, even greater competition ensued. With the existence of this competition, the need for continued Government regulation of oil pipelines is no longer justified or warranted.

Presently, there is a network of more than 227,000 miles of petroleum and petroleum product pipelines nationwide, which transports 87 percent of all domestic crude oil and accounts for more than 25 percent of all intercity freight. In addition, pipelines are the most environmentally safe and cost effective means of transporting petroleum and petroleum products. Accordingly, they are an essential natural resource and play an integral role in our national fight to reduce the overall cost of petroleum and its related products.

Mr. Speaker, over the past several years, Congress has made tremendous progress in the field of regulatory reform, with particular emphasis on transportation. The deregulation of airlines and interstate trucking coupled with greater competition has proven to be a financial asset to the American public. The benefits of deregulation come not only through reduced rates but also through a greater variety of services now available in these industries. This deregulation has not, contrary to popular misconceptions, wreaked economic havoc on the market and the delivery of these services. Rather, it has provided increased services and efficiency to the public at a reduced cost.

Mr. Speaker, surely these amenities should be extended to oil pipelines. With the growth of this industry, shippers now have a wide variety of options open to them, including intermodal, intramodal, and shipper exchange. The availability of these options has created competitive pressures which in turn have resulted in the establishment of fair and equitable prices for shippers and ultimately, the consumers.

However, despite this demonstration of healthy competition and the adequate shipper/consumer protection provided, FERC remains burdened with the responsibility of setting rates for oil pipelines. Further, FERC is saddled with the dilemma of how to methodically and satisfactorily set rates for this industry. Heretofore, FERC has been unable to come up with an adequate method simply because it is impossible to establish a system of rates designed to foster competition when in fact, competition is already present.

Mr. Speaker, the time has come to relieve FERC of this regulatory burden of ratemaking and let the marketplace work its will.

The legislation we are pleased to introduce today does not eliminate total regulation of oil pipelines. Common carrier obligations and sanctions against discriminatory behavior will remain in tact and enforced. Instead, Mr. Speaker, our bill is designed to alleviate the very real burden of regulatory ratemaking. By eliminating this unnecessary regulation, American consumers will benefit immensely through stable and competitive pricing of oil transportation. I urge expeditious consideration and passage of this legislation.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

THE PLIGHT OF NANDOR BERGER

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues, the plight of Nandor Berger, his wife Anzhella, and their daughter Erika, who have repeatedly been denied permission to emigrate from the Soviet Union to Israel.

Nandor Berger served in the Soviet Army as a guard in a food storehouse from 1972 until 1974. He was not privy to any secret information. However, when he applied to emigrate to Israel in 1975, he was refused on the grounds of his military service. Subsequent to the application, Anzhella, a third-year chemistry student, was expelled from Uzhgorod University.

The Bergers have no permanent residence and are forced to move frequently. All of Nandor's relatives are in Israel. The Bergers would very much like to join Nandor's mother, brother, and sister there.

In spite of repeated refusals, the Bergers continue to file for exit visas in the hope that they will one day be able to join their family in Israel. Soviet Jews continue to be persecuted. The Bergers are only one of the many families who have suffered and been denied the freedom to join relatives outside the Soviet Union.

As Americans, we take the pleasure and priviledge of freedom for granted. It is something our forefathers fought to preserve and today it remains the basis of our society. But we are the lucky ones. The Bergers have not been so fortunate. I would like to urge you, as Americans who share the joy of freedom, to work with me for the cause of the Berger family. Soviet Jews have suffered, and been denied their freedom for too long. We must work together to see that this suffering and persecution ceases.●

SORTING OUT THE FACTS ON EL SALVADOR

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, opponents of the Reagan administration's program of economic and security assistance to El Salvador have freely utilized a wide range of statistics and clever rhetoric designed to misinform the American public on the situation in Central America.

These administration critics have sought to color the public's perception of conditions in El Salvador to give credence to the same sort of propaganda being disseminated by the leftists factions—whose primary objective is to bring the Salvadoran Government and the nation's already troubled economy to its knees. A major component of the leftist strategy is to concentrate on influencing America's public opinion. To this end, the spread of misinformation among our media had been used effectively.

The prestigious publication, Policy Review, recently printed an article by LaSalle College economics professor, Joseph P. Mooney, appropriately entitled, "El Salvador—True and False." Professor Mooney's article addresses some of the common statistical facts which have been skewed by those who wish to use these facts to discredit the elected government in this small nation. Professor Mooney corrects these misperceptions with accurate figures regarding El Salvador's social and economic conditions.

The attached article is an excerpt from Professor Mooney's piece.

EL SALVADOR—TRUE AND FALSE

(By Joseph P. Mooney)

Mark Twain once remarked, "Get the facts first and then you can distort them as much as you please." Some opponents of U.S. policy in El Salvador have taken his advice to heart. They recite a depressing array of statistical facts about El Salvador that are intended to shock the public into opposing military and economic aid to the Salvadorean government. As a result, they often become institutionalized truths.

Statistics which are most often used to distort the reality of El Salvador include the following: 2 percent of the population owns 60 percent of the land; 50 percent of the population has a per capita income of $120 or less per year; 50 percent of the children die before age five; unemployment is more than 40 percent; and economic and social conditions were worsening during the 1970s leading to increased social unrest. But as poor as El Salvador is, its social and economic conditions are not as bad as they are portrayed. The facts are quite different from the "facts."

First, 2 percent of the population do not own 60 percent of the land. Since March 1980 El Salvador has undertaken a significant program of land reform. About 260 of the largest farms (1235 acres or more) have been expropriated. Another 60 were sold voluntarily to the government. These farms encompass about 23 percent of the country's 1,600,000 acres of cropland. In addition, tenants and sharecroppers working small farms which they did not own have been made legal owners. Moreover, when land reform was enacted, the government also nationalized the banking system as well as the export of coffee, cotton, and sugar.

The assertion that 50 percent of the people have per capita incomes of $120 or less per year is also untrue. Cash income is not always the same as total income; indeed the income of rural peasants in poor countries is mostly in crops they produce for themselves. Since per capita cash income in El Salvador almost tripled between 1969 and 1982, from $250 to $680—and in 1969 only 18 percent of the population had annual per capita incomes of $75 or less—it is obvious that the percentage of the population with per capita incomes less than $120 is far, far less than 50 percent.

The claim that 50 percent of the children die before age five is wildly inaccurate. The correct figure is 8.3 percent, which is bad enough but nowhere near the absurd figure tossed around by Ed Asner, the North American Congress on Latin America, and other supporters of the Marxist-Leninist Left. All informed observers agree that the rate of population growth from 1970 to 1980 was 3 percent, primarily because the overall death rate declined from 10 per 1,000 in 1970 to 7 per 1,000 in 1980. Clearly, the population could not grow at 3 percent a year if anywhere near 50 percent of the children died before age five.

Unemployment might be 40 percent, but no one really knows because, like all poor countries, El Salvador has no reliable data on unemployment. Whatever the actual rate is, it is high—the result of an economy that is a shambles because of the civil war.

Reporters and academics have frequently claimed that the increase in violence during the 1970's resulted from worsening economic and social conditions. But the evidence shows that the country was making considerable progress until the violence increased in recent years. From 1970 to 1978, Gross Domestic Product, adjusted for inflation, increased by 5 percent a year and real per capita product increased by 2 percent a year. Morever, food production increased by 44 percent—the second highest increase among the nineteen Latin countries, exceeded only by Brazil.

During this period, life-expectancy increased, the death rate decreased, and illiteracy declined; the percentge of government expenditures spent on public health, housing, and education was consistently among the highest in Latin America.

There is, of course, no doubt that poverty and inequality plagued El Salvador and that the political system was repressive. In short, the internal conditions of the country were typical of an underdeveloped country, although El Salvador is far from the poorest or most repressive. These conditions contributed to the outbreak of violence in the 1970s, so it is true that some of the fundamental causes of social turmoil were internal. However, the American Left has exaggerated the severity of economic and social conditions in El Salvador to make the case that the civil war is a purely internal uprising of oppressed peasants. Cuban and Nicaraguan involvement is dismissed as minor or nonexistent.

There can be no question whatsoever that the social turmoil in El Salvador was exploited by Cuba and Nicaragua, and the result was a sharp increase in violence in 1980 and 1981. Because of the high level of violence and the convincing evidence of Cuban and Nicaraguan aid to the insurgents, military aid from the U.S. is essential and justified. But the campaign of disinformation, including the use of the specious statistics, has weakened the Reagan administration's case for continued military and economic aid. A most disturbing aspect of the publication and continued use of phony statistics is that, except for unemployment data, the correct data are readily available in standard sources, such as the Statistical Abstract of Latin America, the publications of the World Bank, and the Inter-American Development Bank. Could it be that those who regularly use spurious data are deliberately misleading the American people?●

THE NEED FOR BAIL REFORM

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend to the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives the following letter from Robert A. McConnell, Assistant Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice.

The information contained in this correspondence pertains to an operation entitled FIST III. The purpose of this special operation was to locate and detain major criminal fugitives.

The success of the FIST operation is welcome news. But, it only underscores the flaws in our current bail procedures.

The statistics prove dramatically that we must reform our bail laws to insure that criminals are not allowed to roam the streets freely, committing additional crimes while awaiting trial.

The material follows:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF LEGISLATIVE AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., June 29, 1982.

Hon. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI,
Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MAZZOLI: As a Member of the Committee on the Judiciary, we felt that you would like to know that the Department announced last week the arrest of 302 fugitives in the New York City area. Enclosed for your information are facts relative to Operation FIST III, the third special operation to locate major fugitives during this fiscal year. The statistics on the operation highlight some of the most serious problems we face in law enforcement. For example, 57 percent of those arrested had previously been involved in violent crime. Those arrested were responsible for 3,014 previous arrests and convictions.

While the Operation FIST series has had dramatic results, the operations have also highlighted the pathetic state of our current bail procedures. As you know, FIST I (in the Miami area last fall) resulted in the arrest of 76 fugitives. Twenty-eight of these were arrested as fugitives for failure to appear or bond defaults on prior charges. In spite of this, 40 percent of these people who had a history of failing to appear again were given the opportunity to post a new bond or were released on their own recognizance. FIST II in the Los Angeles area had similar statistics. FIST II resulted in the arrest of 102 fugitives of which 17 were arrested for failure to appear or bond defaults in prior cases. Even with that experience, 40 percent of this group again were given the opportunity to post new bonds or were released on their recognizance. The figures for FIST III are even more dramatic! Of the 54 arrested for failure to appear or bond default in prior cases, 70 percent had the opportunity to post new bonds or were released on their own recognizance. Ten were released on their own recognizance. This situation is an outrage!

Much of the violent crime in our country is committed by habitual offenders but federal bail laws fail to give our courts the authority to make responsible release determinations with respect to dangerous offenders. Under present law, the only issue a judge may consider in setting pretrial release conditions is whether the defendant will appear for a trial. The Administration, like many in the Congress, believes that there is an urgent need for legislation to improve federal bail laws. Our proposals in this regard are contained in Title I of the Violent Crime and Drug Enforcement Improvements Act of 1982, which, with your cosponsorship, was introduced in the House as H.R. 6497 on May 26, 1982, with bipartisan support. This legislation, among other things, would permit danger to the community to be considered in determining whether to release a defendant pending trail; provide consecutive sentences for crimes committed on pretrail release and increase the penalties for bail jumping. If we are to be serious about fighting the crime menace this legislation needs to be enacted quickly. The legislation would also make other necessary changes to correct the imbalance favoring the lawless over the law. We would greatly appreciate your active assistance in moving this legislation forward as rapidly as possible.

Yours sincerely,

ROBERT A. MCCONNELL,
Assistant Attorney General.

FACTS ON FIST III

The Department of Justice today concluded the third special operation in this fiscal year to locate major fugitives. The operation which was conducted jointly by the United States Marshals Service and the New York City Police Department resulted in the arrest of 302 persons wanted in the New York City area. It focused primarily on Federal fugitives for whom warrants were outstanding and individuals designated as Career Criminals by the New York City Police Department.

Of the fugitives taken into custody, 57% were previously involved in violent crime and the total number arrested were responsible for 3,014 previous arrests amd convictions.

This special enforcement project was called Operation FIST III, for Fugitive Investigation Strike Team, and was carried out by the U.S. Marshals Service and the New York Police Department over a 10 week period. Using an abandoned warehouse on the East River as its headquarters, the FIST team began this operation in mid-April which culminated June 23, with the closing of 440 outstanding warrants.

FIST I was conducted by the Marshals in Miami last Fall and resulted in the arrest of 76 fugitives. FIST II was completed this past February in Los Angeles and resulted in 102 arrests.

The FIST III operation was an example of the Justice Department's overall effort of having maximum participation between Federal and local law enforcement toward the objective of reducing violent crime.

Through this type of assistance from Federal law enforcement agencies to local law enforcement and the newly established nation-wide network of Law Enforcement Coordinating Committees, the Department of Justice is continuing to give top priority to the reduction of violent crime throughout our nation.

The FBI program is an important component of the Department's overall efforts to concentrate all available resources against dangerous, major offenders.

FIST III arrests of 302 fugitives includes the apprehension of 147 state or local fugitives in the New York City area. The operation focused primarily on individuals for whom warrants were outstanding and the subjects were in a fugitive status. Of the 302 arrested during the operation 81 were charged with narcotics violations. The others had prior arrests for a variety of offenses—including murder, bank robbery, kidnapping, assault, armed robbery, mail theft, weapons and counterfeiting.

The operation resulted in the seizure of approximately two pounds of cocaine, heroin, marijuana, 45,000 quaaludes, with an estimated street value of $400,000, 21 guns and $2500 in bribe money. Highlighting the operation was the arrest of William Joseph Arico wanted by Italian authorities for murder and wanted in this country for escape, bank robbery and jewel theft.

A total of 43 personnel from the New York City Police Department and the U.S. Marshals Service brought this operation to a successful conclusion.●

SKELTON PRAISES LOVERCAMP'S LETTER

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, last month the National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences released a report which purported to show a link between diet, specifically the eating of meat, and cancer. Shortly, after the report appeared, I received a letter from a constituent, Mr. Fred Lovercamp, the president of the Missouri Port Producers Association. Because Mr. Lovercamp's letter puts the dispute over this report into perspective better than anything I have seen, and I am inserting it in the RECORD so that all of our colleagues in the House will have the opportunity to read it. As Mr. Lovercamp points out, newsstories often dwell on the most sensational aspects of such a report, failing to question whether the report's conclusions are based on conclusive scientific evidence or not. Fred Lovercamp advocates a commonsense approach in these matters. The text of his letter follows:

Once again the red meat industry is the victim of a glamorized news story based on a report without conclusive scientific evidence to support the statements made. I have reference to the report issued by the National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences carried nationally by the news media the week of June 14, 1982.

Following are quoted excerpts from the report as presented by the media: "In general, the evidence suggests that some types of diets and some dietary components tend to increase the risk of cancer, whereas others tend to decrease it—The mechanisms responsible for these effects are not fully understood, partly because nutritive and nonnutritive components of foods may interact to exert effects on cancer incidence. . . .

Eat less food high in any kind of fats, saturated or unsaturated. The main sources of fat in the American diet are meats, whole-milk dairy products and cooking oils.

Eat very little salt-cured, salt-pickled and smoked foods, including sausages, smoked fish and ham, bacon, hot dogs and bologna and other so-called luncheon meats."

I am convinced the average consumer will not dwell on the negative aspects of the report but only on those statements which link the eating of meat products with cancer. The damage has been done. Even though counter explanations are presented first impressions are more lasting. Follow-up articles are not as newsworthy and therefore will not get national television coverage, and will be small items lost in the mid sections of printed media.

There have been in the past the antibiotic residue scare, the nitrite issue, the danger of micro-wave cooking of pork, to name a few. All of these have either been modified or retracted, but irreparable damage to the industry was done.

I am a strong proponent of freedom of expression and the press, but equally strong in feeling that with rights are accompanying responsibilities. As a pork producer I know that if conclusive evidence were presented that the product caused cancer I would be among the first to stop eating the product. Moreover, neither I or any other pork producer would continue to produce a product that would have such effect on our fellow human beings. We feel we are producing a healthful, nutritious product to provide food for an ever increasing population, and should not have to continuously combat such inconclusive and false information which has a negative effect on our product.

I am sending a copy of this letter to all of our Missouri lawmakers in Washington, D.C., and can with confidence express the feeling of over 6,000 members of the Missouri Pork Producers Association that hopefully legislation which would require some measure of accountability on agencies or individuals who make and/or publish information without conclusive evidence to back up their claims.

Since publication of reports such as the one I have reference to in this letter, as well as similar misleading information to the public, can have a devastating effect on an industry I feel there should be some protection for those industry people so affected.●

A LEGISLATIVE SOLUTION TO A BALANCED BUDGET

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, in an understandable frustration at the budgetary excesses of this Congress, and in anticipation of the justifiable anger of the taxpaying electorate, many of us are casting about for a legislative solution that will force responsibility and discipline on a Congress addicted to profligate spending. The most popular solution being advanced is an amendment to our Constitution mandating a balanced budget. I have grave misgivings that this is an effective or even appropriate remedy, and I have written an article expressing these concerns, portions of which appeared in the op-ed pages of the Chicago Tribune and Washington Post.

I dislike burdening my colleagues with lengthy reading, but I earnestly hope before further commitments to the amendment make its passage by Congress an accomplished fact, that they will at least consider the problems discussed in this article.

Congressman WILLIAM HUGHES of New Jersey and I have introduced a bill (H.R. 6834) that meets some of these objections, and I trust in the debate that will develop, our statutory remedy to the seemingly intractable problem of enormous deficits will be given attention.

[The article follows:]

UNRAVELING THE ONION—THE BUDGET BALANCING ACT

(By HENRY J. HYDE)

There is a powerful train roaring down the track, gathering momentum every day—it's called a Constitutional Amendment to Balance the Budget. Many Congressmen are concluding that the better part of wisdom is to jump aboard rather than get rolled over by such trifling considerations as "will it work?"

The proposed amendment requires Congress to adopt a balanced budget every year, with a super-majority three-fifths vote needed to spend more than the government takes in. Revenues could not exceed the previous year's increase in national income, but this could be waived by a simple majority of the House and Senate. This latter proviso has the considerable virtue of requiring a specific vote to increase taxes, and thus Congress could no longer rely on deficit spending and bracket creep as sources of federal largess.

Back in 1975 some prescient taxpayers became convinced that Congress as an institution lacked the will to say "no" to more and more federal spending (after all, how else does a politician demonstrate sensitivity and compassion?) and that only the mandate of a Constitutional Amendment could achieve a balanced federal budget.

Our Founding Fathers provided two procedures to amend the Constitution, one where Congress initiates the amendment and the other where a Constitutional Convention does so. This latter method has not been used since our Constitution was first drafted by the Convention of 1787 and submitted for ratification. Any amendment, whether adopted by Congress (with a two-thirds vote of both Houses) or by a Convention, must be ratified by 38 states to be adopted.

Since Congress, dominated by political survivors, shows little zeal to inhibit its power of the purse, these taxpayers began a drive to obtain the necessary (34) state legislatures to call for a Convention to consider a Balanced Budget Amendment. By 1979, (30) states had passed the requisite resolution, but then the drive seemed to run out of steam. However, as the size of the contemplated deficits—exceeding $100 billion—began to sink in, the crusade took on new life and Alaska, on January 18th became the 31st state. This began to capture the attention of Congressional leaders and a strategy of "launching a turtle" was devised—hold prolonged hearings in the hope that the anti-deficit frenzy will die down. Such hearings are intermittently held by a House Judiciary Subcommittee chaired by Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (on which I serve) with no end in sight.

Paraphrasing Joe Louis' famous remark about Billy Conn, "we can run but we can't hide" from the issue. As enormous deficits loom and as Congress demonstrates its unwillingness to perform major surgery on the budget, a closer look at this proposal is very much in order.

The driving force for balancing the budget arises from the almost universally held conviction that most of our serious economic ills—inflation, high interest rates, recession—can be traced to deficit spending. Republicans have always believed this with theological fervor, but now even Democrats are joining the ranks of the true believers.

We are endlessly reminded that a propsective $100 billion deficit is the "highest in history", but just what does this mean? Granted such a deficit would be the largest in history, but then so is the entire budget! Deficits ought to be measured against the size of the economy and the savings pool available to finance them. In 1976 the deficit was $66 billion in an economy of $3.1 trillion—a smaller deficit!

Of course high deficits are not harmless. They cause great anxiety in the money markets, especially when combined with a suspicion that inflation is not dead, only sleeping. But there are cogent arguments that the role of deficits are not that crucial in destabilizing our economy—but such arguments have few adherents in Washington these days, certainly not among Republicans and conservative Democrats.

If deficit spending is the devil, what price exorcism? What side effects might a balanced budget amendment cause to the national economy? The effect will be profound, because only twice in the past twenty years have we had a budget in balance.

The President's budget is sent to Congress in January, about eight months before the fiscal year begins. It is based on explicit economic presumptions which, as time passes and the free economy operates, may be validated, or, more likely, invalidated. There are so many unpredictable factors in financing government such as the timing of actual expenditures where long lead times are involved (as in multi-year programs), the presence of open-ended programs such as unemployment benefits and the future payment of as yet undetermined interest rates on the national debt. The point is—and it's an important one—federal revenues and expenditures cannot be precisely predicted nor controlled, the budget is significantly affected, not only by the program proposed but by the underlying assumptions about the performance of the economy. These are always optimistic, because no administration wants to predict failure for its economic policies.

There is an ongoing relationship between fiscal policy (or how much taxes shall we raise and how shall we spend these funds?) conducted by an elected Congress and monetary policy (at what rate shall our money supply grow?) conducted by the Federal Reserve Board. The latter group is independent and conducts its policy under conditions of confidentiality, whereas Congressional deliberations are quite public. Assuredly if fiscal discretion is limited by an amendment, increased reliance on monetary policy will follow in the event of economic destabilization. One can confidently predict that in such event the independence of the Federal Reserve Board would soon be under sharp assault.

In January, 1981, during David Stockman's confirmation hearings as Director of the Office of Management and Budget, he expressed serious reservations about a constitutional amendment to prevent deficit spending. On May 19, 1982, however, Mr. Stockman testified before our House Judiciary Subcommittee in favor of such an amendment, thus echoing President Reagan's support which was announced in his March 31st press conference.

Back in January, Stockman testified "but I think the very practical problem is how do you define spending? Once you begin to unravel that onion, it unravels and unravels forever . . . There are any number of innovative means that could be developed to circumvent that kind of . . . amendment."

Since January, however, it has become painfully apparent that Congress lacks the courage to make necessary cuts in entitlements and there is stubborn resistance to substantial tax increases. This creates the spectre of huge deficits and perpetually high interest rates. What to do?

Whenever problems are created by complex social or economic forces, there is an almost irresistable tendency to seek answers in slogans, cliches and populist asseverations. These include worthy goals to be achieved but often are woefully short on technical details concerning workability and ultimate consequences. The Equal Rights Amendment and the Nuclear Freeze Resolution are examples of stating desirable goals—but which raise serious questions that must be responsibly addressed. What of definitions? Enforceability? What new and unanticipated problems might arise? Ought we not spend some time thinking about these?

I suggest before we get emotionally and politically committed to any such proposition, some attention to detail is essential if we are not to be confronted with a new and equally frustrating set of difficulties.

What are some other problems with a Balanced Budget Amendment? Can we make some changes that will make it work?

First of all, should the Constitution be cluttered with economic policy prescriptions? Should it contain fiscal mechanisms so inflexible that unforeseen circumstances might require either legislative paralysis or cynical constitutional evasion? Too often reform laws are adopted and the first response of Congress is not how to conform but how to evade the new law. The debt ceiling law is a prime example.

Congress may feel it is lifting the burden of hard choices by transferring fiscal policy to the Constitution, but business cycles, with their contractions and expansions, are an unavoidable part of a free economy; when the economy contracts the same hard choices will present themselves. Shall we vote to raise taxes or try for a three-fifths vote to create a deficit? Or, toughest choice of all, shall we sharply cut spending?

Mr. Stockman was quite correct last January when he adverted to the ability of Congress to innovate when it comes to spending. True, some conventional off-budget outlays would be covered by the amendment, but what about indirect spending such as loan guarantees and federal mandates to both the private and non-federal public sector? Will Congress, in a perverse form of federalism toss some seriously burdensome fiscal responsibilities to impoverished state and local governments?

To those of us who worry about judicial activism on the part of unelected lifetime tenured federal judges, are we transferring budget decisions that belong in Congress to the courts?

One hates to be technical as the Budget Balancing Train rolls down the track, but there is a time-lag between policy action and cash impact, and won't this create a bias towards increasing taxes rather than lowering spending?

The experts tell us that cash flow changes resulting from new tax policy can be realized within three months, whereas cash flow changes owing to new spending policy require from three months to three years to enact, implement and realize.

Under the proposed Amendment (S.J. Res. 58, H.J. Res. 350), to increase the deficit, a super majority (60 percent) vote is required. To increase taxes requires only a simple majority. The latter may thus be easier to achieve and hence the bias towards increasing taxes.

There is a double bias against defense spending: under the amendment the only way to incur a deficit for defense by majority vote, is in the event of a formal declaration of war by Congress. But such declarations are anachronistic in the contemporary world. They bring into play a whole litany of war-time laws involving treason, censorship, trading with the enemy and a panoply of emergency powers that, under the particular circumstances, might be unwarranted and unwise. The most serious problem involves the impact such a declaration would have on other nations—soon allies of other countries would be following suit and a giant and irreversible step towards World War III would be taken. There are many dangerous situations where a partial mobilization might be appropriate or where, due to a state of belligerency elsewhere, it might be vital that we take steps to beef up our defense forces short of a declaration of war. But under the Amendment a 41 percent minority of Congress could block such action. Is this wise? Remember, just before Pearl Harbor the draft passed by only one vote in the House. We must exercise the greatest care not to paralyze our government in time of emergency.

To state the problem is to suggest a solution: change the requirement from a declaration of war by Congress to a Presidential declaration of national emergency affecting our national security interests.

The other bias against defense rests in the fact that, in an economic crunch, where outlay reductions are necessary to balance the budget, the last target will be entitlements and the first target will be the "controllable outlays," and 70 percent of these are for defense.

While recognizing the adoption of such an amendment might signal the money markets that we are serious about eliminating budget deficits, one can easily imagine a scenario where this Congress adopts such an amendment and four years or so are consumed in the ratification and implementation process. By then, many members of the present Congress will be gone, but in the interim, it will be spending as usual. The Wall Street Journal has termed this exercise "a game of Constitutional cop-out."

On the other side of the argument, some powerful allies are working effectively, including Milton Friedman, the National Taxpayers Union and the National Tax Limitation Committee and others—knowledgable and deserving of great respect. They present some virtually irresistable arguments—which can be summarized in seven short words: The federal budget is out of control.

David Stockman, in his Judiciary Subcommittee testimony in support of the Amendment, pointed out:

"Under current law, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that non-defense entitlements will cost $359 billion in fiscal 1983, and $1.2 trillion over the next three years. That huge sum embodies the essence of the fiscal problem and deficit crisis now upon us." Yet in the face of triple digit deficits and non-defense entitlement spending reaching one-half trillion a year in fiscal 1987, the Budget Resolution so agonizingly adopted recently by Congress has hardly reassured the financial markets that we are even close to balancing the budget.

Just what it takes to jolt Congress out of its relentless urge to spend is the big question. But wasn't that what the election of 1980 was all about? The voters really have the last word if only they will use it!

This issue is too important to remain bottled up in a subcommittee of Congress. It ought to be debated by the House and Senate.

But it would be a shame—a crying shame—if the Balanced Budget Amendment becomes just another artful dodge by Congress to avoid making the many hard choices inherent in the budgetary process, and essentially, at the heart of representative democracy.

ENHANCEMENT OF AVIATION SAFETY THROUGH TECHNOLOGY

HON. MARJORIE S. HOLT

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, I am a firm believer in the enhancement of aviation safety. In this connection, we should do our utmost to exploit technology and the state of the art to augment flying safety for the passengers, our communities, and both commercial and general aviation. Recently, the Baltimore Sun carried a timely editorial, dated June 25, 1982, entitled "Orderly Skies." I commend it to my colleagues.

ORDERLY SKIES

Is it worth $9 billion to make the nation's airways safer? The answer has to be yes, though the price tag may sound as melodic as a sonic boom. J. Lynn Helms, head of the Federal Aviation Administration, is counting on the user-fee approach favored by the Reagan White House to make the investment palatable to Congress. He would have the Treasury come forth with an original appropriation of $3.9 billion, with the remainder to be funded through user fees over a 12-year period.

We leave it to Congress to figure out the finances. What is crucial in Mr. Helms' proposal, outlined at a recent convention in Baltimore, is a desire to make the world's safest air control system even safer. It also could become more efficient and faster-moving in the process.

The proposed $9 billion traffic control system would, for example, guide airline pilots from Los Angeles to New York by computer. This sort of advanced technology will soon be necessary because the 100,000 planes flying today (not all at once) will grow to 200,000 in nine years.

The FAA contends that the proposal would pay for itself in the long run and save $25 billion by the end of the century. It is the sort of arithmetic that has won the support of the Reagan budget office and generated favorable comment on Capitol Hill. Without the advances in computerized automation that the plan envisions, the number of air controllers would have to be increased to 28,000, Mr. Helms maintains. The traffic-control system is still trying to recover from last year's strike: It is slowing increasing the 9,500 controllers now at work toward the pre-strike level of 14,000.

One selling point is the fact that those who travel by air would pay for the bulk of the improvements through an increase in the tax on airline tickets—from 5 to 8 percent—and higher tariffs for aviation fuel.

Economics aside, airline passengers and pilots should find comfort in some features of the FAA's plan that includes an increase from two minutes to 10 minutes in the warning time for avoiding mid-air collisions. In addition, the proposed new system will provide pilots of both airliners and private planes minute-by-minute updates of weather conditions at their destinations.

Air passengers, especially the "white knuckle" breed that never lets go of the arm rests, can only applaud such promised marvels of technology.●

YOUNG MEN SHOULD NOT BE DENIED STUDENT AID

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I strongly oppose the proposed amendment to H.R. 6030, the Department of Defense authorization bill, to prohibit young men who have failed to register for the draft from receiving Federal student aid assistance.

There are several justifications for disagreeing with the goals of this amendment. First, I believe that this measure is unconstitutional. It deprives young men of due process, in violation of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, and violates the 14th amendment by not providing for equal protection under the law. The amendment presumes a person guilty of not registering and potentially punishes him for a crime for which he has not been convicted, in violation of article 3, section 2, clause 3 of the Constitution. At the same time, the amendment fails to recognize the plight of the student, who for religious reasons, may desire conscientious objector status but has no outlet through the regular registration process to achieve this goal.

Mr. Speaker, our current Selective Service statutes provide for appropriate judicial procedures to try suspected offenders. In fact, if convicted, the defendant faces a maximum sentence of up to 5 years imprisonment and/or a $10,000 fine—no slight penalty.

Further, the implementation of an amendment of this nature would substantially increase the costs of administering the Federal student aid programs at a time when we have slashed the staff and administration budgets. Without question, it would spur massive quantitites of paperwork and further intrusion into the personal lives of individuals by the Federal Government, as a check was run on approximately 1.4 million 18- to 24-year-old male student aid recipients. I am afraid this would cause even more delays in processing financial aid awards than we are currently experiencing. I do not stand alone in this belief. In a July 13 memo to Budget Director David A. Stockman on this amendment, Secretary of Education Terrel H. Bell stated that:

> The means to accomplish that end would require a level of unnecessary Federal intrusion and administrative complexity and burden which we roundly oppose.

Reportedly, Mr. Stockman agrees that another approach would be more satisfactory as well.

The issues before the House in regard to this amendment do not have anything to do with whether or not one disagrees with the draft. That is already the law. What I am recommending is that we reject a policy which is unnecessary, which discriminates against young men, which would be a regulatory nightmare, and which violates due process. I urge my colleagues to reject this unwise amendment.●

AMERICA'S MISSING CHILDREN

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, an especially devastating tragedy descends on several U.S. households on any given day. It is the tragedy of missing children—children abducted by strangers, children who run away and never come back, children who are abandoned, children who become lost for one reason or another. Estimates about the numbers of children who disappear each year and who are not runaways fall generally between 50,000 and 100,000, but no one knows for sure.

There are far too many case histories that read like those of Adam Walsh or Etan Patz: Youngsters who disappear virtually from under the noses of their parents and who are later found dead, like Adam, or never found at all.

An unnecessary stumbling block to solving the growing backlog of cases is a lack of coordination among law enforcement departments and the Federal system, in great part because of our only halting use of an excellent crime-fighting tool. If your car is stolen, it is immediately logged on a register that any policeman can check. But if your child is missing, the information available to help in your search is nowhere near that useful and complete.

The proposed Missing Children Act, H.R. 3781, would provide a far more extensive use of this tool, the FBI's National Crime Information Center computer, to help track information about missing children. We propose creation of a missing children file on the computer, and also, for the first time, a file to collect information about unidentified bodies of children and adults. The added expense would be minimal, and the benefits would be great. We owe it to our children to make full use of all the tools at our disposal in the search for missing youth.

In its current issue, the Reader's Digest details the scope of the problem and provides a glimpse of the special kind of anguish which the families of missing children must endure. The article, by Gary Turbak, originally appeared in Kiwanis Magazine. I commend it to the attention of my colleagues:

MISSING: 100,000 CHILDREN A YEAR

(By Gary Turbak)

About 8:30 a.m. on January 7, 1980, Katheleen Mancil drove her daughter Marian Batson to school in Inverness, Fla. "See you tonight," Katheleen called as the petite, blue-eyed 16-year-old stepped from the car.

But she did not see Marian that night. Or the next. Or the next.

No one remembers seeing Marian after she left her mother's car. The day after her disappearance, her purse was found in a trash can about 25 miles from the school. She had joined the swelling ranks of children simply labeled missing.

Sheila and Katherine Lyon, ages 13 and 11, journeyed to a suburban shopping center on March 25, 1975, and were never seen again. In early October 1980, two-year-old Brandy Barlow vanished from her front yard. The list goes on.

Probably the most publicized missing-child case of late has been that of six-year-old Etan Patz. On May 25, 1979, Etan walked alone for the first time to his Manhattan school-bus stop and has not been seen since. Methodical searches with bloodhounds, helicopters, psychics, and phalanxes of police have failed to turn up any clues.

These are not isolated cases. Everyone close to the missing-child problem agrees that it is a large one—and growing. Statistics, however, are tough to come by. Boundaries between runaways, parental kidnap victims and children stolen by strangers tend to blur.

The best estimates are that about a million American youngsters leave home each year, with 90 percent returning in two weeks. Approximately 100,000 children are thus unaccounted for. Add another 25,000 to 100,000 stolen by divorced or separated parents, and the total becomes significant. "Kids who just disappear present a big problem that people had better start opening their eyes to," says Det. Sgt. Dick Ruffino of the Bergen County, New Jersey, Sheriff's Office.

Yet no single U.S. agency concerns itself exclusively with missing children on a national scale. Automobiles, handguns and silverware can be registered, traced and recovered more easily than children. "Our priorities are mixed up," says Ken Wooden, director of the National Coalition for Children's Justice. "If someone steal a car, he can be traced and caught because we have a computer system for tracing stolen cars. But children apparently aren't that important to us."

Each missing-child case has its own poignant drama and irony. In July 1976, 12-year-old Dee Scofield disappeared while running an errand at a Florida shopping center. Two days later, a classmate reportedly saw Dee looking out a van window, desperately forming the word "Help" over and over with her lips. Dee Scofield has never been found.

On October 18, 1981, Jimmy Rogers, 14, left his Hanson, Mass., home for a friend's house. He may have hitched a ride. He has not been seen or heard from since.

"Child snatching, kidnapping and the ugly things that happen to these kids are so horrendous that people refuse to deal with them," explains Stan Patz, father of missing Etan. "Trying to handle cases like ours on a local level is a tremendous impediment. We need a centralized, national clearinghouse with information about which children are missing and how they can be identified."

But most cases fall to local police, against whom some parents of missing children raise a litany of complaints. because so many children do run away from home, police label most missing kids runaways. And unless the child is very young or evidence of foul play exists, police commonly will not act on a missing child report for 24 hours. The reason: sheer work volume. A surfeit of violent crimes—most with injured victims and plenty of evidence—takes priority over the "maybe" crime of a missing youngster.

The heart-rending tragedy, of course, occurs when the child is not a runaway and could possibly have been helped if immediate action had been taken.

On the morning after Christmas, 1974, 13-year-old Janna Hanson went to a friend's house. A short time later, Doreen Hanson drove by to pick up her daughter; Janna wasn't there. Doreen immediately went to the police, but they wouldn't search for 24 hours.

When police did finally begin an investigation, it was too late. Janna's body was found after several months, and evidence indicated she had been murdered on December 26.

Parents also complain bitterly about the FBI's refusal to help find missing children. The FBI becomes involved in a missing-child case only when there's proof of a kidnapping—such as a ransom note—or evidence that the child was taken across state lines.

"The first-time disappearance of a minor should be prima facie evidence that a kidnapping has taken place," says John Clinkscales, whose son Kyle disappeared six years ago "The FBI could then become immediately involved, and there might be a chance of finding some of these children. We need help."

And answers. Parents always ask the inevitable: Why? Why would someone steal a child? Why my child? There are many answers, yet no answers.

A million couples a year divorce in the United States, and many of these cases result in child snatchings. For love, hate, spite or revenge, one parent steals a child from the other.

In December 1974, Gloria Yerkovich said good-by to her four-year-old Joanna as the girl left to spend the weekend with her father. She didn't want to go, but a court order had said she must.

Joanna never returned. The separation that was to last a weekend has stretched to 7½ years.

Despicable as a parental kidnapping is, these children may be more fortunate than others. At least there's a chance they will go to school, grow up and lead a more or less normal life.

When a stranger steals a child, anything can happen. Parents of missing children hope that their child will end up in a loving, caring family, perhaps through blackmarket adoption. The cruel truth is that a missing child stands a fair chance of being murdered. Each year an estimated 2,500 children in the United States disappear and later are found murdered.

While the abduction and murder of a child is a senseless, psychotic act, many children are used for much more calculated reasons. Says Ken Wooden, "Kids are constantly being sought for the lucrative child-prostitution business. Most police departments and public officials aren't doing anything about it."

If fear about what may be happening to a missing child is the parents' primary emotion, frustration is the second. Often, little more is done once local police exhaust all leads. Teleprinted missing-child reports from one city do not carry a high priority in another. Verbal descriptions alone are often useless.

Out of desperation, parents turn to posting fliers and driving by parks and other areas frequented by children. "It's a totally helpless feeling," says Stan Patz. "There's just nothing more we can do."

In the past few years, however, various groups have been formed—usually by parents or relatives of missing children—to advise and comfort distraught parents. One such organization is Child Find, Inc., Box 277, New Paltz, N.Y. 12561. It maintains a toll-free number (800-431-5005) to be used by children searching for their parents or parents trying to identify missing children. Another organization is SEARCH, which publishes The National Runaway/Missing Persons Report, a magazine containing photos, descriptions and personal data that can help identify the missing. The report is distributed about every three months to 22,000 agencies and individuals in law enforcement, security, medicine and social service. SEARCH's address is 560 Sylvan Ave., Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 07632. (All correspondence should include a stamped, self-addressed envelope.) Phone: 201-567-4040.

But such efforts are not likely to solve the problem overnight. At present, hope is a parent's most sustaining weapon.

For some families, that hope does not cease even after a child's body is found. Says Doreen Hanson: "After our daughter's remains were discovered, we still kept searching, at least in our minds. For weeks after, I would see a girl on the street who resembled my daughter and I would hope in my heart that it was Janna.

"No one on the outside can understand the trauma taking place in a family that has a child missing. The frustration, the not knowing, the agony are beyond explanation."●

IN RECOGNITION OF CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. MARGARET M. HECKLER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Speaker, for 24 years this Congress has been observing Captive Nations Week. Every Chief Executive since President Eisenhower has set aside the third week in July for this purpose.

In our observation, we salute the brave people in over 30 nations around the world that live under the yoke of tyranny and of Marxist-Leninist ideology. In Eastern Europe, in parts of Asia, and within the Soviet Union itself, people lack the personal and political liberties that we so cherish here in the United States.

That these captive peoples worldwide have continued to maintain their ideals—their belief in human dignity and liberty—should be an example to us all and should serve to remind us of just how precious our freedom is.

As we take this time to speak out for their freedom, we should also recognize the countrymen and countrywomen of those in the dominated nations. The people from these captive nations who fled to the United States have worked tirelessly for their friends and relatives who have remained behind.

Since last year's observance of Captive Nations Week, we have seen an abrupt and brutal end to the growing light of freedom in Poland. The imposition of martial law in that nation in December 1981 provided a stark picture of life under a totalitarian regime. Afghanistan continues to be shadowed by the guns of the Soviet Union. Dissidents in Soviet Latvia, Estonia, Lithuania, and the Ukraine are harassed and persecuted.

Let the oppressors listen as we again raise our voices. We will not stop until all peoples in the world live in freedom.●

LETTER ON DENIAL OF SOVIET EXIT VISA

HON. JOHN L. BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include for the RECORD my letter to the San Francisco Bay Area Council on Soviet Jewry concerning the denial by the Soviet Union of an exit visa to Ms. Tamara Belopolskaya.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 19, 1982.

BAY AREA COUNCIL ON SOVIET JEWRY,
San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR FRIENDS: I regret that previously scheduled commitments prevent my joining you at the rally today to be held at the Soviet Consulate, in support of Tamara Belopolskaya and her attempts to emigrate from the Soviet Union.

Ms. Tamara Belopolskaya has unjustly been denied an exit visa from the Leningrad emigration office six times since her husband, Valery Krylov, was allowed to leave the U.S.S.R. last November. The last time she submitted her application, presenting an official invitation from her husband to join him in San Francisco, it was denied, and she then informed them that she will not eat until she receives permission to join her husband. She has thus lived only on water since June 28, and I understand that her husband will begin a fast today in her support.

The Soviet authorities have already been approached in this case, where I have written to both Mr. Andrei Bokov, Director of the Leningrad OVIR and Mr. Gregory Romanov, First Secretary of the Communist Party of Leningrad, on May 18, 1982, requesting that Ms. Belopolskaya be allowed to join her husband, but I have yet to receive a reply.

I fully support your rally, and find it fitting to remember all those whose rights to travel freely are curtailed, and to demand that they be given the opportunity to be reunited with their loved ones. I once again implore the Soviet authorities to grant Ms. Belopolskaya an exit visa so that she may be reunited with her husband.

I join you in this rally in speaking out against injustice. Please add my voice to yours in calling for Tamara Belopolskaya's emigration.

Peace and friendship,

JOHN L. BURTON,
Member of Congress.●

THE FTC AND ADVERTISING BY PROFESSIONALS

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, recently, the American Management Association published a book by my constituent, Mr. Irwin Braun of North Merrick, N.Y. entitled "Building a Successful Professional Practice With Advertising." Mr. Braun, president of Braun Advertising Inc. of New York City, is an acclaimed authority in his profession, and his book was selected by Library Journal as one of the best business books of 1981.

I have inserted the first chapter of the book in the RECORD today because of what Mr. Braun says about an issue before the Congress. The Energy and Commerce Committee is considering the reauthorization of the Federal Trade Commission. A controversial part of that reauthorization concerns the regulation of the learned professions by the FTC and the 1977 Supreme Court decision on advertising by lawyers that touched off that controversy. Mr. Braun speaks to that issue in this chapter and I recommend that my colleagues consider his views.

CHAPTER 1—BEYOND THE SUPREME COURT DECISION

"It's a disgrace." . . . "It's not for me." . . . "It won't last." . . . "It demeans the profession." . . . These are some of the comments I have heard from professionals regarding advertising by their colleagues. It doesn't surprise me. Recent surveys of lawyers, dentists, and physicians indicate that the majority are against advertising at this time.

So why am I writing this book? Because I can confidently predict that in the not too distant future the vast majority of professionals will be engaged in some form of communication. It could be on radio or TV; in the Yellow Pages, newspapers, or magazines; by direct mail; or outdoors. This prediction is based on current trends in professional advertising, the new concepts in the marketing of professional services, and the changing demographics of the tradition-bound professions.

Advertising by professionals has intensified since the Supreme Court ruled in 1977 that lawyers could advertise their fees. Most professions have seen their local and state associations draft new codes of conduct regarding advertising. Some have simply prohibited the use of false or misleading claims. Others have adopted strict codes prohibiting the use of guarantees, discounts, endorsements, or free consultations. Professionals are also prohibited from engaging in sensational, comparative, or flamboyant advertising.

Despite all the restrictions, The New York Times reported (February 12, 1979) that there had been widespread violations and abuses by professional advertisers in New York State. One lawyer ran an ad which contended that he never lost an uncontested divorce case. These violations prompted the New York City Consumer Affairs Commissioner to conclude that professional advertising is "a mess."

But who are these advertising professionals? According to a study conducted by the American Bar Association, they are mostly attorneys whose income is low. The American Bar Association found a definite relationship between advertising and income. When a lawyer's income is low, the likelihood of advertising is high. As income rises, the incidence of advertising decreases.

In most cases, these advertising professionals are recent graduates of professional schools who do not want to wait ten years to build a practice. This is a generation that was raised on mass communications and knows its impact. And these young people recognize that advertising could be a medium not only for attracting patients and clients but for educating them as well.

One young lawyer who opened a practice in a suburban shopping center said, "Advertising helped get my name known." He opened his practce without a client. A dentist in Tucson said, "Why should we exclude advertising from the other tools we employ in our practice? Properly handled, it helps us to reach out and treat people who might otherwise never receive proper dental care."

On the other hand, some professionals who advertise are established practitioners who are trying to reposition their practices. Noted criminal lawyer F. Lee Bailey and his associate, Aaron J. Broder, used small classified ads in Chicago and Los Angeles and on the front page of The New York Times to advertise their specialty in aircraft disasters. This prompted Advertising Age (January 15, 1979), the leading publication in the advertising business, to state, "With F. Lee Bailey, who is probably the nations' best-known lawyer, opting to advertise and doing it on the front page of the country's most influential newspaper, it is rather clear that legal advertising is here to stay."

MARKETING PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

The influence of these advertising professionals is already beginning to be felt. The prices of certain routine services have dropped considerably where there has been intense fee advertising. One physician who set up a cosmetic surgery center said, "Advertising promotes healthy competition, and competition promotes lower fees."

The 1980s will be a decade when professionals will experience a new kind of competition. The number of professionals is increasing each year, and the government is forecasting surpluses even for physicians in a few years. There is already an oversupply of lawyers, and the competition continues to grow. Furthermore, the increased scrutiny of professionals by the media, government, and consumer groups has also heightened competition. Finally, we can anticipate that competition in the marketplace will grow as more and more professionals devise new concepts for marketing medical, dental, and legal services. These mavericks would like to do to their professions what H&R Block did for tax preparation: standardize the service and deliver it to the greatest number of consumers.

One such innovator was a dentist who was rapidly setting up dental centers in a retail chain throughout the country. "Dentistry," he said, "is still being practiced as it was 75 years ago, with dentists barely tapping the market of this $10 billion industry." A young lawyer who was busily setting up legal clinics all over the United States predicted, "You will see a real revolution in the way professional services are delivered in this country." This revolution is the marketing of professional services for the first time to the American public. What is marketing? Simply stated, marketing is analyzing the marketplace and taking advantage of the results of the analysis. It is the way most businesses sell a product or service. More than any other business function, it seeks to expand volume and profits by determining the needs of consumers and satisfying them.

To market your services, you need to identify what your clients/patients want and then fill the need. And you have to determine how much they are willing to pay for these services, so that you can still make a profit.

Marketing can give you a certain image, which may appeal to either a broad or limited segment of the population, depending upon what you want to accomplish. A practitioner can't be all things to all people. Define what makes you unique, and communicate this to your specific audience.

Communication has always been a vital ingredient in the marketing mix. Without it, selling any product or service in this communications-oriented society would be practically impossible. No matter how good a product or service is, you still have to sell it to the ultimate consumer. The old adage "Build a better mouse trap and the world will beat a path to your door" will not work in this age of communications.

Some of the largest companies in this country, like Procter & Gamble, are known for their marketing expertise. They use research to develop new products that fulfill a particular consumer demand and need. They then use all the components of the marketing mix—advertising, public relations, sales, and promotion—to deliver a product or service to a target audience at a competitive price.

Some of the recent trends in marketing professional services are discussed below.

CLINICS

Clinics are springing up all over in malls, shopping centers, storefronts, and department/discount stores—as daring professionals devise new techniques for delivering dental, legal, and medical services. These clinics recognize that the middle class has always been shortchanged when it comes to professional services. The middle class is being squeezed as the price of these services soars beyond the inflation rate. As a result, nearly half of all Americans do not seek regular dental care, according to a survey made by the American Dental Association in 1978. Similar findings for legal services have been well documented in major research studies. Close to 70 percent of the U.S. population do not have adequate access to attorneys. Furthermore, lawyers are consulted for slightly less than a third of all problems that could be called legal problems, reported the American Bar Association Commission on the Need for Legal Services in 1978.

Recognizing a need, lawyers have been opening clinics at an unprecedented rate. "There may be a legal clinic in every neighborhood in five to ten years. It is inevitable that this kind of operation will succeed," said Gary C. Huckaby, chairman of the American Bar Association's Committee on Delivery of Legal Services.[1] Before 1977, just a handful of clinics existed; by 1979, the number had soared to over 700.

What are these clinics? They are simply high-volume, high-efficiency firms. They range from local operations to multistate chains, from sparsely furnished offices to plush facilities employing the latest technology. The key to the clinic concept is to reduce the work load in the office by using preprinted forms, standardized procedures, and work sheets that can be handled by paraprofessionals and staff personnel. Equally important is the use of ancillary personnel to perform routine procedures that were previously done by professionals. Traditionally, lawyers have billed their time on an hourly basis: $75, $100, or $200 per hour. Clinics work on the principle of being more efficient and getting more done within the hour so they can then pass on the savings to the consumer.

Equally important, clinics concentrate on recurrent problems of the average citizen so that they can keep costs low. Legal clinics handle a wide variety of problems, including criminal cases, uncontested divorces, domestic relations, landlord-tenant cases, bankruptcies, real estate closings, and name changes. Complex litigation is handled by outside consultants who are hired on an "of counsel" basis and share the fee charged by the clinic. The administrative work is done by the clinic.

Clinics also save money by buying supplies in volume and using inhouse services (like dental laboratories). Computers are used to store and retrieve information, as well as to assess the management of each office.

Clinics depend on a large number of clients walking in and have learned that the road to success is paved with advertising. Stephen Meyers of The Legal Clinic of Jacoby & Meyers said, "Advertising is what makes it possible to generate a clientele large enough for us to deliver services efficiently."

PROFESSIONAL SERVICE CENTERS IN CHAIN STORES

More and more mass merchandisers, such as Montgomery Ward (No. 1), are setting up professional service centers where store customers can find legal, dental, optical, health-testing, and other services. The stores lease the space to the professionals or have other financial arrangements. Because of the large volume of clients, the fees charged by these professionals are generally lower than those charged by solo practitioners.

The professional center is a response to the one-stop shopping trend that is sweeping the country. Now that close to one out of two women work, people want the convenience of going to one place for all their shopping needs. They want to save time and money. And because of the high costs of operating a car, people are confining their shopping to one or two familiar stores that they trust.

Convenience is an important benefit offered by these in-store professionals. In addition to being centrally located, the service centers have day and evening hours, are open seven days a week, take credit cards, and have ample parking facilities.

The professionals recognize the importance of store traffic. One practitioner who opened a chain of dental centers said that "close to one out of three new patients is produced through store traffic." The loudspeakers in these stores announce the availability of professional services. Store circulars, flyers, and signs also point the consumer toward the professional center.

In addition, centers advertise continuously in newspapers and on radio. They also use transit and outdoor advertising. These centers enjoy another advantage: What they pay for advertising media is a fraction of what others pay. Because the chains in which they are located purchase large amounts of newspaper, radio, and other advertising, they pay the lowest possible rates. The professionals benefit from the volume discounts earned by the store and, consequently, they run extensive ad campaigns.

GROUP AND ASSOCIATION ADVERTISING

Groups of professionals are banding together to advertise under an umbrella name. This is happening among lawyers, dentists, oral surgeons, chiropractors, and accountants. These groups have anywhere from ten to several hundred members who pool their financial resources to hire advertising agencies to create programs that attract new patients and clients. One such group of lawyers uses radio exclusively and promises to put consumers in touch with specialists for their particular problems. Another group of dentists advertises in newspapers only, under the caption "Personal dental care at low fees," and lists the fees in the ad. In many cases, these advertising groups are associations, such as the American Dental Association, the American College of Surgeons, the American Medical Association, and regional and state bar associations. Some are trying to create favorable images for their members, while others are actually acting as referral services.

A lot of professionals like this approach because their names are never mentioned in the advertising. The only time an individual name is revealed is when the consumer calls a central telephone number for additional information.

PREPAID LEGAL, MEDICAL, AND DENTAL PLANS

Another trend that we can expect to see more of in the future is the rise of prepaid legal, medical, and dental plans. This is occurring throughout the United States as companies, unions, and credit unions offer employees/members extra benefits. They can buy these services in volume at a greatly reduced cost. These organizations can also see that quality control is maintained and that their employees get the best services at a reasonable cost.

Health maintenance organizations (HMOs) are typical of these types of prepaid professional plans. HMOs emphasize preventive medicine in order to eliminate the need for serious treatment later on. Payment is generally administered by a third party—an employer, a union, or a professional organization. The employee does not have to contend with bills, claim forms, or deductible payments.

The growth of HMOs is unprecedented as companies and unions question the effectiveness of their present third-party health programs. They want to see more innovation and greater efficiency in medical care. They also want lower premiums to reflect these changes.

Various national studies indicate the effectiveness of the HMO. Compared with conventional insurance plans, HMOs have an average of 200 fewer hospitalization days per thousand members and 25 percent fewer surgical procedures. Employees subscribing to HMOs have a 17 percent lower absenteeism rate compared with employees covered by standard insurance plans.[2] Other professional plans are also growing in size. The National Resource Center for Consumers of Legal Services reports that by 1985 an estimated 20 million Americans will be covered by prepaid legal plans, as compared with about 12 million in 1979.

FRANCHISES

There are significant indications that many professionals may go the franchise route. Government statistics reveal that 90 percent of all franchised businesses succeed over a two-year period compared with 20–30 percent of all independent businesses. The franchisers hope to do for the professionals what Century 21 did for real estate: establish an image of professionalism with a saturation advertising program.

The management of these franchises will consist of entrepreneurs and professionals, each having control over different aspects of the operation. Many professionals recognize the value of working with marketing, management, and advertising experts who can guide them in building a successful practice. The businessmen will be involved in developing marketing programs, including advertising and promotion. They will use television and other mass media to build an image for a particular franchiser. They will also be concerned with setting up management systems to help the practitioner become more efficient. The professionals will be responsible for establishing quality assurances and defining the parameters for acceptability from practitioner to practitioner. Quality control will be a major concern for these franchises.

In some cases, franchisers will seek independent practitioners; in other cases, they will set up offices in chain stores and then franchise them to individual practitioners to operate. The cost of buying a franchise could be several thousand dollars. In most cases, there will be a monthly percentage-of-gross charge to help cover advertising and management expenses. The financial arrangements will vary from franchise to franchise.

PACKAGED PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

In the future, you can also expect to see major American packaged goods companies getting into health care, legal, and other services. For example, a dentifrice manufacturer might set up dental care centers where dentistry is practiced and toothpaste, brushes, fluoride mouth rinses, cavity-proof plastic sealants, and other related products are sold. Such companies have the marketing expertise and financial strength to deliver services to the vast majority of Americans. They recognize that by using the latest technology, they can deliver a variety of professional services and products at a reasonable cost.

THE GROWING NUMBER OF PROFESSIONALS

Another reason I can predict that the majority of the professionals will be engaged in some form of advertising in the future is the number of new practitioners entering the ranks each year, with a resulting increase in competition. Professional schools are turning out practitioners at an unprecedented rate, and the numbers keep increasing. Just look at the figures:

Profession	Total number employed (1979)	Number entering per year
Lawyers	420,000	35,000
Physicians	350,000	14,000
Accountants (CPA's)	190,000	15,000
Dentists	110,000	6,000

As surpluses build up, the reluctance to advertise will lessen. Also, it appears that the acceptance of advertising is greatest among the younger lawyers, dentists, accountants, and physicians. Recent studies of students in professional schools indicate that a good percentage of these future practitioners are in favor of advertising to build their practices. One dental school conducted a survey of its freshmen and found that 32 percent planned to advertise upon graduation. Medical Economics (August 6, 1979), survey medical student leaders and discovered that these leaders "see nothing wrong with advertising and are likely to use it in their practices."

THE GOVERNMENT'S ROLE

There is another important factor that I would like to mention: the role of the government. The Federal Trade Commission has assumed an aggressive posture to see that all attempts at curtailing competition in the professions are eliminated. The government recognizes that the cost of dental, medical, and legal services has gone up way beyond the current rate of inflation. Medical costs, for example, soared 240 percent between 1968 and 1980, faster than the cost of any other basic living need, including food. One out of every 11 dollars spent by consumers is on health services. The government is inclined to keep these costs in line. It recognizes that open competition will bring the fees down on dental, medical, and legal services, and it will be pressing national, state, and local organizations to drop restrictions on professional advertising.

ADVERTISING CAN PRODUCE RESULTS

Has advertising by professionals worked? Yes, whenever the practitioner used knowledgeable advertising people. In many cases, however, professional advertising has been poor indeed. The ads, full of bold black type, tend to sell too hard and to make other professionals resentful and uncertain as to where it will all end. You see these low-image ads everywhere: "Dentures $50." "Divorces—Uncontested $150." "Dental Examination Free." On radio and television, you hear boasts of "surprisingly low cost" or "just tight budget" professionalism. From what I have observed so far, most professional advertisements tend to be amateurish and one-shot deals with no understanding of the need for continuity. In fact, an American Bar Association commission study concluded that most advertising by lawyers has been poorly planned and ineffective, both in spreading the message about legal services and in attracting new clients for specific practitioners.

Advertising has become a very sophisticated business over the last decade. It is no longer a hit-or-miss proposition. Advertisers want to know what they are getting for every dollar spent. They want accountability, and they use highly developed techniques to determine advertising effectiveness.

The average professional doesn't have the expertise or time to create innovative, effective communications programs. But with a little knowledge of advertising and what to expect from it, practitioners working with communications experts can create practice-building programs that project their individual strengths to specific audiences.●

KEEP THE OCOEE OPEN 100 DAYS A YEAR

HON. ROBIN L. BEARD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. BEARD. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution to persuade the Tennessee Valley Authority to permit white-water rafting on the Ocoee River in Tennessee for 100 days a year by having TVA suspend power generation using the waters of that river during that time period. Having recently experienced the excitement and beauty of a trip down the Ocoee in a raft, I can assure my colleagues that this unique natural resource should be denied to no one.

To the great chagrin of the Nation's white-water enthusiasts, the TVA has placed a small electric generating flume on the Ocoee River, which effectively transforms the turbulent waters of the Ocoee into a mere trickle of a stream. The power generated by this particular flume represents a minuscule portion of the TVA's total power generation: 0.0007 to be exact.

This resolution asks that the TVA defer generation for 100 days per year and let the waters of the Ocoee provide its natural excitement for the some 70,000 rafters who venture to the Ocoee each year. The resolution further asks that the TVA abandon its position that compensation for this minimal loss of generating potential be provided by either the rafters or the Government; neither are obligated to pay for a natural resource.

The revenues forgone amount to only $250,000 per year—a paltry sum when compared to the $6 billion nuclear reactor investment which had to be abandoned when the TVA finally acknowledged that it had miscalculated power demand in the Tennessee Valley. This $250,000 represents one-sixteenth of the total tourism dollars spent in the Ocoee region each year. Perhaps the TVA should be reminded that economic development in the Tennessee Valley is a primary objective of its founding charter.

H. CON. RES. 382

Whereas the natural resources of the United States should be available to all persons;

Whereas the annual electric energy to be generated by the Ocoee number 2 flume will represent only seven ten-thousandths of the total electric energy (1,015,000,000 megawatt hours) to be generated by the Tennessee Valley Authority in 1983;

Whereas the loss of electric energy from not operating the Ocoee number 2 flume for 100 days is only 14,600 megawatt hours;

Whereas there are more than 70,000 persons white water rafting on the Ocoee River each year; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the Tennessee Valley Authority should not divert water from the Ocoee River, Tennessee, for the operation of the Ocoee number 2 flume for a minimum of 100 days per year, between April 1 and October 1 of each calendar year, and should not charge user fees for white water rafting on such river.

SECRETARY WATT, ONCE AGAIN, DRILLING IN TROUBLED WATERS

HON. TOBY MOFFETT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker, on July 21, 1982, the Department of the Interior announced its decision to go forward with a deeply flawed 5-year leasing program for the development of oil and gas on the Nation's Outer Continental Shelf. While such development can take place, under certain circumstances, in manners consistent with the protection of sensitive offshore ecosystems, the new Interior proposal will not provide adequate safeguards.

My Subcommittee on Environment, Energy and Natural Resources has been conducting an exhaustive investigation of the Interior's plans for these off-shore leases since early 1981. It is unfortunate, but essentially the case, that no more thought went into their latest proposal than that which surfaced relative to the leases in California.

On July 12, 1982, I along with many of my House colleagues wrote the Secretary and criticized this latest revised plan. Our letter is printed below.

It is my understanding that our colleagues from Massachusetts, Representatives MARKEY and STUDDS, will file a resolution of disapproval against this proposal in the near future. They certainly have my support, based upon the investigative work of my subcommittee. We have shown that the Secretary is "drilling in troubled waters," and urge that the newly announced plan be rejected.

The letter follows:

ENVIRONMENT, ENERGY, AND NATURAL RESOURCES SUBCOMMITTEE, OF THE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS,

Washington D.C., July 12, 1982.

Hon. JAMES G. WATT,
Secretary, Department of the Interior,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SECRETARY WATT: The orderly development of oil and gas resources on the Outer Continental Shelf is a vital national interest. Pursuant to that interest the Congress required in the OCS Lands Act Amendments (OCSLAA) of 1978 that the Administration prepare a five-year OCS plan to ensure that exploration and development occur in an orderly and environmentally safe manner. We have reviewed your revised five-year plan for OCS development and seriously question whether it defines a program that can be carried out with the proper environmental safeguards as required by law. We also have serious questions concerning the fair market return to the public that will ensue from this program.

The following problems with your five-year program must be addressed before this plan goes forward:

1. The Department of the Interior has failed to give serious consideration to objections made by virtually every coastal state on the size, timing, and location of lease sales off their coasts. Furthermore, Interior has attempted to minimize states' ability to have a meaningful partnership with the federal government over the manner and scope of development off their coasts. The Administration's failure to address the concerns of the states e.g. OCS air quality, pipeline use and tanker transport prohibitions, and its attempts to minimize state input have resulted in increased litigation against the Department of the Interior, further delaying a program already behind schedule.

2. A primary concern of the states which we share is that the new area-wide offerings place an excessive burden on agency field staff. The offering of entire planning areas severely limits the staff's ability to gather and analyze, prior to leasing, sufficient detailed information concerning environmental and marine life effects as well as the onshore impacts of oil and gas exploration and production. Likewise, both government and industry will be strained to collect adequate and accurate pre-lease information on available oil and gas reserves and geologic hazards. These area-wide offerings and the accompanying abandonment of tract-specific analysis of environmental risks, will make it difficult to meet the requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act; similarly, it is questionable whether the requirements of the OCSLAA to balance energy production with environmental and other concerns can be met. The U.S. Geological Survey should continue to provide site specific resource estimates and geohazard information. The present environmental studies program must be preserved and strengthened.

3. The plan does not adequately consider other very important coastal resources dependent upon healthful natural ecosystems, nor does it thoroughly examine potential effects from OCS drilling and production operations on the economies of businesses related to those resources. Specifically, the program does not provide adequate protection for the fisheries of Georges Bank, the commericial and sport fisheries and tourist industries of California and Oregon, or the fisheries of Alaska. The plan tends to understate and in some cases ignore the likely technological limitations of industry for exploring and developing frontier areas when faced with many new and unfamiliar challenges.

We urge you to revise your streamlining OCS program so that information necessary for informed decisionmaking is available prior to each lease sale.

Moreover, the streamlining procedures which shorten the leasing process in frontier areas from an average of 44 months to 24 months will not allow sufficient time for states and local governments to collect and analyze information so that they can plan for the on-shore impacts of development and so that environmentally sensitive areas can be adequately protected.

4. The program fails to provide sufficient time to analyze the information generated by the first sale in a particular area before reentry is permitted in a second sale. Most areas will experience second leases in two years. This timing problem is particularly critical in the many frontier areas being offered for lease, where little data already exists on the environmental sensitivity of hydrocarbon potential and value of those areas. It will be impossible, for example, to gather sufficient information from the first sale at Georges Bank. As the Massachusetts delegation has pointed out, two and one-half years after that sale more time is still needed to obtain and analyze environmental information before the next lease sale is held in the North Atlantic.

5. Finally, on economic grounds we question the wisdom of offering virtually the entire coast of the United States for sale in just five years. At a time when the oil market is glutted and the price of oil is depressed, it is folly to make available the entire Outer Continental Shelf. Lease bids will be driven down by present oil market conditions, by the huge increase in the number of tracts offered, and by the inability of industry and Interior to analyze accurately the potential of these huge areas. The Department's decision to turn fair-market value determinations over to the "market" under such conditions only increases the likelihood that the public will not realize a fair return.

All of these concerns have already been expressed to the Department of Interior by the coastal states and other interested parties. We believe that your proposed plan lacks the Congressionally-mandated balance between potential environmental and coastal impacts and resource development. We urge you to reconsider this misguided and unnecessarily hasty program in light of the many objections that have been raised and to withdraw it in favor of a more realistic, environmentally sound and fiscally responsible one.

Sincerely,

EL SALVADOR—NOT ANOTHER VIETNAM

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, I recently read an article penned by Edward L. Fike, editorial page editor of the San Diego Union. Entitled "El Salvador—Not Another Vietnam," the article hits the nail on the head as far as I am concerned. I commend it to my colleagues' attention.

EL SALVADOR—NOT ANOTHER VIETNAM

(By Edward L. Fike)

A 14-foot "Specter of Death"—a macabre hooded figure labeled "U.S. Military Aid"—led a march in downtown San Diego recently in observance of International Women's Day. About 75 members of the Women's Peace Action group marched alongside this grotesque giant. Each woman wore a black gown to demonstrate grief for the women of El Salvador. All bore identical signs reading "U.S. Out of El Salvador."

As the originators of this protest had unquestionably hoped, a dramatic photograph of the death march went forth over the newspaper wire services to tell the world that, even in San Diego—this den of militaristic right-wingers—there burns a pure flame of outrage over U.S. policy in El Salvador.

Similar anti-American demonstrations are being orchestrated around the world; thousands of protesters have taken to the streets in European cities to portray the United States as chief villain in El Salvador's tragedy.

"If the warmongers in the Reagan administration would only cease and desist," presumably all would be sweetness and light in Central America. Strange voices echo this preposterous theme across our land and abroad. Ed Asner, the Hollywood actor, is a sad example. Exploiting both his credibility as television's incorruptible journalist, Lou Grant, and his presidency of the powerful 55,000-member Screen Actors Guild, Mr. Asner recently announced that he and a group of actors and filmmakers had donated $25,000 to buy medical supplies for the Marxist guerrillas, who are fighting to overthrow the lawful government in El Salvador.

When asked if he favored a communist takeover of El Salvador, Mr. Asner hedged a bit finally said ". . . if they choose communism, so be it . . ."

The tragedy, so obvious to everyone except Mr. Asner and his fellow liberals, is that the civil war in El Salvador is precisely aimed at denying a choice to the poor people of that ravaged little country. The last thing the guerrillas want is to give El Salvador a choice. Knowing they can't win at the ballot box, the Marxists stepped up their violence in order to sabotage the national elections held last March.

One must wonder why Mr. Asner and his coterie are not sending help to the tragic victims of communism instead of to the communists. In their expressed humanitarian concerns, they care more about Marxist guerrillas than about Cuban refugees, or the boat people fleeing Vietnam, or the millions of Afghan refugees crowded in squalid camps just outside the borders of their invaded land.

Hollywood hearts bleeding for today's Marxist guerrillas in El Salvador are as outrageous as would be, for example, American groups sending medical aid to the Nazis invading France and the lowlands during World War II. For, the hard truth is that the Cubans and Soviets have invaded Central America and they and their Marxist surrogates are primarily responsible for the bloodbath in El Salvador!

But while the ultra-liberals of this country confuse public opinion and seek to paralyze U.S. policy, the truth is there for those who seek it. Even the liberal Washington Post has the integrity to place proper blame on Marxist terrorism. A recent article by a Post correspondent in El Salvador related widespread guerrilla terrorism: "In three church-run centers near the provincial capital of San Vicente there are 1,500 refugees who say that left-wing guerrilla terrorism has ruined their lives. . . . The bloodshed has displaced some 500,000 persons or 10 percent of the population—as though all the people of California were suddenly homeless, penniless, frightened, and spread out across the United States."

Nevertheless, no assistance we know of is being organized in the United States for these devastated Salvadorans, and their grievous story goes largely untold. Without question, the Marxists are getting the best of the war of words in this country and around the world.

The government of El Salvador lacks the propaganda skills and experience of the Marxists, particularly the Cubans. The anti-communist cause in Central America has no zealous followers in this country to agitate in the streets and to command media coverage.

The result is that the Reagan administration's effort to sustain El Salvador against siege by Cuba and the Soviet Union has itself become the issue—instead of the establishment of a communist beachhead on the mainland of the Western Hemisphere. Senator Robert Byrd wants to tie the President's hands completely in El Salvador. He and others preach the arrant nonsense that in the tiny country of El Salvador the United States faces another Vietnam, and endless Asian-like quagmire.

The stark truth is that we face a national disaster in the communist takeover of all Central America and, as night follows day, a spreading bloodbath next door in Mexico. We are on the defensive and losing in an area of vital strategic importance to the United States. But public opinion remains confused and tentative.

If the United States is so divided as to be paralyzed in the face of such rising danger in Central America and the Caribbean, can anyone, least of all the Soviets, believe Americans would shed blood to defend Persian Gulf oil or European allies, or anything short of bombs falling on the White House?

Mr. Asner and his allies are right about one thing. We ought to be certain that El Salvador is not another Vietnam—with its defeat, its unending human tragedy, and its legacy of fear and appeasement!●

SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY BENEFITS

HON. ROBERT W. DAVIS

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation today which will help to ease the hardships caused to many of the recipients of social security disability benefits whose eligibility is being reevaluated.

The Social Security Amendments of 1980 required an escalation of continuing disability investigations (CDI's). Previously, disability beneficiaries were reviewed only periodically to determine whether their physical or mental impairments continue to meet the disability requirements of the law. After two studies showed that approximately 18 percent of those receiving social security disability payments no longer met the eligibility criteria, the 1980 amendments included a provision that all those with nonpermanent disabilities be reviewed every 3 years and those whose conditions are permanently debilitating be reviewed every 5 years.

We would all agree that those who have regained their ability to work should be removed from the benefit rolls. However, the Social Security Administration (SSA) has gone way overboard in trying to weed out the 18 percent who are able to return to work. Recent SSA statistics demonstrate that for the period of October 3, 1981, through May 21, 1982, 234,721 CDI's were processed. Of that number 106,825—or 45.5 percent—were terminations. The rate of eventual reversals is close to 66 percent nationwide. While well over half of the terminated cases result in benefits being restored after the hearing, this does not ease the hardship created by many months without an income.

My bill will improve the present continuing disability investigation (CDI) procedure by:

Shortening the administrative appeals process by eliminating the statistically redundant State agency reconsideration for CDI's;

Extending the "grace period" in which benefits can be paid while the appeal is pending;

Resuming disability payments if SSA's hearing decision is not rendered within 9 months from the date the hearing request was filed;

Creating a uniformity of standards whereby all review levels would use the same disability eligibility guidelines. These guidelines would be determined by statute or subject to Federal rulemaking requirements;

Requiring a review for continuing entitlement within the first 3 years following the initial finding, with subsequent reviews at the discretion of the Secretary; and Prohibiting a finding by SSA that the beneficiary can return to work unless a medical improvement can be demonstrated in the beneficiary's condition or combined effect of several conditions.

The tremendous hardships caused by the escalation of CDI's is common to each of our districts. Thousands of truly disabled individuals are being summarily removed from the benefit rolls. They must endure many months without an income while proceeding through an appeals process ill-equipped to handle this influx of cases. Most of these people are later reinstated—often after the repossession of appliances, cars and even homes. It is imperative that we act quickly to address this problem.

H.R. 6837

A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to improve the administration of such title with regard to disability benefits

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Social Security Disability Benefits Act of 1982".

EXPEDITED APPEALS PROCESS

SEC. 2. (a) Section 221 of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(j) Whenever an individual receiving disability insurance benefits, or child's, widow's, or widower's insurance benefits based on disability, is determined not to be under a disability (whether as a result of a review under this section or otherwise), such individual—

"(1) may take any action provided by or permitted under this title to contest such determination immediately upon receipt of the earliest notice from the applicable State agency (or the Secretary) that such determination has been made, without the necessity of waiting for any formal notice of the actual termination of such benefits; and

"(2) shall in any case be entitled under subsection (d) to a hearing with respect to such determination (as described in the third sentence of section 205(b)) without the necessity of first obtaining reconsideration of the determination by such agency (or the Secretary).".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act (without regard to whether the determination involved was made before or after such date).

EXTENSION OF PERIOD BEFORE TERMINATION OF DISABILITY BENEFITS

SEC. 3. (a)(1) The second sentence of section 223(a) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(A) by striking out "third month" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "seventh month"; and

(B) by striking out "15 months" and inserting in lieu thereof "19 months".

(2)(A) Sections 202(d)(1)(G), 202(d)(6)(E), 202(e)(1) (last sentence), 202(f)(1) (last sentence), and 223(e) of such Act are amended by striking out "third month" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "seventh month".

(B)(i) Sections 202(d)(1)(G), 202(e)(1) (last sentence), and 202(f)(1) (last sentence) of such Act are amended by striking out "15 months" and inserting in lieu thereof "19 months".

(ii) Sections 216(i)(2)(D) and 223(e) of such Act are amended by striking out "15-month period" and inserting in lieu thereof "19-month period".

(3) Section 1631(a)(5) of such Act is amended by striking out "second month" and inserting in lieu thereof "sixth month".

RESUMED PAYMENT OF DISABILITY BENEFITS DURING APPEAL

SEC. 4. (a) Section 223 of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"RESUMED PAYMENT OF BENEFITS DURING APPEAL

"(g)(1) In any cases where—

"(A) an individual is a recipient of disability insurance benefits, or of child's, widow's, or widower's insurance benefits based on disability,

"(B) such individual is determined not to be under a disability, and as a consequence such individual is determined not to be entitled to such benefits,

"(C) a timely request for a hearing as provided in section 205(b) with respect to the determination that he is not so entitled is made under section 221(d), and

"(D) as of the end of the ninth month following the month in which the request for the hearing is made, no decision upon such hearing (without regard to whether the decision constitutes the final decision of the Secretary) has been made, the payment of such benefits, and the payment of any other benefits under this Act based on such individual's wages and self-employment income, shall be resumed for an additional period beginning with the month following the ninth month referred to in subparagraph (D) and ending with the month preceding the month in which a decision is made upon such hearing (without regard to whether the decision constitutes the final decision of the Secretary).

"(2) If the decision (referred to in paragraph (1)) upon the hearing affirms the determination that the individual is not entitled to the benefits, any benefits paid under this title (for months in such additional period) pursuant to the resumption of benefit payments under this subsection shall be considered overpayments for all the purposes of this title.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply with respect to determinations (that individuals are not entitled to benefits) which are made on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

TERMINATION OF BENEFITS BASED ON MEDICAL IMPROVEMENT

SEC. 5. (a) Section 223 of the Social Security Act (as amended by the preceding provisions of this Act) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"TERMINATION OF BENEFITS BASED ON MEDICAL IMPROVEMENT

"(h)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), an individual who is a recipient of benefits under this section, or child's, widower's, or widow's insurance benefits based on disability, may be determined not entitled to such benefits as a consequence of a determination that he is not under a disability only if the Secretary makes an affirmative finding that—

"(A)(i) there has been a medical improvement in the condition or conditions constituting the physical or mental impairment on the basis of which entitlement to such benefits was originally determined such that, when taking into account solely such condition or conditions, the individual is no longer under a disability under the standards for disability in effect at the time the entitlement to such benefits was originally determined, and

"(ii) the individual is not suffering any other physical or mental condition or conditions which, when taken as a whole together with the condition or conditions referred to in clause (i), constitute a physical or mental impairment on which a determination of disability may reasonably be based, without regard to whether any such condition individually constitutes such an impairment, or

"(B) the original determination that such individual was under a disability was clearly erroneous under the standards for disability in effect at the time the entitlement to such benefits was originally determined.

"(2) Paragraph (1) shall not apply in the case of a determination that an individual who is a recipient of benefits is not entitled to such benefits based upon a finding made in accordance with subsection (d)(4) that services performed or earnings derived from services demonstrate such individual's ability to engage in substantial gainful activity, or based on a finding of fraud.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply with respect to determinations made on or after October 1, 1982.

PERIODIC REVIEW OF DISABILITY DETERMINATIONS

SEC. 6. (a) Section 221(i) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"(h) In any case where an individual is determined to be under a disability, such determination shall be reviewed by the applicable State agency or the Secretary (as may be appropriate), for purposes of continuing eligibility, within three years after the date of the determination; except that where a finding has been made that the disability is permanent, such review (if any) may be conducted at such time as the Secretary determines to be appropriate. Where the review of a determination under the preceding sentence results in a finding that the individual continues to be under a disability, any subsequent review of the same determination shall be at the discretion of the State agency or Secretary (as the case may be); and at the completion of any review under the preceding sentence which results in such a finding the State agency or Secretary shall determine whether any such subsequent review appears to be appropriate and, if so, when it is likely to be conducted. In notifying any individual that he or she is entitled to benefits based on disability at the time of the initial determination of such disability, or that he or she continues to be entitled to such benefits as a result of a finding made upon a review under this subsection, the Secretary shall include a notice of whether a review or subsequent review under this subsection will be scheduled and, if so, the expected date of that review.".

(b)(1) Except as provided by paragraph (3), the amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply only with respect to reviews of disability determinations made in the case of individuals whose initial month of entitlement to benefits (based on the determination involved) is a month after September 1982; and section 221(i) of the Social Security Act (as in effect immediately prior to its amendment by this Act) shall be of no force or effect after September 30, 1982.

(2)(A) In the case of individuals whose initial month of entitlement to benefits based on disability was a month before October 1982, reviews of disability determinations for purposes of continuing eligibility shall be made at the discretion of the Secretary but (except as provided in subparagraph (B)) shall be limited in any calendar year to a number of cases which, when added to the number of cases (other than those involving disabilities found to be permanent) that are reviewed for the first time in such year under section 221(h) of the Social Security Act, does not exceed the total number of cases in which entitlement to disability insurance benefits under section 223 of such Act began in the preceding calendar year.

(B) In addition to the reviews permitted under subparagraph (A) in any calendar year, the Secretary may in his discretion review disability determinations in selected cases involving other individuals whose initial month of entitlement to benefits based on disability was a month before October 1982, but only to the extent that the Secretary affirmatively determines that the review of the selected cases will be cost-effective while assuring that sufficient personnel and administrative processing time will be available for the conduct of reviews of the highest possible quality under such section 221(h).

(3) Findings and decisions made as a result of reviews conducted under paragraph (2) of this subsection shall thereafter be treated for purposes of the second and third sentences of section 22(h) of the Social Security Act as though they had been made as a result of reviews conducted under the first sentence of that section.

UNIFORM STANDARDS FOR DISABILITY DETERMINATIONS

SEC. 7. Section 205(a) of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentences: "The Secretary shall assure that uniform standards are applied at all levels of adjudication in making determinations of whether individuals are under disabilitites as defined in section 216(i) or 223(d). Such uniform standards shall be consistent with applicable law and regulations, shall be subject to the requirements of section 553 of title 5, United States Code (relating to administrative procedure with regard to rule making), and shall be treated as public information required to be published in the Federal Register under section 552(a)(1) of such title (relating to public information; agency rules, opinions, orders, records, and proceedings), except that, in applying such section 552(a)(1) to such uniform standards, the last sentence thereof shall be disregarded.".●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, President Reagan proclaimed this to be Captive Nations Week, in accordance with a resolution passed by the Congress in 1959, directing the President to issue a proclamation each year "Until such time as freedom and independence shall have been achieved for all the captive nations."

In 1959, there were 22 nations listed in the original decree. Since that time, 11 other nations have been added to that list, including most recently Afghanistan and Nicaragua. The willingness of the Soviet Union to impose its will on other nations must not be underestimated. The examples of Soviet military action against Hungary in 1956, Czechoslovakia in 1968 and Afghanistan in 1979 demonstrate clearly that the Soviets will resort to force to impose their domination of other people.

While many have criticized the Reagan administration for its sanction against the Soviet Union's pressure against Poland, I believe they have served to deter the Soviets from invading Poland. Unlike the previous occasions when the Soviets marched troops in, especially in Afganistan, where they believed there would be little cost—ither political or economic—the sanctions have made it clear that there are severe costs that the Soviets must pay. They also must recognize that those costs will be even greater if they do not soon reduce the pressure on Poland and force an end to martial law.

I wish to commend this administration for its policy of characterizing Soviet threat and intimidation for being exactly what it is: A violation of the basic human rights of people to live and express themselves as they so choose. The Reagan administration policies represent, I believe, the basic spirit underlying the original resolution declaring Captive Nations Week:

It is vital to the national security of the United States that the desire for liberty and independence on the part of the peoples of these conquered nations should be kept steadfastly alive.

That is a policy not just for 1 week each year but for every week every year, and I am glad to see that it is being put into practice.●

END DEFICIT SPENDING

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, over the past decade and longer, it has become increasingly clear that the Federal Government—especially the Congress and the President—must take effective action to get its fiscal house in order.

In particular, the problem of perennial deficit spending has now pushed the national debt past the $1 trillion level. Moreover, under current budget and tax policies, baseline deficit spending is projected to add another $400 or even more billions to that mind-boggling debt over the next few years.

For these spendthrift policies, we have paid a terrible toll. The purchasing power of the dollar is well below half of what it was in 1967, just 15 years ago, as inflation has destroyed savings and pensions, and wracked the hopes of the Nation's workers.

We have gone through wage and price controls, and endured a "boom and bust" economy as the Federal Reserve Board has attempted to control the money supply by raising interest rates, only to lower them again when unemployment became unbearable.

Today, we are in the midst of a protracted recession—a depression in some sectors of our economy, such as the housing and automobile industries—as the Fed has turned the screws tighter to offset the explosive inflationary impact of our current huge deficits. Some 10 million Americans want to work, but cannot find jobs.

Our Nation's agriculture, the backbone of our economy and the breadbasket of the world, has never been so threatened in recent history as farmers are squeezed between the vice jaws of falling commodity prices and draconian interest rates.

And, at the same time, by our actions, we have committed the terrible sin of saddling future generations of Americans—our progeny—with a crushing burden of debt.

Let me say to my colleagues that this is not a new problem, but it has become worse with each passing year, as each larger and larger deficit is piled up on top of the old.

That is why many among us were sounding the alarm years ago. We called for the adoption of sunset legislation, so that Federal programs would be questioned and pruned on a regular basis. We voted against debt increases, and against budget and spending proposals—no matter how well intentioned—which were bigger than we could afford.

Then, in 1978, we voted for an amendment that would mandate a balanced budget no later than 1981, a mandate we have tragically ignored.

The American people have recognized that failure, and they are now calling for the adoption of strong measures that will mandate a balanced budget.

They know that, in planning their own budgets for their families and businesses, they cannot spend more than they earn year in and year out. They expect their National Government to act just as responsibly in allocating their hard-earned tax dollars.

In response to that demand, the idea of a constitutional amendment for a balanced budget has caught on and grown in popularity. It holds out to the American people the hope that, at long last, fiscal responsibility will become firmly imbedded into our national policymaking progress.

As simple and as forthright as this appeal may be, however, it may prove to be a false hope. Indeed, enshrining this untested and untried concept into the Constituiton is a course fraught with economic danger, and burdened with delay.

Even if it were to be ratified tomorrow, by its own terms, it could not take effect until the second fiscal year following its ratification. And of course, ratification will take a number of years. This means more years of huge deficits, more years of high interest rates, more years of stagnation and underutilization of our industrial base, and more years of high unemployment.

This type of passing the buck to future Congresses, perhaps even to a future President, is not what the American people have in mind.

Accordingly, today I am joining with my good friend and colleague on the other side of the aisle, Mr. HYDE, in introducing legislation that will mandate a balanced Federal budget at all times, commencing with the 1984 fiscal year.

We have chosen this course for a number of reasons:

First. The American people demand and deserve action to balance the budget and eliminate deficits now, not in 1985 or 1986, the earliest dates we could hope to ratify a constitutional amendment to achieve the same result;

Second. This legislation can be adopted by a simple majority—without need for the two-third's votes required to approve a constitutional amendment, a number that may prove to be illusive.

Third. Legislation of this nature can be amended to cure defects if need be or eliminate loopholes, whereas defects in a constitutional amendment can be cured only by going once again through the arduous course of obtaining a two-thirds vote in the Congress and by three-fourths of the legislatures in the States; in the interim, because the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, we would be forced to operate under a defective process.

Fourth. An amendment to the Constitution is wholly unnecessary because there is currently no impediment—other than the lack of courage by this and preceding Congresses and Presidents—to adopting a balanced budget. There is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits this Government from exercising fiscal discipline.

Just as importantly, the adoption of legislation—as opposed to the straitjacket approach of a constitutional amendment—would give us time to work with this particular process to make sure that it is effective and in the public interest, and to make the refinements which might be required.

To this list of reasons, I would like to add my own warning to my colleagues as to how such a constitutional amendment might be enforced, a subject which has received very little attention. If, in setting revenue and spending policies, this Congress becomes stalemated among ourselves or with the President, we may very well find the courts being forced to arbitrate national priorities.

Let us ask ourselves how the proposed amendment would be implemented, and whether we really want the courts to set levels of military spending, ordering tax increases, or second guessing the level of social security benefits.

Do we, frankly, believe that the courts have done such a great job, in adjudicating complex social and economic issues, that we would be willing to abrogate to them one of the Congress most fundamental responsibilities?

Certainly the framers of our Constitution—the handiwork of Madison, Franklin, Washington, and others among our greatest thinkers—would not have thought so. Nor did they ever intend for this great document to become a vehicle for solving transitory economic or social issues—particularly in cases where the Constitution itself does not present a barrier to placing into law the consensus of the American people.

Many of our current scholars believe that a truly effective balanced budget amendment would have to be longer than the original Constitution, and would probably defy understanding by average Americans. Pursuing such a course would certainly make a mockery of this great document, particularly since the same goal can be accomplished legislatively, and much sooner.

I believe the course we are proposing will work, it will work now, and it will avoid the dangers inherent in enshrining an untested budgeting process in the supreme law of the land.

What the American people are demanding is fiscal discipline.

The legislation we are proposing will provide that discipline, and it could become law tomorrow if we so choose.

Let us make that choice; let us prove to the American people that we can act responsible, and in a way that will not do serious harm to our Constitution.

I urge all of my colleagues to carefully study the approach we have advocated, and join us in finally acting to end deficit spending in the fastest and most effective way possible.●

ANIMAL RIGHTS DAY

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Gertrude Maxwell of Palm Beach, Fla., has requested that December 17 be declared "Animal Rights Day" by the Congress. I know of Mrs. Maxwell's humane concerns for the rights of all animals, and a congressional resolution would be especially timely considering recent events in south Florida. I know it requires 218 Members to cosponsor this legislation in order for the Subcommittee on Census and Population to give a favorable report. I have informed Mrs. Maxwell that I will be pleased to introduce an "Animal Rights Day" resolution when I have received the commitment of 217 other Members to cosponsor. Should any Member wish to cosponsor this resolution, please do not hesitate to contact my office.●

EASTERN EUROPE—THE ALPHA AND OMEGA OF THE WORLD STRUGGLE

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, this week marks the 24th anniversary of Captive Nations Week, an observance in which we join to pay tribute to the courageous people of the captive nations, and to reaffirm our strong support for their desire to regain their basic human rights.

Dr. Lev E. Dobriansky, Chairman of the National Captive Nations Committee and a professor at Georgetown University, recently addressed the annual World Anti-Community League's conference. I wish to insert this statement for the Members attention:

EASTERN EUROPE—THE ALPHA AND OMEGA OF THE WORLD STRUGGLE

Ladies and Gentlemen, participants in this significant NARWACL Conference, it is indeed an honor for me to address you on the subject of Eastern Europe, which I have long argued is historically the alpha and omega of the continuing world struggle. It has not been easy to maintain this fundamental ground with all sorts of media-concentrated attention on sporadic events ranging from Peiping to Lebanon to El Salvador and now the Falkland Islands. But what else is new as we reflect back on the fleeting events of the past three decades, involving Korea, Cuba, Vietnam and the Mideast? None of these, alone or in toto, could possibly overshadow the prime truth in our complex world that Eastern Europe remains, and will remain, the alpha and omega of the contemporary world struggle.

At the very outset, let me emphasize that in presenting this basic perspective it is not intended to minimize the significance and importance of these episodic and some also persistent developments. On the contrary, they have borne and bear proportionate meaning to the world struggle. Not to be misunderstood, my initial point is one of a scale of relative importance, viewed objectively. As to the alpha of the perspective, there can be no question as to the origin of the struggle, starting with the first imperialist conquests of Soviet Russia (the RSFSR) in the period of 1918–22, leading to the coerced formation of the USSR. Scholars, analysts, officials, commentators, and reporters differ in opinion on this. What is the nature of their differences? Very simply, some have knowledge and understanding of these facts, many just don't. Worse still, some of the latter are even unwilling to learn and choose to go their insular ways.

Eastern Europe as the omega of our present world struggle is really the more important problem. Those who don't know the alpha can be readily referred to competent research materials. Those who do know—or pretend to know—have in many instances failed to sharpen and refine their concepts in terms of alpha knowledge or have lost the moorings of their basic perspective as they become progressively immersed in eruptive developments far beyond the sphere of Eastern Europe. To cite just one mooring of this basic perspective as to why Eastern Europe is and will remain the omega of the world struggle: in essential power terms, the USSR alone has a $1.3 trillion GIP (Gross Imperial Product) that exceeds the combined GNPs (Gross National Products, e.g. Bulgaria) and GMPs (Gross Multinational Products, e.g. Yugoslavia) of all the other Red totalitarian states in Central Europe, Asia and Cuba. If the product mix is considered (sophisticated weapons, conventional arms prowess, etc.) the disparity widens; if, in addition, the so-called satellites in Central Europe (East Germany, Romania, etc.) are properly viewed as integral parts of Moscow's outer empire, the power base is magnified far beyond anything Mainland China in combination with the other totalitarian states can possibly equate.

THE POLISH CRISIS

In the light of this basic perspective the crisis that emerged in Poland last December takes on monumental proportions. In a real sense it represents the most serious crack in the Soviet Russian Empire since World War II. I spent considerable time on national radio networks endeavoring to put this chief point across. The Solidarity movement in Poland was unprecedented, workers spontaneously organizing themselves to repudiate the supposed vanguard leadership of the Communist Party and properly demanding free voice and participation in an efficient management of the economy. The movement was one for progressive freedom, and anyone who thinks that freedom can be compartmentalized in this world of ours—the economic as against the political, the political as against the cultural and religious and so forth—is really not of this world.

Other essential features of this crisis must be taken note of, for the crisis has not passed yet. One is that once again it reawakened Western interest and concern as to where on this planet the chief source of global trouble and danger exists. It also revealed once again our unpreparedness to capitalize on the crisis. It may well be if the promise of intensified sanctions is not met, that the '81–82 Polish crisis will be strung up on the line of its precedents—the Czecho-Slovak one of '68, the Hungarian of '56 and the East German one of '53. Another vitally important point, virtually untouched in this period of commentaries and analyses of the crisis, is the inevitable overspill-effect of the unique Solidarity movement. An overspill not only in other sectors of Moscow's outer empire, but even, more importantly, also in its inner empire, the USSR itself. Workers' strikes and attempts at free unionism have even preceded Poland's Solidarity movement in Estonia, Russia and Ukraine.

The story of this critical development has not been concluded. The slick, Russian-contrived self-invasion of Poland and Moscow's perennial play on time and diversion will not conclude it, unless the West succumbs once again into a "business-as-usual" behavior, which could be plainly characterized as simple appeasement once again. Myopic "pragmatism" is the typical word to cover this trail in areas of diplomacy. In this crack in the empire the dominant facts are that Solidarity is doomed to extinction, the Polish Church under Archbishop Jozef Glemp is striving to eliminate the many suppressions imposed by martial law, and resistance pockets exist throughout Poland. The Prime point is what kind of accounting will be stage by the democratic governments of the West when martial law is finally lifted. Will they acquiesce or intensify the sanctions pressed by our President? This is the dominant point for the period ahead.

NOT TO BE FORGOTTEN AFGHANISTAN

Not to be forgotten in this type of integrative thinking is the other continuing crisis in Afghanistan. To be sure, Afghanistan is not a part of Eastern Europe, but by virtue of its rape by Moscow it becomes functionally related and has to be integrally considered in terms of the current, total picture. One obvious, important aspect is the concurrency of two ongoing crises facing imperialist Moscow. The opportunity for capitalizing on this time factor should also be quite obvious.

The over two-year, stern resistance by the Afghan patriots deserves the highest tribute of the Free World. However, one continues to wonder how much practical assistance has been extended to them. The exploitive use by Moscow of non-Russian soldiers in its most recent, attempted conquest—Turkestani, Byelorussians, Ukrainians and others—has not been seized upon by us or the West in any radio mobilization and concentration on these troops. Nor is there any such mobilization in consort with Mideast friends and others on the divide-and-conquer technique applied by the Russians in Afghanistan—Pathans against Hazaras, Uzbeks against Tadzhiks, etc.—with the country tribalized and ethnocized. The old Russian technique employed 60 years ago in Turkestan, now with its five republics in Central Asia.

With these two ongoing crises, and a developing one within the USSR, can you visualize imaginatively what a concerted, nation-to-nation program could produce in behalf of peace, security and freedom? The developing crisis in the USSR engenders both the succession problem of the illegitimate Moscow government (the power plays of the Chernenkos and the Kirilenkos) with Brezhnev, following Kosygin and Suslov, bouncing back only too often, and mounting economic difficulties that the West, in concert, could judiciously intensify. Here we have a triangle of crises that must be interpreted iterrelatedly and plans worked out accordingly in a new nation-to-nation foreign policy, based on reciprocity, peace, security and freedom.

In this regard, another crisis of thought and perspective—a hopeful turning point—was provided last month is a most impressive ceremony at The White House proclaiming Afghanistan Day. In his remarks the President emphasized, "The Soviet Union must understand that the world will not forget—as it has not forgotten the peoples of the other captive nations from Eastern Europe to Southwest Asia—who have suffered from Soviet aggression." The necessary conceptual link-up—Afghanistan, Poland and all of the captive nations—is signified here. In his remarks on the occasion Vice President Bush elaborated this link-up further by saying, "But let's not forget the other nations that have suffered the same fate, both within and without the Soviet Union . . . countries from the Baltic States to the Ukraine to Uzbekistan."

THE CAPTIVE NATIONS FRAMEWORK

These two official statements are adequate to indicate that current thinking in our policy areas in finally on the captive nations thematic track. They suggest, too, the beginning of what could be accurately defined as a Nation-to-Nation foreign policy, which has been the essence of Public Law 86-90 (the Captive Nations Week Resolution) since its enactment in July 1959.

Now just a few, essential observations on this track of thinking. This law on our books is the only statutory commitment to the freedom of all the captive nations that one can find among all the parliaments of the world. The causal reasons for this disparate condition are many, but it would appear that much work lies ahead on the international scale. Interestingly enough, by documented record since World War II, no thematic idea has so consistently evoked concern and vituperation from Moscow, Peiping and the other totalitarian Red regimes than has the synthetic concept of captive nations as embodied in Public Law 86-90. The late Mikhail Suslov was especially acerbic in his reactions. If this is so, and indeed it is, the question then is why hasn't the central idea of the law been methodically implemented? It is far from being a single idea chiefly because as a fundamental framework of both reference and rational motivation it generates countless other ideas as it gains operational implementation.

Regarding Eastern Europe in particular, the simple answer to the question lies in the educational realm. Twenty years are just a speck of time to overcome myths, fables and perpetuated misconceptions concerning Russia, the USSR, its captive non-Russian nations. For example, even today you hear the misleading nomer "the Soviets", as though they are people or a nation or an ethnic group. In the USSR Soviets are councils of peasants and workers, rubber-stamp to be sure. Where did we derive this fudge term that serves only to misguide us in tailored policies to deal with such realities as Soviet Russian imperio-colonialism, the Soviet Russian Empire, the stark multinational vulnerabilities of this last remaining major empire on this planet? This is just one example; there are numerous others, such as merely "Soviet Empire", "Marxist imperialism", "Marxism-Leninism" and similar fables.

Briefly, then, the captive nations schema, based on historical, genetical analysis, starts at the beginning with the first Soviet Russian conquests of Armenia, Georgia, Ukraine and others before the very forced formation of the USSR and has neatly accommodated all subsequent conquests down to Afghanistan. The fact that parts of the totalitarian world, such as Peiping or Belgrade, may be temporarily at odds with Moscow—in no way alters the firm validity of the framework. The Polish self-invasion and Afghanistan's tragedy are additional confirmations in our period of this fundamental framework. If finally we are confidently on this track and its advancement of a Nation-to-Nation policy, then the time has come for a considerable conceptual sanitization, emphasizing the utter bankruptcy and myth of communism, the basic real force of Soviet Russian imperio-colonialism, and the captive non-Russian nations in Eastern Europe, extending to the Urals and even beyond.

POTENTIAL CAPTIVE NATIONS IN THE FREE WORLD

Today, El Salvador, Nicaragua; yesterday Ethiopia, Angola; beyond that, Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, and the links continue backward. There's nothing new in this sequence, the techniques are as old as traditional Russian imperialism with its Tartar legacy. The only superficial things new are their Leninist nomer, the facade of communism, the perverted use of Marxism, and different geographical stages with different actors. This may appear as a bold and exaggerated generalization, and admittedly would require at least a college semester to justify. But the fact is that in long breadth and in essential substance this is generally so. Transient phenomena lend themselves to complexity, but it has always been the task of objective scholarship to penetrate the complex to its simple, not simplistic, determinants. And in our contemporary period this is not at all difficult within the framework of the captive nations analysis as well as synthesis.

This point can be elaborated at length, but permit just the question, "How much power would the Soviet Russian base within the USSR have to pursue these 'influence', 'subversions' and 'aggressions' in the non-totalitarian world were it without its extensive non-Russian resources both within and without the USSR?" In other words, what bearing has this external capacity to appear as the only other "super-power" on the status of Eastern Europe—again extending to the Urals? A measure of reflection within the captive nations framework would reveal the predominant point, among many others, of a multinational, unjust exploitation of the resource both within unvested Russia and the captive non-Russian nations for these global adventures toward dominion on the part of Moscow.

I urge you and our fellow-citizens to reflect on this dimension. East Germans, Czechs, Ukrainians, Moslem Turkestanis and others are heavily involved in Moscow's cold war, paramilitary and other operations in the Free World, an enormous range of resource exploitation to realize the potential captive nations in the non-totalitarian world. In your readings or TV listening have you ever heard of this basic dimension of multinational exploitation of captive nations by an imperial regime that vacuously professes to be the "Marxist" defender of the exploited. Poor Karl, if he were alive today, he would be the strongest anti-communist in terms of the Soviet Russian version and perversion. Aside from paramilitary operational Leninism, which fundamentally rests on the old Russian imperialist divide-and-conquer principle—so well seen in Afghanistan today—the only philosophical legitmacy the imperial Moscow regime can rest on today is its perversion of Marxism. Without the captive nations in Eastern Europe—and in another non-imperialist sense including the unvested parts of the Russian nation within the USSR, which has been captive to the essentially barbarian institutions of Muscovy for nearly five centuries—the RSFSR, Soviet Russia itself, would be a second-rate power today.

TRADE, PIPELINES, NUCLEAR FREEZES, ETC.

To the tune of still more provocative applications of this captive nations approach, with particular power and practical emphasis on the East European base, let me suggest these following ideas. One is the matter of trade, including the debate on the Soviet Russian pipeline to Western Europe. Having followed this carefully for three decades, I cannot but agree with Dr. Anthony Sutton of the Hoover Institution in California that through our myopic trade practices we and our West European allies have been substantially feeding the growth of this Soviet Russian monster—in terms of know-how and technology—to threaten our collective security today. After really three decades of vacillating and vague trade policy toward the USSR and Eastern Europe in general, the present Polish crisis provides us with the first galvanizing opportunity to squeeze the economic screws on the deteriorating USSR economy. Calling a default on Polish obligations would have sparked repercussions on both sides. The opportunity is still at hand to pursue a poltrade policy, intermixing political with economic values in our exchanges with Eastern Europe. In short, again with perspective on the problem, our Western European allies have every reason to complain about our vacillating politico-economic policies over the past quarter century. The opportunity, in the wake of the Polish crisis, is to do what must be done now, not as we have feeding the Soviet Russian imperial economy with "aid" through "trade".

Finally, as though this were without Moscow's involvement, the antinuclear campaigns in Western Europe and now here are in process. The patent illogic of the "freeze idea" and "the no-first nuclear strike declaration" are resurgences of past expressions of nuclearitis. We heard this in the 50's, again in the 60's, and now again. This strain of thinking can lead us back to Bertrand Russell's campaign for "Better Red than dead". Patently, these are roads along non-confidence and ultimate surrender. Aside from the technicalities and megatonage, etc., this reminds us of the paralysis conveyed by St. Petersburg through the West European countries with its "steamroller of millions of soldiers".

My chief point here is simply why through all this media, official and private, and particularly by these frenzied groups, doubtlessly with Moscow's indirect nudges and assistance, none has pressed for a consensus on the nuclear arms race behind the Iron Curtain. This mounted pressure would certainly give validity to the restraint cause, for which I and any rational being is for, with realism. Plainly, the challenge here to the zero-earth and similar movements is what resources are you prepared to offer to extract this captive nations consensus on the nuclear race—or are these millions who have no voice in the issue?

As I have tried to show, take each transient issue that whips up popular emotions, if you don't know the background, you're devoid of evolutional perspective, you're plainly vulnerable to the incessant Cold War tactics of imperialist Moscow. No matter how one approaches it, in the last analysis Eastern Europe remains the alpha and omega of the world struggle.●

SOVIET JEWRY

HON. VIN WEBER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. WEBER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the 97th Congressional Class for Soviet Jewry, I believe the plight of the many people seeking to emigrate from the Soviet Union—the so-called "refuseniks"—must again be brought to the attention of Congress and the American people. Despite increased public awareness of continued visible oppression in Poland, Afghanistan, and other nations within the Soviet bloc, the "quieter" cases of thousands of Soviet citizens seeking emigration visas are no less deserving of our wholehearted encouragement and support.

According to the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, June figures for Soviets emigrating with Israeli visas have dropped from peak figures of 4,500 in June 1979 to a mere 182 this year—the sharpest decline in over a decade. This trend should figure prominently in any assessment of the Soviet Union's commitment, or lack thereof, to human rights, and should be placed high on the agenda of any future United States-Soviet negotiations.

As a demonstration of our concern for the Soviet Union's abysmal human rights performance, members of the 97th Congressional Class for Soviet Jewry have "adopted" various refusenik authorities. My family is Moisey Shtein, his wife Musia, and daughter Anna, who first applied for emigration visas to Israel over 3½ years ago. To date, they have been repeatedly refused, and are still waiting to join Musia's parents and sister in Israel.

Ironically, they had been granted the necessary permit only 2½ months after their initial application, and had sold all their belongings, resigned from their jobs, and sold their apartment in anticipation of the move to Israel. Shortly after that, however, a phone call from the OVIR told them that their permit had been revoked and that they would not be allowed to leave. To date, they still have not been given a legitimate explanation from authorities on any level as to the grounds for their refusal, being told only that it was related to Moisey's army service, completed over 13 years ago. That service happened to consist of working in horse stables for a rocket unit—rockets which he never saw.

Since we are marking the 24th anniversary of Captive Nations Week this week, I think this would be a fitting time to lend our support to Moisey Shtein, his family, and the thousands of others like them in the Soviet Union who are being continually denied their most basic of human rights. We must continue to let the Soviet Union know that this type of continued and unwarranted repression will not go unnoticed and will not be tolerated by the American people.●

LAW OF THE SEA TREATY

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I am entering into the RECORD for the benefit of my colleagues testimony by Mr. Doug Bandow, recently given before the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. Bandow is currently editor of Inquiry magazine, and a senior policy consultant at the CATO Institute. He formerly served as a Special Assistant to the President, and was a Deputy Representative to the 10th and 11th sessions of the LOS Conference.

STATEMENT OF DOUG BANDOW

The Reagan Administration has taken a courageous stand in voting against the proposed Law of the Sea Treaty, an action, I might add, which was supported by all of the leading members of the U.S. delegation in New York. This vote should now be followed by a firm rejection of the treaty, and the new world order for which it stands.

The Law of the Sea Conference is not an isolated negotiation, but rather, an integral part of an international network of conferences, commissions, and organizations, through which the developing nations have been waging economic and political war on the developed states, under the banner of the New International Economic Order (NIEO)—a euphemism for old-fashioned greed.

The Third World nations want to create new, and restructure old, international organizations, to give them control, allowing them to enforce the mandatory redistribution of the wealth of the West. Their greedy demands extend to money, preferential commercial terms, natural resources, expropriated property, and technology.

Unfortunately, they have been succeeding. The Second Conference on the Global Environment recently concluded, with a predictable call for the establishment of the NIEO. The so-called Moon Treaty is based on precisely the same fundamental premises as the Law of the Sea Treaty. Further, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), the World Health Organization, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO), and the Commission on Transnational Corporations all are continuing work on redistributive, burdensome, and perverse regulations and programs.

Related to the NIEO is the New International Information Order, which translates into restrictions on the world press. These efforts have been led by the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). If resources are the common heritage of mankind, it is only logical that information is as well.

What we are seeing is a wholesale attempt to institute totalitarian global management based on principles that have manifestly failed again and again at the national level. Signing the Law of the Sea Treaty is so important because it would legitimize these principles.

The treaty would, for the first time in history, establish an international institution under Third World domination to redistribute international wealth. Proprietary American technology would be subject to involuntary transfer, and terrorist groups would be eligible to share in revenues from an international body. And a byzantine, stifling, and discriminatory international regulatory system for natural resources would be created.

Perhaps the greatest tragedy of the treaty is not that it is so obviously and grossly against our interest, but that it is against the interest of the developing countries as well. Instead of freeing developing country peoples from the stultifying economic systems, corruption, and political oppression that make them poor, the treaty would create yet another counter-productive bureaucracy that would retard economic growth and make it harder for these peoples to escape poverty. This is an international disaster, not an achievement.●

PLAYING POLITICS WITH SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. JOHN J. DUNCAN

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, the future of the social security system has become a political football to many Members, rather than the serious matter it should be to my colleagues. All too often this important issue simply becomes a matter of political pandering. A recent editorial in the July 12, 1982, issue of the Knoxville News-Sentinel reviews one such incident of this nature.

The editorial follows:

POLITICAL PANDERING

Democratic leaders are fuming over a Republican party television commercial claiming credit to President Reagan for the 7.4 percent cost-of-living increase in Social Security benefits that went into effect July 1.

They have a point, since Reagan was in no way responsible for the extra money. It was an automatic increase provided by legislation enacted years ago.

Even so, the Democrats are a bit nervy in complaining about Republicans misleading the public in Social Security. Just last fall, the Democratic National Committee misused Social Security in sending out a highly misleading pitch for campaign contributions.

There was no mention of the Democratic committee on the outside of the envelope. It looked as if it came from the Government and contained this notation: "Important—Social Security Notice Enclosed."

Inside was a letter saying that Reagan and the Republican party are out to destroy the Social Security system and that the Democrats are desperately trying to save it. The letter was signed by Rep. Claude Pepper, chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging.

Interestingly, the congressman who lent his name to that deceptive piece of Democratic committee work is among party leaders screaming the loudest about the "big lie" of the current Republican TV commercials.

From this corner, it appears that the two parties are about tit for tat in spreading lies about Social Security. They ought to cease and desist.

Instead of bragging about how much they have done to keep Social Security benefits jacked up, they ought to be concentrating on how to make the system solvent.

Their pandering to the elderly for votes makes it harder to bring about the adjustments necessary to ensure that Social Security will be available to future generations.●

PROCLAMATIONS IN SUPPORT OF CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, in our observation of Captive Nations Week, it is important to let the world know that we, in the United States, have strong ideals of liberty and self-determination. These basic rights of human liberty is a dream that we want all peoples to be able to enjoy.

Therefore, I was especially pleased to note the great many proclamations that were issued by our Governors and mayors in observance of Captive Nations Week. I would like to share some of these with my colleagues.

The first is from the State of Connecticut, the Governor, the Honorable William A. O'Neill; which is followed by proclamations issued by the Honorable Tom Bradley, mayor of the city of Los Angeles, Calif.; the Honorable Randy Tyree, mayor of the city of Knoxville, Tenn.; and the Honorable Gordon Bricken, mayor of the city of Santa Ana, Calif.

OFFICIAL STATEMENT—STATE OF CONNECTICUT

The principles of justice and freedom which lie at the heart of our democracy are the primary source of our nation's continuing strength and vitality. The American people share with men and women the world over a deep and abiding respect for these cherished ideals.

Yet for countless people around the globe, the realization of these inspiring concepts remains only a bright hope. These are the citizens of the Captive Nations, whose governments restrict the social, economic, political, religious and educational liberties that are the birthright of every man and woman.

The dedicated members of the Connecticut Committee for Captive Nations are to be commended for their active concern for the plight of these people. This outstanding organization helps stimulate public awareness of the denial of basic human rights in many nations.

Each year, this excellent association sponsors a week-long observance in recognition of the spirit and perseverance of the people who long for liberation from oppressive rule.

I am therefore pleased to designate the week of July 18 through 24, 1982 as Captive Nations Week in Connecticut, in tribute to the courage and idealism of the freedom-loving citizens of Captive Nations and in support of the Committee's commitment to assisting in their quest for self-determination.

PROCLAMATION—CITY OF LOS ANGELES

Whereas, the imperialistic politics of Russian Communists have led, through direct and indirect aggression, to the subjugation and enslavement of the peoples of Poland, Hungary, Lithuania, Ukraine, Czecho-Slovakia, Latvia, Estonia, Byelorussia, Romania, East Germany, Bulgaria, Mainland China, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, North Korea, Albania, Idel-Ural, Servia, Croatia, Slovenia, Tibet, Cossakia, Turkestan, North Vietnam, Cuba, Cambodia, South Vietnam, Laos, Afghanistan, and others; and

Whereas, the desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in these conquered nations constitutes a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of Communist leaders to initiate a major war; and

Whereas, the freedom loving people of the captive nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom and human rights and to the people of the United States as the leaders in bringing about their freedom and independence; and

Whereas, the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week in July each year as Captive Nations Week and inviting the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate prayer, ceremonies and activities; expressing their sympathy with and support for the just aspirations of the Captive Nations:

Now, therefore, I, Tom Bradley, Mayor of the City of Los Angeles, do hereby proclaim the week of July 18-24, 1982 as "Captive Nations Week" in Los Angeles, and call upon our citizens to join with others in observing this week by offering prayers and dedicating their efforts for the peaceful liberation of oppressed and subjugated peoples all over the world.

PROCLAMATION—CITY OF KNOXVILLE, TENN.

By Executive order of His Honor the Mayor it is hereby proclaimed:

Whereas: The imperialistic politics of Russian Communists have led, through direct and indirect aggression, to the subjugation and enslavement of the peoples of Poland, Hungary, Lithuania, Ukraine, Czechoslovakia, Latvia, Estonia, Byelorussia, Romania, East Germany, Bulgaria, Mainland China, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, North Korea, Albania, Idel-Ural, Servia, Croatia, Slovenia, Tibet, Cossakia, Turkestan, North Vietnam, Cuba, Cambodia, South Vietnam, Laos, Afghanistan, and others; and

Whereas: The desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in these conquered nations constitutes a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of Communist leaders to initiate a major war; and

Whereas: The freedom loving peoples of the captive nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom and human rights and to the people of the United States as the leaders in bringing about their freedom and independence; and

Whereas: The Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week in July each year as Captive Nations Week and inviting the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate prayer, ceremonies and activities; expressing their sympathy with and support for the just aspirations of the captive nations,

Now, therefore, I, Randy Tyree, Mayor of the City of Knoxville, Tennessee, do hereby proclaim the week of July 18-24, 1982, to be: "Captive Nations Week" in our City, and call upon our citizens to join with others in observing this week by offering prayers and dedicating their efforts for the peaceful liberation of oppressed and subjugated peoples all over the world.

PROCLAMATION—CITY OF SANTA ANA

Whereas, The desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in the Captive Nations constitutes a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of Communist leaders to initiate further aggression; and

Whereas, The freedom-loving peoples of the Captive Nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom and human rights; and

Whereas, The Congress of the United States, by unanimous vote, passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week of July each year as Captive Nations Week:

Now, therefore, I, Gordon Bricken, Mayor of the City of Santa Ana, do hereby proclaim the week of July 12-18, 1982, to be: "Captive Nations Week" and urge all citizens of Santa Ana to join with me in observing this week through an appropriate expression of sympathy and support for the people of the Captive Nations.●

A LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Carol Leyon's sixth grade class in Cecilton, Md., recently wrote to President Reagan on subjects important to them. As you can imagine, some were interested in those things entertaining to sixth graders. In fact, one young man wished every child could have a video game, especially "Pac Man."

Others, though, stressed qualities such as love as important to them.

Miss Lynn Cullen of Earleville, Md., said,

I wish all the children in the world would have food, clothing and shelter, but I wish one thing more than all the others: to let every child in the world have lots of love and affection.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is remarkable that a person as young as Lynn would be so compassionate and concerned about her fellow man. Lynn will be celebrating her birthday this Saturday. I would like to wish her every happiness on her 12th birthday.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK ADDRESS

HON. F. JAMES SENSENBRENNER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21 1982

● Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I approach this 24th observance of Captive Nations Week with somewhat mixed emotions. It is indeed heartening that this body has again seen fit to reserve 1 week of its schedule to officially commemorate the valiant struggle of oppressed people throughout the world to gain their freedom. However, I am also saddened that this occasion is necessary at all. For in taking part in a 24th observance of Captive Nations Week, we must necessarily accept some responsibility for failing to achieve the goals which we expressed in the speeches of our 23 previous opportunities.

It is time for us to realize that we cannot be content with accumulating a great volume of prose professing adherence to the basic beliefs of freedom and liberty upon which our Nation was founded. Rather, we must commit ourselves and dedicate our resources to actively secure and promote the ideals which made this country a great protector of basic human freedoms.

If anyone doubts that life without liberty cannot be tolerated, let them draw their conclusions from the newspaper headlines of this past year. There the reader would discover accounts of Afghan rebels laying down their lives in a refusal to be downtrodden by Soviet troops despite seemingly insurmountable odds. Also evident would be reports of numerous Solidarity members who continue their opposition to Communist domination underground. I seriously doubt that any American citizen does not sympathize with the trials of those people currently suffering under a repressive regime whether it be anywhere from Latvia to South Vietnam. However, we should also realize that these people cannot continue the struggle alone, and that we should assist them whenever we are able. Only then can we be satisfied that the ideals of our Founding Fathers have been preserved not only in this Nation, but also throughout the world.

On this occasion, let us focus our attention on all the people of the globe who have not let their desire for freedom be choked by the grip of their oppressors. Let us salute the millions who have kept the dream of liberty alive not only for themselves, but also for their children, lest they forget that the freedom of which they now only dream was once theirs to hold.

It is fitting that we renew our commitment to the captive nations only a few weeks after we celebrated the anniversary of our own independence. Let us hope that in the near future, the people who continue their persistent efforts to gain the freedoms currently denied them by their captors will be able to share the joy and pride which we experience when each firework explodes.

The plight of these oppressed nations does not lie only with the people of these captive countries, but also with the American people who share their dreams and who strive to render next year's commemoration of Captive Nations Week obsolete. Let us not be satisfied with issuing a distant statement expressing our eventual goals. Let us instead join the people of the world in the achievement of those goals.●

WEATHERIZATION; A PRIORITY PROGRAM

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, for the past decade our country has faced a severe energy crisis. Not only has the lack of energy resources caused physical hardships, but escalating costs as well. Based on a recent nationwide survey conducted by the National Council of Senior Citizens, the average U.S. household spends about 5 to 6 percent of its income on energy costs. The average low-income household—below 125 percent of poverty line—spends an average 19 percent of its annual income on energy.

The elderly are most devastated by rising energy costs. One out of every four poor elderly households spends more than 40 percent of its income on energy in the winter. Further, about 17 percent of the elderly heat with fuel oil, as opposed to 60 percent heating with natural gas. Well over 80 percent of the elderly in my district heat with fuel oil. Needless to say, energy costs for fuel oil consumers are much higher on the average than for natural gas customers. Although the problem still exists, Americans have reduced consumption dramatically. This has been achieved partially through weatherization programs established by the Federal and State governments.

Weatherization has proven to be one of the most cost-effective investments ever undertaken by the Federal Government on behalf of the American people. The statistics in New England tell the story. Since the program's inception, 63,100 homes in the New England region have been weatherized. This has resulted in an annual savings to these households of $14.7 million.

My own State of Rhode Island is one of those that has borne the brunt of rising energy prices over the last decade. The average heating bill for the coldest month in Rhode Island is $300 and the average check to a senior citizen living independently is $280. We are proud of our weatherization program in Rhode Island, which has so far weatherized 7,700 homes in our State. This program allows needy individuals to obtain much needed insulation and minor repair to their homes. Thirty-seven percent of the households served by the Rhode Island program have been occupied by senior citizens, and 15 percent by handicapped individuals. These needy individuals are most appreciative of our efforts to help them save energy and fuel dollars. This is what some Rhode Islanders have to say:

From Riverside:

I could never keep this home without the help—I am sure I will be much warmer.

From East Providence:

I was extremely impressed with the efficient way in which the work was carried out. I would like to take this time to compliment the program, and hope that programs such as this will continue.

If there are any doubts about the worthiness of the program, I think this testimony will put them to rest.

The program is administered and operated at the grassroots level, providing useful employment and hands-on experience in conservation. When the State had to economize after last year's cuts in the weatherization program, the State recruited several crews from among the inmates at the Adult Correctional Institution. After a 4-week classroom training and orientation, the inmates were allowed to put their education into practical use in the community.

In 1980, 20,000 people were employed through the CETA weatherization program. If a small proportion of expected Federal employment funds are combined with existing Department of Energy weatherization funds, tens of thousands of jobs will be created in fiscal year 1983 alone.

Considering the long-term benefit of weatherization and the state of the economy, I feel it is necessary to receive maximum return on investment. By continuing our support for programs such as weatherization, we can achieve that goal. I intend to work with other Members of Congress who believe in the weatherization program. I feel confident that we will succeed.●

GAO FINDINGS ON CETA

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a recent report by the U.S. General Accounting Office (GAO) titled: "CETA Programs for Disadvantaged Adults: What Do We Know About Their Enrollees, Services, and Effectiveness? (IPE-82-2)" In this report GAO provides a technical review of program administrative data and evaluative studies on adult-oriented employment and training services to assess the performance of CETA. With new legislation under consideration to replace CETA, and unemployment a severe and persistent problem for both unskilled economically disadvantaged job seekers and newly displaced workers, it is worthwhile to review the performance of CETA for what it can tell us about improving future programs.

On the positive side, GAO reports that CETA has been successfully targeted to serve the disadvantaged. CETA's enrollees generally were disadvantaged in terms of low education levels, low income, and little employment history or stability. For early participants in CETA, the available information is encouraging. Their previous decline in earnings and employment reversed, and their circumstances continued to improve for the next 2 years—the longest period for which data are available. Also, fewer households reported receiving AFDC or food stamp benefits after CETA than before it.

On average, direct earnings gains from CETA were moderate ($300–$400 per person the first year after the program), but GAO notes that looking a single year after the program is not sufficient to address whether people have been put on better earnings paths. Other analyses suggest that many women and low earners experienced substantial improvements in earnings.

Through contrasting the job placement rates reported for CETA by the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL) with those from a survey of CETA enrollees, GAO reports that DOL has probably underestimated the rate at which CETA participants found jobs. In terms of monitoring the performance of employment and training programs, however, GAO cautions that job placement rates are not by themselves a satisfactory nor sufficient standard. By themselves, these rates fail to inform us about the quality of a job or whether the individual is likely to retain it. Lastly, in contrast to the generally encouraging findings, GAO stresses the need for better public-private coordination in order to improve the likelihood that people move into the private sector where most new jobs are created.

The GAO report provides a realistic description of the complexity of a service system that has sought to foster flexibility in matching local resources with widely varying needs of unskilled and cyclically unemployed persons. The Job Training Partnership Act, H.R. 5320, a bill soon to come before you, incorporates the targeting and local flexibility aspects of CETA that were successful in the past, while requiring more thorough performance monitoring procedures and increased private sector involvement. This bill proposes establishing a community public-private training and employment system that avoids service disruption, capitalizes on existing local expertise, and fosters improvement in areas where such are needed.●

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to my colleagues' attention the following article which appeared in the July 22 edition of the Philadelphia Inquirer describing the work of my friend, Prof. Burt Weiss of Drexel University.

THE ANT MAN

(By Dick Pothier)

Drexel University researcher Burton Weiss switched on a tape recorder in his laboratory yesterday. A series of strange, squeaky, almost alien sounds—the sounds of ants "talking"—came from a loudspeaker.

The ants may have been calling for help, or telling other ants to get out of their way, or warning other ants of an intruder, or communicating as-yet-unknown messages.

Weiss, an associate professor of psychology at Drexel, isn't sure yet what the ants are saying. But he means to find out.

It is tempting to say that Weiss, who has turned part of his cramped office into a huge ant colony, is trying to communicate with ants. And in a sense that is true, although Weiss has never expected to carry on an intelligent conversation with an ant.

What he would like to learn, however, is how to decode and then reproduce the "alarm" or "warning" sounds his ants make, because then man might be able to stop the species of ant he is studying from devouring billions of dollars worth of crops a year in tropical areas of the Americas and parts of the United States.

Weiss has built the world's largest known laboratory colony of an ant species called Attine ants. Several million Attines march tirelessly through the corridors and tunnels of a 145-chamber ant "city" that Weiss carefully maintains.

Attine ants, Weiss explained, have several pecularities that make them interesting subjects for study.

For one thing, they make audible sounds by rubbing together a "rasp and file" mechanism on their abdomens. Weiss has recorded those sounds and played them back at slow speed in an attempt to learn what they are saying to other ants. So far, he hasn't cracked their code, except to learn that one sound is a cry for help to other ants.

The second reason he studies Attine ants is that they can strip a large farm field of green leaves or sprouts in just one day—and they are probably doing so today somewhere in Central or South America.

"They control their environment," Weiss said. "No farmer in South and Central America, and in some portions of the American south, can grow any product unless the Attines let it grow. They are the dominant species in many parts of Central and South America.

"In fact, the reason that South America is known for coffee and bananas is that these ants leave those crops alone. But if you try to grow tomatoes or corn or most other crops in areas where the Attines live, they'll simply strip acres of fresh plants as soon as they grow."

It might eventually be possible, he said, to place sound-producing units around crops and broadcast the Attine sounds for alarm, or "keep away."

Weiss said the Attines do not eat the green leaves they strip so voraciously. Instead, they use the plants to do their own "farming."

The half-inch-long worker ants cut the plants up with their sharp mandibles, or jaws, and carry them into their colonies to use as the medium on which to grow their real food—small, mushroom-like fungus growths.

In interconnected plastic boxes in Weiss's lab, his ants are growing dozens of "fungus gardens" for food. Weiss places a handful of leaves in the colony each day, and the worker ants continually cut up and carry small pieces into the heart of the colony, the fungus gardens.

"The thought of ants farming their own food is fascinating—unless you're a farmer in South or Central America," Weiss said.

Weiss obtained the original "starter ants" for his ant colony during a trip to Panama.

In addition to researching ant conversations, Weiss is taking part in a Drexel research project that recently discovered that the Attines have no cholesterol in their body—a "remarkable" finding, he said, that could cause the revision of several basic biological theories about life on earth.

"Up to now, it's been believed that every animal on Earth required at least some cholesterol in its nervous system. The belief has simply been that no animal can live without the substance, which is necessary to produce hormones."

The discovery that Attine ants have no cholesterol, Weiss said, may not have any practical significance. "But it's impressive to learn that here, for the first time, is an animal that exists without cholesterol."

Attine ants, Weiss said, "are just ferocious. The soldier ants can chew through shoe leather, and several times I've been pinched enough to draw blood."

Even army ants and fire ants steer clear of the Attines, whose "attack" sounds can bring millions of fierce soldier Attines to the scene of any intrusion into their underground colonies, Weiss said.

The Attines organize their lives in still-mysterious ways, Weiss said. Some of them forage for food, others cut it up and carry it to fungus gardens, and still others dispose of waste or dead ants in "refuse chambers."

"And they decide what goes where, not me. A while back I tried to start a new fungus garden for them in a new chamber. I put some of their food in the chamber. But they just came and carried it away—they didn't want one there, and they're in charge, not me."

PLIGHT OF GREGORY GEISHIS

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I wish to update my colleagues on the plight of Gregory Geishis, a young Soviet Jew who is still awaiting an exit visa for emigration to Israel.

In October 1978, Mr. Geishis, then an honor student at the Leningrad Institute of Electrical Communications, applied for an exit visa to Israel. Five months later, he was notified that his application had been denied. The reason given for the denial was Gregory's failure to apply with his parents. Shortly thereafter, Gregory was expelled from school and denounced as a traitor. Gregory then reapplied for an exit visa with his family. It, too, was denied, this time because Gregory's mother is a communications engineer. The Soviets claimed that they could not allow a member of so "sensitive" a profession to leave the country.

Gregory Geishis applied five more times over the next 13 months for an exit visa. During this period, he and his family were continually harassed by the KGB and the Soviet police. His final rejection came just before the opening of the 1982 Olympic games. A few days later, Gregory Geishis was drafted by the Red army.

The U.S.S.R. denies emigration visas to anyone who has had contact with "state secrets," and this would include even perfunctory military service. Gregory declined induction in the sure knowledge that serving in the military would forever preclude his emigration. Soviet authorities summoned him to a police station for a hearing. Upon his arrival at the station, Gregory was arrested. On August 8, 1980, Gregory Geishis was sentenced to 2 years in a Soviet labor camp. This past July 14, he was released from prison, but Gregory Geishis is, by no means, free.

The plight of Gregory Geishis is the plight of thousands of Soviet Jews. In June 1982, only 182 Soviet Jews were allowed to emigrate. That is the lowest monthly figure since the late 1960's, and it represents a 96-percent drop from June of 1979.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the 77 of my colleagues who joined me in expressing our concern for Gregory's situation in a letter to Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin, and I commend my many colleagues for their continued efforts on behalf of Soviet Jews.

Mr. Speaker, one of the portraits in this gallery is of the Babylonian leader Hammurabi, who one declared, "the strong shall not oppress the weak." Let us continue to endeavor to secure freedom from this oppression by the strong of Gregory Geishis.●

OPM BALKED IN ATTACK ON JOB SENIORITY RULE

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, as the ranking minority member of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I have a longstanding interest in the overall effectiveness of the Federal personnel system.

In efforts to protect the integrity of the civil service retirement system and in the implementation of civil service reform, I have had the opportunity to work closely with my colleagues from the northern Virginia area, Hon. STAN PARRIS and Hon. FRANK WOLF, who have both consistently demonstrated dedication and devotion to the well-being of their large Federal employee constituency. FRANK and STAN were towers of strength in preserving and extending the innovative Federal personnel program which provides for a flexible workweek for Federal employees.

Therefore, I was pleased to see the following article in the July 26 Federal Times, which accurately describes the key role that they played in blunting and assaulting the job seniority rule:

OPM BALKED IN ATTACK ON JOB SENIORITY RULE

(By Bill Andronicos)

Pressure from two Republican lawmakers has prompted the Reagan administration to temporarily halt a plan that would sharply limit current practices of retaining Federal employees on a seniority basis.

Office of Personnel Management chief Donald J. Devine apparently decided not to go through with the plan after conferring with Virginia Representatives Stan Parris and Frank Wolf.

After those meetings, OPM suddenly scrapped a news release which was to have announced details of the program.

The OPM proposal originally was to have been made in October, but a few weeks ago there were indications that it would be announced in late July or early August.

In a letter to Devine, Wolf charged that the administration's plan would devastate employee morale and could have "serious repercussions for the governing of our country."

The proposal called generally for emphasizing performance rather than seniority in determining which employees would go and which would stay during reductions-in-force (RIFs).

Despite OPM's claims that such a plan would enhance retention of women and minorities during job reductions, critics cast a skeptical eye on the government's sincerity.

Opponents described the proposal as a political ploy that would enable the administration to replace large numbers of career professionals by eliminating certain jobs, reorganizing agencies and departments and replacing abolished jobs with patronage jobs.

"In addition to the unfairness to the more experienced employees, this plan could jeopardize the running of our government by destroying the continuity and expertise that is at the heart of operations, such as defense, social security, health inspection and others." Wolf said.

The American Federation of Government Employees charged that the proposed regulations would mark a return to the spoils system. AFGE, which represents more than 700,000 federal workers, said the plan would "rip apart the last shred of employee security in the federal sector."

The OPM news release describing the plan was dated June 15 but was never distributed.

A copy obtained by Federal Times shows that the plan also called for major changes in the "bumping" and "retreat" procedures that make it possible for workers slated for a RIF to take the jobs of other employees who would not otherwise be affected.

The plan would have made it virtually impossible for highly-paid professionals to move into clerical and secretarial jobs while retaining earnings ranging from $40,000 to $50,000.

This was one of the points Devine emphasized in the OPM release. "The movement of higher-graded professionals into clerical or even menial jobs, while retaining their professional pay is something the taxpayer just won't tolerate any longer," he said.

The proposed rules would have prohibited employees from dropping more than one grade during a RIF.

In another statement, Devine contended that the proposal would have been beneficial to women and minorities.

Saying that over the past year, the government had confirmed some of its worst fears about the present RIF rules, the OPM director noted that many of these regulations date back to World War II.

"By shifting the emphasis on job performance, we'll be making sure that women and minorities in the federal work force who've proven themselves to be good employees get to keep their jobs instead of being booted out the door because they haven't been around long enough," Devine continued.

He added that the people can no longer tolerate a situation in which some of the government's best and most dedicated employees lose their jobs while others keep them simply because they have been employed longer by the government.

"For the first time, we're going to make sure that performance on the job gets a higher priority than seniority when deciding who is fired in a RIF," Devine said.

He also touched on the importance of the proposal on employee morale, which he said is seriously affected by the present "bump" and "retreat" provisions that bring about considerable disruption in work operations when employees take the jobs of workers who would not have originally been affected by an agency's RIF orders.

"Under the present rules, we displace three or four employees for every one we must separate," Devine said. "This can have a devastating effect on morale, especially since our very best employees stand an equal chance of being hit with the very worst."

In addition, Devine had charged that the current RIF rules have a "ruinous" effect on governmental efficiency, adding that they produce results "which outrage every taxpayer."●

MAN IS BORN FREE

SPEECH OF

HON. TOM HARKIN

OF IOWA

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, "Man is born free, yet he is everywhere in chains." Centuries after he wrote them, Rousseau's words ring true. This week we commemorate the promise of freedom for over 1 billion people in nations held captive by the Soviet Union. Americans are complacent about our own civil liberites and political rights. We should not forget that tyranny and oppression have been the rule of governments throughout history and not the exception. This is true today, and most countries are still ruled by a few for the few.

The United States of America is a beacon of hope for people whose freedon is yet a dream. For our democracy to continue and to thrive, we need free thought and free speech, both at home and abroad. During Captive Nations Week we remember the oppressed, and by so doing help preserve our own liberites and advance the cause of those without similar blessings. Unless we are true to our political tradition, the American experiment will falter. Unless we advocate human rights for all people in all lands, we may lose our own. May we never stumble, for as Thomas Paine wrote,

Those who expect to reap the blessings of freedom must undergo the fatigue of supporting it.

In the captive nations, freedom is a dream. It is a dream that all the forces of darkness cannot dispel. The light may be dim for some, but with efforts such as ours it will never be extinguished. To aspire for liberty requires courage in adversity and perseverance amidst acquiescence. I am inspired by the perseverance of Solidarity in Poland, whose members do not relent in their struggle. I am fired by the courage of Afghans, who continue to fight a hostile occupation force. I struggle along with Lithuanians, Latvians, and Estonians who demand greater cultural autonomy.

On a smaller scale, I have adopted a "refusenik" in the captive nation of Georgia. Victor Popovsky and his family have tried, since 1974, to assert a basic right of all people, the right to emigrate and live in a land of their own choosing. I have petitioned the Soviet Ambassador and the Kremlin to set this family free. In their fight, large or small, these people will not yield. America holds out the promise of freedom, and they hold up the example of the valor and fortitude required to obtain what we already have.

Our commitment to the negotiating process does not translate into acceptance of Soviet oppression of their own minorities or the citizens of the captive nations. My attention to repression in other parts of the world will never lessen my fervent opposition to the denial of basic human rights in any land.

This is not the place to dwell on captive nations outside the Soviet bloc. But I would be remiss not to mention at least one, East Timor. This country was formerly part of the Portuguese empire. In 1975, after a short civil war, the people of East Timor declared themselves independent. Their independence was tragically brief.

On December 7, 1975—our own day of infamy in 1941—the Indonesians invaded this little country; 80 percent of the weaponry came from the United States. In the Fall of 1977, the Indonesians almost ran out of bullets. The United States, joined by England, West Germany, and France, bailed them out. By the end of 1978, the Indonesian Army had all but destroyed the armed independence movement. There was widespread famine in 1979 and 1980. There is concern again today that famine will repeat itself.

Just as the Estonians, the Latvians, and the Lithuanians, the people of East Timor hunger for independence. They too, have been subdued by overwhelming force. But the spirit of resistance continues and one day in the future, we can hope, that they will be given a chance for genuine self-determination.●

FEDERAL TAX CUT IS OFFSET BY STATE AND LOCAL TAX INCREASES

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, the July 1 cut of 10 percent in Federal income taxes is unlikely to put much money into the pockets of consumers in my own State of Ohio because Federal tax decreases are matched—almost to the dollar in some cases—by State and local tax increases.

This is a topic that I discussed in my most recent weekly newspaper column. It follows:

WASHINGTON REPORT

Nearly all economists agree that tax cuts stimulate activity in the national economy and can help lift the nation out of a recession.

Everyone knows that Ohio is in the depths of a recession. We could certainly use help getting out of it.

But the July 1 cut of 10 percent in federal income taxes is unlikely to put much money into the pockets of Ohio consumers because federal tax decreases are matched by state and local tax increases.

The federal government is consciously cutting aid to the states and localities while increasing their responsibilities. Result: higher state and local taxes.

According to a recent chart in the Cleveland Plain Dealer, the new 50 percent surcharge in the Ohio state income tax will offset much of the reduction in the federal income tax.

For example, a family of four earning $15,000 per year should have seen its weekly payroll deduction for federal income tax go down on July 1 from $27.80 to $26.30—a reduction of $1.50 per week.

Also on July 1, due to the new 50 percent surcharge adopted by the Ohio legislature, the same family would have seen its weekly payroll deduction for the Ohio state income tax go up from $3 to $4.50—an increase of $1.50 per week.

Thus, the family would enjoy no net gain. It would pay $1.50 less per week to the federal government and $1.50 more to the state government.

The $25,000 per year family of four does a little better. Its federal income taxes should have gone down by $6.60 per week. Its state income tax weekly deduction should have risen $4.17. The net gain would be $2.43 per week.

But even that gain is questionable because the Ohio legislature raised the sales tax from 4 cents to 5 cents—a 25 percent increase—last fall. For a $25,000 a year family, that works out to $1.04 per week in extra tax burden.

Further, the legislature broadened the base of the State sales tax to apply, for example, to the labor portion of house repair bills and to cigarets. That's 14 cents a week for the pack-a-day smoker.

The state gasoline tax just went up too on March 1. That's about 28 cents per week for an average family.

Finally, I should mention local property taxes. Because the state government has been strapped for money, it cut state aid to local schools substantially. Voters have been deluged with requests for property tax increases for schools, mental health programs, drug enforcement groups, law enforcement, county health departments, programs for the mentally retarded, township governments, city governments, etc.

For every one new mill of property tax approved by the voters, the owner of a $50,000 house pays 30 cents per week of additional taxes. A new seven-mill school levy would cost $2.10 per week.

My point is this. What we are seeing is a very substantial shift of tax burden from the federal level to the state and local levels.

Some people may derive special pleasure from paying less federal income tax even though the savings is offset by higher state and local taxes. But the pocketbook of the average taxpayer isn't likely to know the difference.●

CONTRACTING OUT FOR SERVICES

HON. DANIEL B. CRANE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 22, 1982

● Mr. DANIEL B. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to make a few observations about the current debate on the A-76 contracting out provisions of the Defense Department authorization bill. In this regard there are two points I would like to make.

First, if it is shown that contracting out will save the taxpayers money, small businesses will benefit when work is actually contracted out. We are all pointedly aware of the economic condition of small business at this time.

Second, I believe it would be unwise to deny the Defense Department the flexibility to contract out if the need is there, for we can never predict what our national security needs will be at any future date.

For these two reasons I would urge my colleagues to oppose any limitations on contracting out in conjunction with the current DOD authorization bill.

To illustrate how the A-76 procedure works in practice, I would like to share with my colleagues the following article by Edwin Harper in Government Executive magazine:

CONTRACTING OUT FOR SERVICES—WHY THE WHITE HOUSE MEANS BUSINESS ON THE A-76 BUSINESS

(By Edwin Harper)

This Administration means business about A-76.

Let's start by talking for a minute about what A-76 is. It is a process to insure that the American taxpayer is getting his money's worth. Its purpose is to make sure that this question gets asked: "Is the taxpayer getting his money's worth if Government Employees perform this task or if the task is performed by the private sector?"

Intuitively, asking this question is noncontroversial. But if it is so noncontroversial why are we here today, 26 years after A-76 was originally issued, discussing "implementing new policies"?

I really do not know why, but let me advance a few hypotheses:

Over the years some 20 agencies have said, "I'm an exception, and I don't want to be bogged down in any more red tape—Let's just get the job done and we will worry about A-76 some other time."

Others might argue, "Everthing I do is Government Business and therefore should be done by Government Employees who are already on board."

Finally, some managers are afraid to implement A-76 because they think "it will generate fears among their employees that they might be put out of a job."

Let me cover the last point first, because it is the most fundamental and pervasive concern that you will find with respect to A-76.

A couple of years ago an A-76 cost study was done which showed there would be savings to the taxpayer to turn the guard service at a federal facility over to a private contractor. The Congressional Delegation representing the area in which the facility was located was very upset about federal employees in their district losing jobs. Then it was pointed out that none of these people would necessarily lose their jobs because one of the requirements of A-76 is that all federal employes in a function which is contracted out—have first call on those jobs—for which they are qualified—with the contractor.

In fact, we have not done a good enough job over the years of explaining how fair A-76 actually is to a federal employee working in an area which might be contracted out.

OMB Circular A-76 offers considerable protection for affected Government employees. For instance, the circular requires that existing in-house activities will not be converted to contract unless it will result in a savings of at least 10 percent in estimated Government personnel-related costs. This biases the cost comparison in favor of continuing the activity in-house and prevents "flip-flop" of performance mode by providing for conversions only when savings are significant.

The circular also requires that agencies reorganize Government operations for the most efficient performance before undergoing cost studies. This will ensure the function is being performed in the most efficient and effective manner practicable, and make it more competitive with contractor operations.

The circular also recognizes personnel regulations, which assure any displaced employees of:

Priority consideration for placement in other Government positions, with Government paid training; and Grade retention for two years and continuing pay retention when assigned to a lower grade.

Service Contract Employees employed by the contractor must be paid at least the wages and fringe benefits prevailing for similar work in the locality, as determined by the Department of Labor.

This prevents the contractor from "undercutting" Federal pay scales. The contractor must also give employment preference to disadvantaged persons and veterans, comparable to requirements or federal employment.

The formal cost comparison procedure, which specifies how the costs of an in-house operation and contract operation are developed, ensures equity and fairness. Finally, the appeals procedure required by the circular provides an opportunity for any affected party to challenge improper decisions.

The bottom line is that employees who are "riffed" will have future employment with the contractor selected to perform the service.

Let's go back to one of the other arguments—it's all Government business, so it should all be done by Government employees. I feel that collecting income taxes is clearly Government business and we should not contract it out. However, the commercial and industrial services which support the collection of those taxes should be contracted out if an A-76 cost comparison shows that it is more economical to do so. There is nothing inherently governmental about sweeping the floors in an IRS office.

Finally, let's get back to the excuse that "A-76 stands in the way of getting the job done, so let's ignore it." That kind of rationale may sell when the Government is flush with money, but it won't sell when we must make herculean afforts to keep the budget deficit within reasonable bounds. Today, part of getting the job done must be to do the job with the minimum resources necessary. A-76 is a help—not a hindrance—in getting the job done.

That is not to say that there are not significant problems with A-76 which we need to eliminate. But what A-76 does is bring the benefits of competition to the acquisition of commercial and industrial services required by Government.

VALUE OF COMPETITION

A dictionary definition of "competition" (Webster's Seventh Collegiate Dictionary) shows that competition involves the "efforts to two or more parties to secure the business of a third party by the offer of the most favorable terms.

Competition is a very important concept, because it is the basic allocative mechanism in our economy. Competition should mean that the customer gets the best product at the lowest price. It seems axiomatic that the more competitors there are that a customer has to choose from, the more likely it is that the customer will get the best buy.

In this context we are talking about the Federal Government deciding whether or not to provide goods and services to itself or to allow others to compete to provide those goods and services. In other words, one of the major competitors is also the customer and that competitor/customer has, for practical purposes, unlimited resources and powers to influence the buying decisions.

OMB's Circular No. A-76 endeavors to bring meaning back to the word competition where it involves the Government. A-76 states the general policy of reliance on competitive private enterprise for commercial or industrial products and services required by the Government. This policy is based on the premise that, in this democratic free enterprise system, the Government should not compete with its citizens, and that the private enterprise system is the primary source of national economic strength.

THREE FUNDAMENTAL FEATURES

The Government's current policy of reliance on the private sector is built on three fundamental features of A-76:

First, it recognizes that efficiency in Government operations is one of the Administration's primary obligations to the American taxpayer;

Second, it requires that cost analysis be conducted to determine if an existing in-house activity should be converted to contract operation; and Third, it requires that the cost analysis be comprehensive, consistent and equitable.

Aggressive implementation of A-76 will ensure economical performance of Government Operations.

This emphasis on contracting-out is not a mindless philosophic commitment to "free enterprise" but it represents an acknowledgment of our fiduciary responsibility to the American taxpayer to make the most efficient possible use of his tax dollar for the purposes authorized by the Congress.

A-76 PAYS OFF

Competition for Government business fosters efficiency and economy in the Federal Government. The Defense Department's experience in the last three years of vigorously implementing A-76 proves the case. A total of 440 cost studies were conducted by the three military services. Sixty percent—or 264—of these studies involving 11,000 full-time jobs resulted in a decision to convert to private sector contractors. The savings are projected to be $90 million annually.

Further, a recent GAO report on GSA's cleaning costs found that their in-house costs are needlessly higher than the private sector. The GAO estimated that in four regions studied, GSA could have saved approximately $16 million during 1980 had it contracted for cleaning being done by its own custodians.

We estimate that the Government currently operates thousands of commercial or industrial activities subject to A-76 cost studies with an annual operating cost of about $6 million and with about a $3 billion capital investment. The vast majority of these activities has never been subject to competition. If these activities were subject to the cost comparison studies required by A-76, we estimate that about 154,000 personnel spaces could be converted to contract operations with a 5-year cumulative savings between fiscal year 1982 and 1987 in excess of $5 billion. These savings will continue to accrue thereafter.

The potential for such savings has been recognized for a long time—since the first Bureau of the Budget bulletin on contracting-out was issued in 1955.

REAGAN SUPPORTS A-76

President Reagan has made the implementation of OMB Circular A-76 an integral part of his economic recovery program, as evidenced by the following actions:

The President affirmed his support of this program last March in his 1982 Budget Message which stated "It is the general policy of the administration to rely, whenever possible, on the competitive private sector . . . OFPP is, therefore, working with agencies to . . . increase agency compliance with OMB Circular No. A-76."

A memorandum, a bulletin and a series of letters were sent to all Executive Agencies and Departments in April 1981 reaffirming the policy and requiring it be vigorously implemented.

The OMB Bulletin to all executive agencies and departments required them to submit detailed information on their implementation of the program and its impact on their future budget submissions. We are analyzing these reports now, and it appears the savings from implementation of A-76 will be even greater than originally estimated.

In June 1981 Circular No. A-11, instructions for preparing the President's budget, was revised to further strengthen linkages between budget submissions and agencies' overall implementation of A-76.

A-76 IMPROVEMENTS

We recognize that the private sector (and some in the public sector) may view implementation of the policy as it is presently written, as cumbersome and perhaps inefficient, because of the requisite cost comparisons.

Because we have recently found some inequities and cumbersome procedures in cost studies, the Office of Management and Budget is undertaking an effort to re-examine the current cost comparison methodology to streamline it and make it as efficient as possible.

Accordingly, proposed changes to the circular were announced by David Stockman at a Joint Economic Committee hearing on October 28, 1981. At that hearing, short-range as well as long-range efforts to streamline the process were announced.

Implementation of Transmittal Memorandum No. 6, which was issued Jan. 26, 1982 accomplished the short-range changes set forth in the October 28, 1981, testimony; i.e., clarify existing policy and streamline and simplify the cost comparison procedures. No policy changes are contained in the transmittal memorandum.

An interagency task group from the major agencies met during the period February through April 1982 to streamline and simplify the cost comparison handbook and to propose numerous changes to the circular which the administration is presently reviewing. We expect to adopt many of the task group's recommended changes and will fold them into a draft revision which will be published in the Federal Register for a 60-day public comment period. Our target date for release of this draft is July 1, 1982 after careful consideration of all the public comments received on the draft revision.

In summary, in no real sense is the Government a competitor—it is an arbitrator of economic decision when it "competes" with private enterprise; thus, we must have an A-70 process to fairly compare Government versus private sector provision of commercial and industrial services. This administration fully supports the competitive free enterprise system. Business provides the spark which enhances competition and, therefore, makes the most efficient use of our Nation's resources.

Economy and efficiency in Government and reward of the private sector for initiative and productivity are necessary ingredients in our formula for economic renewal.

Let me conclude by going back to the beginning of our discussion. I speculated why A-76 had not been aggressively implemented. Now let me assert why A-76 can and should be aggressively implemented now:

1. It is fair to federal employees.

2. Too many commercial and industrial services have been buried under the cloak of "it's a Government activity."

3. Implementing A-76 aggressively will have direct and indirect effects which will save the American taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Friday, July 23, 1982

The House met at 10 a.m. and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT).

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
July 22, 1982.

I hereby designate the Honorable JIM WRIGHT to act as Speaker pro tempore on Friday, July 23, 1982.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Lift us, O Lord, above the limited horizons of our lives that we may see Your world more clearly and know Your will in our daily tasks. Forgive us from selfishness and any narrow view that keeps us from fellowship with people from different backgrounds. Inspire us with Your spirit that we will see others as part of Your act of creation and we will share with others the bounty and resources and opportunities of a free people. Strengthen the bond of love that You have first given us that we may live in peace one with another. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

ARGENTINA SHOULD NOT BE GIVEN THE MEANS TO PRODUCE NUCLEAR WEAPONS

(Mr. SHAMANSKY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAMANSKY. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to read earlier this week that the administration has authorized the export of a control system for a nuclear facility vital to Argentina's efforts to secure nuclear independence. This system would be used at a heavy-water plant, a critical element in the production of materials that could be used in nuclear weapons.

Argentina refuses to reject the idea of acquiring nuclear weapons. Its government is repressive, and its territorial ambitions are well known. Given these circumstances, Argentina should not be given the means to produce nuclear weapons. Yet, the administration is doing just that. I, therefore, am cosponsoring a resolution urging the President to reconsider this decision and terminate the sale of this technology.

In testimony before the Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade, the Department of Energy promised to make improvements in nuclear policy. We on the subcommittee are still waiting for those improvements to occur in fact.

If we do not see positive nonproliferation action by the administration, we then must move forward quickly to enact H.R. 6032, the Nuclear Nonproliferation Policy Act, which I am cosponsoring.

Sophisticated nuclear technology in the wrong hands is even more dangerous to world peace than pipes and valves. Unfortunately, this administration cannot understand the potentially Earth-shattering impact of its decision to sell nuclear technology to the junta in Buenos Aires.

MR. WATT, STOP!

(Mr. RATCHFORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RATCHFORD. Mr. Speaker, regrettably, the antienvironment hogs are at the trough again. Interior Secretary James Watt has approved plans to offer 1 billion acres of offshore waters—almost the entire Outer Continental Shelf—for oil and gas exploration.

One billion acres will be up for grabs over the next 5 years. Apparently, the Secretary prefers to resurrect the wasteful, no-holds-barred approach to offshore energy exploration that has been rejected by the American people, as well as the U.S. Congress.

Slow down, Mr. Secretary. Restore some sense in our offshore exploration. Put reason back into oil and gas development. Keep responsible limits on offshore leasing, and maintain adequate environmental safeguards.

Please, Mr. Secretary, save something for future generations.

NUCLEAR ARMS REDUCTION LEGISLATION

(Mr. BENNETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, the speech of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ERLENBORN) on July 21 brought to my attention the great changes made in the nuclear arms reduction legislation that the Foreign Affairs Committee has brought out. Like him, I had not realized that House Joint Resolution 521 included an endorsement of SALT II. I am not sure I endorse that proposal because I have not studied that treaty in detail, and I do not support it if it is intended to freeze a superiority in nuclear weapons for the Russians. I do not approve freezing a superiority for Russians in military arms and weapons. Under these circumstances, I disassociate myself from approval of House Joint Resolution 521 as now drafted.

OLYMPIC COIN MAILING LIST

(Mr. ANNUNZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Olympic coin bill became law. The law, however, will be meaningless unless the American people get behind the program and purchase the coins. If all of the coins are sold, $600 million will be split between the U.S. Olympic Committee and the 1984 Los Angeles Olympic games.

Although the first group of coins, 90-percent silver dollars, will not be available until early next year, it is anticipated that orders for the coins, which will cost between $20 and $25, will begin to be accepted in the early fall.

Since many Members have newsletters, radio shows, and television programs aimed at their constituents, I am certain that Members will want to advise their constituents that they can make certain that they receive one of the first Olympic coins by being placed on the U.S. Mint's mailing list. To be placed on the list all that is necessary is for a person to send their name and address to the U.S. Mint, 55 Mint Street, San Francisco, Calif. 94175.

People who are on the mint mailing list will automatically receive Olympic coin order forms.

UNITED STATES REJECTS THE CONCEPT OF CHEMICAL WARFARE

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House acted with great wisdom in adopting the Zablocki-Bethune amendment deleting funding for binary chemical weapons.

There would be nothing to be gained from these weapons. We would never use them except in defense, and if Soviet and American troops are ever engaged it will not be with weapons as limited as these.

The important point now is to publicize around the globe that the United States rejects the concept of chemical warfare—the first use of which so revulsed the world 65 years ago—and the Soviets not only are producing such weapons but using them repeatedly on innocent and unarmed people of the Third World.

The sign of an aggressive and innovative administration is to turn a perceived policy defeat into an advantage for our country. I urge President Reagan and Secretary of State Schultz to put their maximum efforts into letting the people of the Third World know the difference between the United States and the Soviet Union on this important question of humanity.

TAX BILL FROM OTHER BODY IN VIOLATION OF CONSTITUTION

(Mr. PAUL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, article 1, section 7 of the U.S. Constitution says: "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives"—a clearer statement regarding the origination of tax legislation cannot be made. The other body has now passed and sent to the House a tax bill in violation of the Constitution and in violation to the oath of every Member of the other body who voted on this matter.

I am calling on you to fulfill your constitutional responsibilities and demand—through court proceedings, if necessary—that this measure be declared null and void. It is your responsibility and ours as Members of the House to obey the Constitution and in this issue it is crystal clear.

Although the issue of damage to the economy through increased taxation at this particular time is a most serious issue, the overriding issue is the mocking of the Constitution that has gone on. Every proposal in the other body's bill originated in the other body—even though they skirt the clear intent of the Constitution by using a minor House tax bill after removing all of its language. This continued defiance and low regard for law and the Constitution has been a significant contributor to the precarious economic and political conditions that threaten our Nation today.

Increasing taxes at this particular time will prove disastrous to our economy. The Founding Fathers, realizing that Representatives in the House would remain closer to the will of the people, intended that we be solely responsible for originating tax bills and never once dreamed that political chicanery would allow the Senate even to offer such a bill.

If the other body's version is not declared null and void as a result of the low regard for the Constitution that exists in this city, at least, Mr. Speaker, see to it that this bill is fully debated and open for full amendments by the House. I cannot see how we, the Members of the House, can sit idly by condoning and acquiescing in this ruthless abuse of the Constitution.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 6785

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service may have until midnight tonight, Friday, July 23, 1982, to file a report on the bill, H.R. 6785.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BENNETT). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

FRENCH COMPANIES VIOLATE U.S. CONTRACTS

(Mr. COURTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I can understand perfectly well why the European community wants to construct the Soviet gas pipeline. I have absolutely no quarrel with that. I cannot understand, however, why French President Mitterrand ordered French companies to violate contract provisions they had with U.S. companies, contracts that simply and clearly state that licensees will abide by U.S. export law. Something much larger than the pipeline is at stake here and that is Mr. Mitterrand encouraging French companies to abrogate commercial contracts with U.S. companies, something which forms the basis of all international trade.

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

(Mr. DERWINSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Members for the cooperation they gave the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) and myself this week in the commemoration of Captive Nations Week.

I would like to call to the attention of the membership that in this Captive Nations Week the President personally signed the proclamation at a public ceremony, the first time in the history of this observance that this was done. I believe this dramatizes the determination of the administration to face up squarely and effectively against international communism with the recognition that the defeat of communism can come from internal collapse, as the captive peoples rebel against their Red tyrants.

BALANCED BUDGET LEGISLATION

(Mr. HUGHES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, along with my colleague from Illinois (Mr. HYDE), balanced budget legislation that would require the Congress to eliminate deficit spending after September 30, 1983.

There is no question that the Congress and the President must move decisively to get our Nation's fiscal house in order. By the same token, we are under a solemn duty to act responsibly.

The legislation we are proposing is the responsible way to achieve a balanced budget, and it would do so far sooner than would be possible under the proposed constitutional amendment. At the same time, it would avoid the serious dangers inherent in cementing highly complex and untested economic language into the Constitution.

Our bill, like the proposed constitutional amendment, provides for balanced budgets except during times of declared war or national emergency, or when otherwise voted by three-fifths of both Houses.

Unlike the proposed constitutional amendment, our balanced budget legislation can be enacted into law without delay, any wording defects can be cured without having to retrace the arduous process of amending the Constitution. Most importantly, it requires the Congress—not the courts—to determine this country's fiscal policy. That is precisely what will happen in the event of legislative stalemate under a constitutional balanced budget amendment.

Finally, this legislation enables us to act now to bring deficit spending under control, instead of passing the buck to future Congresses and perhaps future administrations.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

(Mrs. SCHNEIDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, due to unavoidable delay, I was unable to return to Washington last Thursday, July 15, 1982, to record my votes on rollcalls 184, 185, and 186. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye" on each and wish that the record would so reflect.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT FOR A BALANCED BUDGET

(Mr. LUNGREN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, I just walked in here and heard the 1 minute of one of the other gentlemen from the other side of the aisle. He spoke about why it would be better for us to have legislation requiring a balanced budget as opposed to a constitutional amendment. I would just suggest to the gentleman that we already have such legislation. It has been passed in this House on two occasions; in fact, it was attached to the Bretton Woods legislation just a couple of years ago. If there is one thing that has been crystal clear it is that we have been able to ignore it year after year, session after session, Congress after Congress. Unfortunately, it appears that unless we have an outside discipline in this House we do not have the will, the guts, the courage, to have balanced budgets on a regular basis as opposed to unbalanced budgets on a regular basis. I would suggest that while it may sound good that we could pass a piece of legislation immediately requiring us to have a balanced budget, it is not necessary because it is already on the books. We ignore it, and evidently we need something stronger, and that is the reason why we need a constitutional amendment. I think most Members of the House would want to follow the Constitution since it is tougher to avoid or violate that than to violate our own legislation such as the type we already have.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNGREN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr HUGHES. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

What we have on the books is a pronouncement that we are going to have a balanced budget by a certain date. It has no teeth.

Mr. LUNGREN. That is true.

MODIFYING BAR MEMBERSHIP REQUIREMENTS FOR U.S. MAGISTRATES

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 2706), to amend title 28, United States Code, to modify the bar membership requirements for U.S. magistrates, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the 90th Congress enacted the Federal Magistrates Act in 1968. This act built upon the existing commissioners system. It created the judicial position of U.S. magistrate, transferred the criminal responsibilities of the old commissioners, granted increased duties in the criminal area, and expanded judicial responsibilities in the civil area.

In 1976 Congress amended the act to further clarify and define the duties of a U.S. magistrate. While the reforms made in the 1976 amendments clearly broadened the powers of the magistrate, it did not provide a plan to insure the quality of the magistrate; it left the appointment of the magistrate in the hands of the district courts. This naturally led to a disparity in quality of magistrates.

Early in the 95th Congress, a proposal was formulated with the expressed goals "to render consistent the utilization of magistrates, and at the same time to maintain flexibility in the Federal judicial system." Finally, the Federal Magistrate Act of 1979 was enacted by the 96th Congress. In recognition of the fact that the U.S. magistrate plays an integral and important role in the Federal judicial system, the 1979 act provided detailed legislative requirements for merit selection of U.S. magistrates. It provided that all new full- and part-time magistrate appointments, or reappointments, are contingent upon the magistrate having been a member of the bar of the highest court of his State or territory for at least 5 years and that all selections must be pursuant to standards and procedures promulgated by the Judicial Conference of the United States.

While this was the language the conference committee used, the final draft of the bill required that the magistrate "is, and has been for at least 5 years, a member in good standing of the bar of the highest court of the State in which he is to serve * * *."

While the goals of this legislation are certainly laudable, the particular language used has led to some inequitable situations and has prevented several qualified individuals from becoming magistrates. It insures the quality of magistrates, but does not take into consideration highly mobile nature of our society.

In accordance with section 9 of the Federal Magistrate Act of 1979 the Judicial Conference of the United States made a report to the Congress. The Judicial Conference found that—

> The language of the 1979 amendments has excluded some qualified individuals for consideration for magistrate positions because they have changed their residences . . . therefore, the language of the 1979 amendments should be modified to separate the two requirements of local bar membership and five year's bar membership. It should be sufficient simply to require that a magistrate be a member in good standing in the bar of the highest court of the state of appointment and a member of the bar of the highest court of any state for a period of at least five years.

In conclusion, this bill, S. 2706, simply separates the bar membership requirements for U.S. magistrates, while insuring the quality. It requires that a magistrate be a member of the bar of the highest court of the State of appointment and that he has been for at least 5 years a member in good standing of the bar of any State.

(Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas yield under his reservation?

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR., Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, briefly, the House is entitled to an explanation and I will make it very brief indeed. It is not a controversial measure. It is a technical measure. It has been discussed and cleared with the other side, with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER) who represents the committee.

The purpose of this measure is to cure an oversight made in the Magistrates Act of 1979. Under the provisions of the current law, 28 U.S.C. 631, before a magistrate can be appointed such a person must be a "member in good standing of the bar of the highest court of the State on which he is to serve for at least 5 years." While the sole purpose of the provision was to require bar membership of at least 5 years, the way the statute was written such membership has to be in the same State as the proposed State of appointment. The purpose of this more or less technical amendment is to rewrite this requirement so that the propective magistrate need only be a member of the bar of any State for 5 years before the appointment.

This amendment has been evaluated by members of the Subcommittee on Court, Civil Liberties, and the Administration of Justice. We can assure this House that this amendment comports with the actual intent of the Magistrates Act.

This legislation unanimously passed the Senate on June 30, 1982.

I urge the House to adopt this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to be identified with this legislation, and to say that we on our side concur in the wisdom of it and have no objection to it.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 2706

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 631(b)(1) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking out "He is, and has been for at least five years, a member" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "He has been for at least five years a member in good standing of the bar of the highest court of a State, the District of Columbia, the Comonwealth of Puerto Rico, or the Virgin Islands of the United States, and he is a member".

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COPYRIGHT OFFICE FEES AMENDMENTS

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 4441) to amend title 17 of the United States Code with respect to the fees of the Copyright Office, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and request a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, appoints the following conferees: Mr. KASTENMEIER, Mr. BROOKS, Mrs. SCHROEDER, and Messrs. FRANK, RAILSBACK, BUTLER, and SAWYER.

There was no objection.

CHEROKEE NATION OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 530 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 530

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2329) conferring jurisdiction on certain courts of the United States to hear and render judgment in connection with certain claims of the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DERRICK) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. QUILLEN) pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 530 provides for the consideration of H.R. 2329, the Cherokee Indian Claims Act and it is an uncomplicated rule. It merely provides for 1 hour of general debate to be divided equally between the chairman and the ranking minority member of the House Judiciary Committee. Any germane amendment will thereafter be in order under the 5-minute rule.

Prior to vote on final passage, one motion to recommit is in order. No waivers were requested or provided.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2329 waives the statute of limitations with regard to two claims against the Federal Government by the Cherokee, Choctaw, and Chickasaw Indian Nations of Oklahoma.

In the early 19th century, the Federal Government granted those nations a simple patent to 96 miles of the Arkansas River.

When the Federal Government began construction of the McClelland-Kerr Arkansas River Navigation System, it removed sand, gravel, and other minerals from that area of riverbed without compensation to the Indians.

In 1970, the Supreme Court ruled that those above-mentioned Indian nations did, in fact, own the riverbed and, after a 3-year evaluation by the Federal Government, negotiations were begun between the Department of the Interior and the Cherokees to settle the claim.

The Cherokees agreed to a Department proposal in late 1977 but in 1978, the Department notified the Cherokees that it would not settle the claim. By this time, the statute of limitations had expired and the Cherokees were left with no judicial recourse.

The second claim deals with railway right-of-way across Indian lands. By treaty with the United States, the Cherokee, Choctaw, Creek, Seminole, and Chickasaw Indian Nations agreed to set aside a portion of their lands for right-of-way and stations to railroads designated by the Congress. Upon abandonment by the railroads, these lands were to revert to the respective Indian nations.

The Congress, however, through subsequent legislation in 1906, extinguished the reversionary rights of the tribes and the courts have disallowed claims filed at various times since.

H.R. 2329 waives the statute of limitations for these two disputes and vests authority in the Court of Claims or the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Oklahoma for a determination.

Previously, this bill failed passage under suspension of the rules on March 19, 1982, by a vote of 174 to 215.

I know of no controversy regarding this rule and urge its expeditious approval.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina has explained the provisions of the resolution and also the details of the bill.

The bill confers jurisdiction on certain courts of the United States to pass judgment on certain claims of the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma.

I urge adoption of the resolution and the bill when it is discussed on the floor of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time and yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2329) conferring jurisdiction on certain courts of the United States to hear and render judgment in connection with certain claims of the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 2329, with Mr. ANNUNZIO in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from California (Mr. MOORHEAD) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR).

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2329, legislation which I introduced to waive the statute of limitations to allow the Cherokee, Choctaw, and Chickasaw Nations to bring two claims against the Government in two specific, and longstanding, cases. I am happy to have my friend and colleague, TOM KINDNESS, join me in support of this legislation. As you may recall, TOM had previously opposed one portion of the bill, but I am happy to say that his concerns have been addressed and he will be speaking in support of H.R. 2329 shortly.

The full Judiciary Committee favorably reported the legislation by unanimous voice vote. It's a very simple, straightforward bill which, after many years, provides an equitable and fair resolution of two particular claims. I would note at this point that these cases effect only three tribes in Oklahoma. They are factually unique and have no impact at all on any other Indian claim or water rights issue which might be pending elsewhere in the country.

I would further point out—and I want to emphasize this—that the legislation awards no compensation whatsoever to any of the three tribes. Nor does it make any judgment as to the merits of the two claims. It simply waives the statute to allow the tribes to present their cases before a court of law.

I first want to briefly describe the two claims and, later, I would be glad to respond to any questions which anyone might have.

The first claim arises out of construction of the Arkansas River navigation system, which Congress authorized in the early 1940's. At the time of construction, Congress and the Interior Department erroneously believed that a 96-mile stretch of the Arkansas River belonged to the State of Oklahoma. In fact, the bed and banks of that 96-mile stretch had been granted in fee simple patent to the three Indian Nations under treaty. The Supreme Court confirmed the tribes' ownership in 1970.

During construction of the navigation system, riverbed resources belonging to the tribes were irrevocably destroyed. The tribes were not granted compensation for these resources.

In 1974, the Department of the Interior invited the tribes to negotiate a settlement for the taking of sand and gravel from the riverbed. These negotiations lasted for several years and the Government even went so far as to survey the property in anticipation of the settlement. The Department sent a proposed settlement to the tribe for their review and signature. However, when the tribe did sign and return the Government's own proposal, the Department abruptly reversed positions and refused to sign. Critically, by that time, the statute of limitations had lapsed.

In abruptly changing positions, the Department relied on the legal concept of navigational servitude to justify taking the tribe's property without compensation. However, in testimony before the subcommittee, the Justice Department admitted that navigational servitude had never before been applied in this fact situation and that the only way to ultimately know if it was applicable was to go to court; exactly the approach we suggest today.

When questioned about this claim 3 years ago in a Senate hearing, the Department also at that time responded that the three tribes would simply have to sue the Government: Again, exactly what this legislation proposes.

The second claim involves what are commonly known as railroad station grounds, which the three nations granted throughout Oklahoma in the late 1800's. In making these grants of land to the railroads, the three tribes retained full reversionary rights to the land and upon abandonment by the railroads, the tribes should have regained the land. However, a 1906 act of Congress gave away those lands to municipalities—without the permission of the tribes—and without awarding them any compensation. The act specifically authorized the Secretary of Interior to seek compensation or recovery for the tribes, but the Department—the legal trustee for the tribe—made no attempt to do so at that time or at any time since the lands were given away.

In fact, in a similar case in Oklahoma involving the Creek Nation, the Department legally fought the tribe for almost 50 years before the Creeks finally won their claim, and settled the case.

The tribes have provided ample information as to why they did not, or were precluded from, pursuing their claims. But importantly the Department of the Interior has provided us with no information whatever to explain why they have failed, for over 75 years now, to pursue these claims on behalf of the tribes, as the law authorized them to do and as their fiduciary responsibility would mandate.

Needless to say, the statute of limitation has expired on this claim. And, as in the riverbed case, the Indian nations ask only that they now be permitted to try and protect their own property rights before a court of law.

Finally, I want to make one last point about the station grounds case. The tribes do not wish to seek recovery of any of the lands. Their only intention is to seek compensation for the dollar value of the lands as of the time of the taking—1909. They are asking Congress to allow them the right to try and recover what they should have received in the first place: fair and just compensation for their tribal lands which were given away to third parties.

I want to conclude on a personal note. Along with other Members of the Oklahoma delegation, as well as many Members who have provided assistance along the way, I have been trying for several years now to resolve these two claims in a way which will be fair and equitable for all the parties involved. I sincerely believe that this legislation provides such a solution.

We are not asking Congress to authorize or appropriate money to pay the tribes. We are asking only that the three Indian Nations be permitted to resolve the claims in a court of law. We do not make this request lightly.

We do it only because the history of the two cases shows that time and time again the Interior Department has refused to protect the property rights of these tribes, despite their legal obligation to do so. The Department's actions throughout the years represent nothing less than a total neglect of their duties, and an endless string of broken promises and bad faith negotiations.

These cases are begging for an equitable solution. It does nothing more than give the three Indian nations their day in court. It is long overdue, and I urge all of my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, this bill has two separate claims in it. The first claim deals with the Arkansas riverbed and the minerals extracted therefrom by the Army Corps of Engineers.

Since the Supreme Court has decided in Choctaw Nation against Oklahoma that the Cherokee Nation owns the riverbed, they should be entitled to compensation. The matter has been carefully studied for several years under several administrations. All parties reached the conclusion that the Cherokees were entitled to compensation.

Negotiations began in earnest and the papers were drawn up to conclude the matter, but the Government backed out. I suspect the past administration was neglectful in settling this matter with the Cherokees.

This bill does not ask for money, but it merely seeks authority to battle the issue in court.

With respect to the railroad land claims, we had a major dispute in the House the last time this bill came up. We did not have the facts before us that were necessary to come to a reasonable conclusion.

I understand that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS) and Mr. SYNAR, the author of the bill, have worked together on this matter and have come to some basic understandings as to the facts, and we have before us information that indicates that the total amount of money that is involved is about $1,288,000 and that the land is not actually being claimed itself.

For that reason, I now support this legislation and ask for an "aye" vote.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS) to discuss further the negotiations.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from California for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I will not burden our colleagues with a great deal of detail. I think the content and the meaning and the intent of the legislation have been well represented by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR) the author of the bill, and by the gentleman from California (Mr. MOORHEAD).

I want to touch on just two points to provide assurance to our colleagues that there has been diligent and appropriate attention given to this bill since it was previously brought to the floor of the House under suspension of the rules.

At that time, my opposition was based primarily on concern about the second claim included in the bill with respect to which we had insufficient information to know what the scope of the action was that we were undertaking.

As the gentleman from California has said, that has been resolved, and I would urge the members of the Committee that there is a very complete and reasonable listing available of those lands and I personally am satisfied that the scope of the claim is reasonable in that respect.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to insert a listing of the lands attached to a letter dated July 19, 1982, from the gentleman from Oklahoma, addressed to this gentleman, so that the listing of those lands will be a part of the record.

The list of the lands follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 19, 1982.

Hon. THOMAS KINDNESS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR TOM: Enclosed is an updated listing of the railroad station grounds plats. The new information which was written in was provided to us by the Tribe. The Tribes' attorneys indicate that this completes the survey which they have had performed on the station grounds areas.

I would like to point out, in particular, that the station grounds area in Tulsa, Oklahoma is listed as having no value and "not applicable." As the notation at the bottom indicates, this is because the Tulsa station was the only plat which was actually purchased by the railroads; therefore, no compensation will be sought for that plat. The only other applicable plat located within Tulsa is listed under the Missouri-Kansas-Texas railroad, at 3.77 acres, valued (as of 1909) at $24,633. You should be aware that the vast majority of station grounds plats located within Tulsa belonged to the Creek Nation, who settled their case last year. For the Creeks, there were twelve separate plats within Tulsa, totaling 42.47 acres, for which they received a 1909 valued compensation of $319,911. Additional information on the Creek Nation plats in Tulsa, and compensation for them, is available as part of the public record in the Creek Nation v. U.S. case.

I would like to reemphasize several points about this matter:

(1) The Tribes have no intention or desire to seek recovery of the properties themselves; they are seeking only compensation for the value of the properties based on the 1909 dollar value of the lands.

(2) The station grounds properties may or may not be located strictly within the limits of the towns enumerated. The Tribe has indicated, in fact, that in the vast majority of cases, they will not be.

(3) As the additional notation at the bottom of page two indicates, the Tribes' attorneys have advised them that station grounds plats within the Deeded (or Outlet) lands are not eligible for compensation. Therefore, they have been excluded from the list.

Tom, I sincerely hope this satisfies your concern over knowing exactly where these plats are located within Oklahoma. And, again, I can only strongly emphasize that the Tribes have no desire whatsoever to try and recover the lands themselves. They seek only the compensation they should have been awarded in the first place.

Please call me if you have any questions, or have your staff get in touch with Sandra Zeune in my office.

With kindest regards.

Sincerely,

MIKE SYNAR,
Member of Congress.

PRELIMINARY VALUE INDEX AS OF MARCH 31, 1982—CHEROKEE NATION RAILROAD DEPOT STATION GROUNDS VALUE AS OF JUNE 30, 1909—Continued

[1] Was 13.17.

[2] No value. Not applicable. Tulsa station grounds was the only plat actually purchased by a railroad company. Therefore, the tribe seeks no compensation for it.

Note.—This list does not separate the locations by number of sites but shows only the composite number of acres. This list does not include those stations located in either the Deeded or Outlet areas due to current lack of correctly detailed plats. Further note: Attorneys for the Tribe have advised the Tribe that the Deeded (or Outlet) lands will not be eligible for compensation. Therefore, they have been excluded from this list.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, concerning the other aspect of concern, when the bill was before the House under suspension of the rules recently, was that there was some objection from the Department of Justice concerning the first claim.

That is a claim that has to do, very simply, with compensation for taking gravel, construction material for the construction of public works in the river, taking that gravel and not compensating the owners of that gravel for it, the Cherokee Nation and others, which had a right to be compensated for that gravel, that construction material. Compensation is a universal rule of such takings.

However, the Justice Department had taken the position throughout several administrations that anything in the river used for the purpose of construction was not subject to compensation. The matter ought to be litigated at the very least to determine this.

In a very comparable case, another Indian tribe has been compensated for the taking of construction material in the same circumstance. I think it is a very mistaken position that the Department of Justice has taken over a periods of years, and furthermore the obligation of the United States and this Congress to serve, in effect, as trustee for these Indian tribes and nations that are involved in such dispute has not been diligently carried out. The responsibility is ours to give that opportunity to litigate any remaining legal questions to these tribes and the Cherokee Nation that are involved in the claims.

I would urge support of the bill at this point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from California for yielding. I, too, rise in support of the bill, primarily because I received the assurances of my colleagues from Oklahoma, Ohio, and California that the basic problems affecting this bill have been resolved, and that we no longer have problems with the language.

I do think it is important to point out for the RECORD, however, that the administration still does oppose this legislation. They have indicated that because it would waive the statute of limitations that bars the filing of Indian claims against the United States for the sole benefit of several Indian nations in Oklahoma, they find the bill objectionable and do not support it. I just felt that it is important to put that in the RECORD, even though many of us in the House feel the main problems have been resolved. The administration's position should be reflected somewhere along the line in case they decide to take action against this legislation at a later date.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER).

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time. I rise in opposition to the legislation, and at least at this point I will need to have some clarification on a number of points. I think perhaps a colloquy between the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR) and myself may help to establish a legislative record that is important for future legislation that may come before this House and the Congress.

As chairman of the Minority Task Force on Indian Affairs in the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee of this House, I have to say that our concerns are the precedents that we may be establishing. Basically, it goes back to the concern about whether or not what we are doing here today will leave the door open for such claims to be filed in the future regardless of the time limitations that have been established for such claims.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if he would be willing to inform this Member and for the RECORD how we may differentiate the circumstances in this instance, where I think the claims indeed do seem to be legitimate, from future actions by other tribes that may come before the committees of this House and before the Congress.

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Chairman, I think that is a very good question, because this has been a major concern, whether or not we are setting a legal precedent. To our knowledge, no legal precedent for any future case is involved for two unique reasons concerning the riverbed portion of the two claims.

The only river ever held in fee simple patent by anyone other than the Federal Government was the Arkansas River, which was ruled in 1972 to be held by these tribes. Therefore, there would never be a case throughout the country which would have a similar fact situation and is unique.

Concerning the station grounds case, this is unique to Oklahoma, unique to Oklahoma lands, and there is no legal precedent there. In working with the gentleman from Ohio, this was a major concern of ours and the committee, and we are satisfied that no legal precedent is involved that would affect any future case in any other part of the country.

Mr. BEREUTER. I think the case is quite clear in the instance of the riverbed. Would the gentleman care to enlarge upon the situation with respect to the station grounds?

Mr. SYNAR. The station grounds is very simple in that the original act was to have reversionary interest of the lands back to the Indian tribes. The changes in the situation were that the act was changed and the land was given to the municipalities. This was done by the trustee of those various tribes, the Interior Department, without their consent. During the last 15 years the Creek Nation has been fighting a similar case, and after 50 years has resolved the matter in favor of the tribe. The trustee or fiduciary responsibility of the Interior Department had failed. Only if that particular case was to occur again, where the Interior Department had failed the fiduciary responsibility, would there ever be a similar case of land reversions of this nature.

Mr. BEREUTER. I would ask the gentleman, and yield time to him for the purpose of debate, to respond to this question: If he would trace for me very briefly the reasons why the amount of time has ensued, why the tribes were not able to bring this matter to conclusion before the time limits had expired.

Mr. SYNAR. I think that is a very good question, and I could respond in two ways. First of all, as the gentleman is familiar, having worked on the Indian Affairs Committee, the sophistication of legal counsel of the tribes has only been a recent phenomenon. Prior to probably the last 10 years, the tribes were totally dependent upon the Interior Department to prosecute and protect their interests, both property and personal, in their trustee and fiduciary responsibility. The issue is whether or not the Interior Department in their trust responsibility legitimately represented the interests of the tribe at the time in 1909 when this all occurred. I think the answer, if one reviews the history, is that is not the case.

Second, if one looks at the good faith efforts, and one who would use reasonable viewing of the situation as these cases are proceeding, one would look at the history over the last 50 years; court case after court case after court case had been rejected on these particular lands. It was only when the Creek Nation finally did win the suit that the other tribes were really put on notice that this for the first time would give them an opportunity to rethink their position concerning the station grounds.

So, if one looks at the good faith responsibility, and just looking at it reasonably, the tribes had no indication that they could ever win. But failing that, let me say that they did not, it was not their responsibility; it was the responsibility of the Department of the Interior in its trustee and fudiciary responsibility role to prosecute this case in a reasonable and timely manner, which they did not.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for those comments. I think the colloquy has been helpful in distinguishing this case from others that may come up before the body. I would like to commend the gentleman for his diligence and the effort with which he has pursued this matter with respect to his constituents and native Americans. I no longer stand in opposition to the legislation.

However, I would like to make it clear that I do not agree that the United States, as part of its trust responsibility to Indian tribes, was responsible for prosecuting any railroad station claims during that time when tribes could file actions against the United States under the Indian Claims Commission Act of 1946. That act required the United States to provide notice to tribes that they could and should bring any and all claims they had against the United States by August 1951, but it did not put the burden of actually bringing those actions on the United States.

Congress has waived the 1951 filing deadline set in the Claims Commission Act only three times, and then in cases where evidence was presented that clearly established that extenuating circumstances prevented the tribes from filing their claims or otherwise having them heard on their merits. The evidence provided by the Oklahoma members and the tribe concerning the Oklahoma railroad station claims appears to establish such extenuating circumstances. In particular, it appears that the Cherokee Tribe did not bring its claims before the Indian Claims Commission because of a 1943 Supreme Court ruling which held in part that the proper course of action of the tribes was against the railroads themselves rather than the United States. This ruling made it appear futile to any law firm to bring a case against the United States under the Claims Commission Act. Subsequently, just before the statute expired, the Seminole and Creek Tribes refiled their station land claims before the Commission and ultimately, in 1974, prevailed. The Cherokee, with claims virtually identical to those of the Seminole and the Creeks, were left without an avenue to get them before the Court.

Therefore, it appears that in the interests of justice and maintaining fair and honorable dealings by the United States with the Indian tribes, the Cherokee should have an opportunity at long last to bring their railroad station claims before the Court of Claims.

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER).

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, being a member of both the Committee on the Judiciary, which reported this bill, and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, which has jurisdiction over Indian affairs, I have more than a passing interest in this case.

Anyone who knows the history of the Cherokee Nation and the tragedy that befell it because of what we all recognize now were wrongful actions by the United States cannot help but feel that the very least we can do is to give this tribe and others similarly situated their day in court.

Now, why have they not had their day in court? Because, as the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR) has very clearly spelled out, the Department of the Interior, for whatever reason, some years ago failed in the discharge of its fiduciary obligation to those people who were in effect wards of the United States for this purpose. I suggest that this case is unique, simply because, after having failed and after the time expired under the statute of limitations, the United States said, "Sorry, but now you cannot proceed even though we now recognize you may have a just claim. You cannot proceed, simply because the statute of limitations has expired."

All we are trying to do is to correct that situation in this case, so that they can get into court and let the court decide on the merits whether the tribes have a valid claim or not.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR) has done the right thing in bringing this before us again, and I want to commend him for it.

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES).

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, first of all, I want to commend particularly the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR) for the aggressive, outstanding leadership he has given to this issue. This issue really became a problem before the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR) was elected to Congress in 1978.

What we have before us today is a matter of equity and trying to reestablish a precedent of good faith between the Federal Government and these particular Indian tribes. This good faith was breached when the Federal Government broke an agreement in 1977, the year before the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR) was elected. Mr. SYNAR has done an outstanding job of trying to correct the problem.

Second, let me state that there is no budget impact whatsoever with this legislation. No outlays are encompassed in this legislation.

What happened is that these Indian tribes in 1970 received an award from the Supreme Court acknowledging that they had ownership to parts of the Arkansas riverbed. In 1973, 1974, and 1975 the Congress through legislation asked the Department of the Interior to place a value on this land. That value was determined. In 1976 and 1977, the Indian tribes negotiated with the Department of the Interior, reaching an agreement in 1977, the year the statute of limitations would have expired.

In 1978 the Department of the Interior reneged upon that agreement, did not acknowledge an agreement, and consequently left the tribes defenseless, with the statute of limitations having passed, and that became the reason why this legislation was necessary.

So to reestablish good faith between the Government and the Indian tribes, and to establish equity in that particular case, I hope that all Members will support this legislation that the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR) has brought forth. It gives the tribes the right to go to court to get a judicial determination of whether the Government should compensate for the property.

Mr. Chairman, I particularly want to thank the gentleman from California (Mr. MOORHEAD) and the Members of the majority and minority sides, who have been so cooperative in this regard.

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. MCCURDY).

Mr. MCCURDY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to rise in support of the bill and in support of the position of my colleague, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR). The gentleman has done an excellent job and has been very diligent in bringing this matter to the floor to provide some equity and relief for the Cherokee Nation and the Indian tribes in Oklahoma who, I think, have been wronged.

Mr. Chairman, this is an excellent bill. I urge my colleagues to support it, and again I would like to commend my colleague, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. SYNAR) for his diligent leadership in this matter.

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. MCCURDY) for his remarks, and I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, let me conclude the general debate by again echoing the sentiments of my colleague, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES), and thanking the gentleman from California (Mr. MOORHEAD) and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) for their diligent work. During the discussions and the debate in the presenting of this bill, both these gentlemen, who do not have large Indian tribes in their districts, have been fair and reasonable and have brought forth legitimate concerns. I have enjoyed working with them, and I thank them for their help on this legislation.

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill, H.R. 2329, to allow the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma to file certain claims against the United States in the Court of Claims.

This legislation was referred jointly to the Judiciary Committee and to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. The Judiciary Committee acted first on this legislation and, because of the very thorough record that committee made on the bill and in order to avoid duplication of effort, my committee deferred to Judiciary on the legislation. Of course, this was done without prejudice to our continuing jurisdiction over these matters.

Mr. Chairman, this bill authorizes the Cherokee Indians of Oklahoma to file with the Court of Claims any claims against the United States it may have arising out of its ownership of portions of the Arkansas River and claims it may have with respect to the taking of its lands for railroad purposes.

Authorizing the filing of these claims would, in some respects, be a departure from the statute of limitations in the Indian Claims Commission Act. However, I feel that the facts in the two claims involved are sufficiently unique and the reasons for the tribe failing to meet the time limits are sufficiently reasonable as to permit this exception.

This bill does not constitute a congressional determination of the merits of these claims nor does it settle the claims. It merely allows the tribe to have its day in court to litigate the issues.

Mr. Chairman, I urge favorable action on the bill.●

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

H.R. 2329

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding sections 2401 and 2501 of title 28, United States Code, and section 12 of the Act of August 13, 1946, as amended (the Indian Claims Commission Act, 60 Stat. 1049, 1052; 25 U.S.C. 70k), jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the United States Court of Claims, or upon the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Oklahoma, to hear, determine, and render judgment, under the jurisdictional provisions of section 2 of the Indian Claims Commission Act of August 13, 1946, as amended (60 Stat. 1049, 1050; 25 U.S.C. 70a), on any claim which the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma may have against the United States for any and all damages to Cherokee tribal assets related to and arising from construction of the Arkansas River Navigation System, including, but not limited to, the value of sand, gravel, coal, and other resources taken, the value of damsites and powerheads of dams constructed on that part of the Arkansas riverbed within Cherokee domain in Oklahoma, without the authority or consent of said Cherokee Nation; and also on any claim which the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma may have against the United States resulting from any action under section 14 of the Act of April 26, 1906 (34 Stat. 137, 142), wherein the United States gave away to third parties lands for what are known as station grounds of railroads, said lands being segregated from Cherokee Nation tribal lands without compensation to said Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma therefor; all of said lands or interests therein being held by said Cherokee Nation by virtue of treaties and by patent issued by the United States granting said lands to said Cherokee Nation in fee simple, or otherwise: Provided, That any tribe, nation, band, or group may bring a claim arising out of the circumstances described in section of this Act, if said claim is held in common with the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma. Any party to any action thus brought under this Act shall have a right to review, as provided under existing law.

Mr. SYNAR (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 1, line 3, strike out "That," and insert in lieu thereof "That (a)".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 24, strike out the colon and insert in lieu thereof a period.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the last committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 24, strike out "Provided" and all that follows thereafter through page 3, line 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) Notwithstanding sections 2401 and 2501 of title 28, United States Code, and section 12 of the Act approved August 13, 1946 (25 U.S.C. 70k), the Court of Claims or the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Oklahoma shall have jurisdiction to the same extent as under subsection (a) of this Act to hear, determine, and render judgment on any claim of the Choctaw Nation and on any claim of the Chickasaw Nation against the United States for any damages to any tribal assets, lands, or interests of such Nations arising from the actions of the United States described in such subsection.

Mr. SYNAR (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other amendments?

If not, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. BENNETT) having assumed the chair, Mr. ANNUNZIO, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 2329) conferring jurisdiction on certain courts of the United States to hear and render judgment in connection with certain claims of the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma, pursuant to House Resolution 530, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 293, nays 26, not voting 115, as follows:

Messrs. HARTNETT, PHILIP M. CRANE, ROTH, WORTLEY, BETHUNE, JAMES K. COYNE, McCOLLUM, and ROBERTS of South Dakota changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. TAUZIN changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous matter, on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 2643, AIRPORT AND AIRWAY IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 489 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 489

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order, section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) to the contrary notwithstanding, to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2643) to provide for the improvement of the Nation's airport and airway system, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed four hours, one hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Pubilc Works and Transportation, one hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Science and Technology, and two hours to be equally divided between the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Pubilc Works and Transportation now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5, rule XXI are hereby waived, and each section of said substitute shall be considered as having been read. It shall be in order to consider the text of the amendments recommended by the Committee on Science and Technology now printed in the bill, and the text of the bill H.R. 6193 reported by that committee, if offered as amendments to said substitute. After the disposition of all other perfecting amendments to said substitute, it shall be in order to consider an amendment adding a new title to said substitute consisting of the text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means now printed in the bill H.R. 4800, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7, rule XVI and clause 5, rule XXI are hereby waived. Said amendment shall not be subject to amendment, or to a demand for a division of the question in the House or in the Committee of the Whole, except pro forma amendments for the purpose of debate and germane amendments recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means. Upon the adoption of said amendment, no further amendment to the bill shall be in order. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. FROST) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 489 technically provides for the consideration in the Committee of the Whole of H.R. 2643, the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1981. However, it is a relatively complex rule which deals with three distinct bills and I would therefore urge the Members' attention.

This is a modified open rule which provides for 4 hours of general debate to be divided among the three committees of jurisdiction as follows: 1 hour equally divided between the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation; 1 hour equally divided between the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Science and Technology; and 2 hours equally divided by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The resolution waives section 402(a) of the Budget Act which prohibits the consideration of any bill which authorizes new budget authority for a fiscal year unless that bill has been reported by May 15 preceding the beginning of the fiscal year for which it becomes effective. The waiver is necessary because various provisions of H.R. 2643, as introduced, authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1981 and the bill was not reported by May 15, 1980.

The resolution would also make in order consideration of a Public Works Committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the bill as original text for purposes of amendments under the 5-minute rule and waives points of order which may lie against the substitute or against H.R. 4800 for failure to comply with clause 5, rule XXI, which prohibits appropriations in a legislative bill. This waiver is necessary because provisions of H.R. 2643 and H.R. 4800 permit the Secretary to obligate already appropriated funds, transfer funds, or may otherwise constitute an appropriation, each section of the substitute will be considered as read.

With regard to the Committee on Science and Technology, its recommended amendments now printed in the bill are made in order for consideration, and, if offered, the text of H.R. 6193 (relating to 1983 authorization for FAA research, engineering, and development), as an amendment to H.R. 2643.

House Resolution 489 provides for an open rule up to this point. After the disposition of all perfecting amendments to the substitute, it will then be in order to consider the text of H.R. 4800 as recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means as a new title to the substitute. Clause 7 of rule XVI (relating to germaneness) is waived against consideration of the amendment.

No amendments would be allowed under the rule to this title except for pro forma amendments for debate and germane amendments of the Committee on Way and Means. No division of the question is in order on H.R. 4800.

Once this amendment is adopted, no further amendment will be in order, the committee will report the bill back to the House with adopted amendments. As usual, members may request a separate vote on any amendment adopted to the bill or substitute.

One motion to recommit with or without instructions is in order.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2643 is a large and complex piece of legislation reflected in the number of committees claiming jurisdiction and in the amount of time which the Rules Committee seeks to provide for general debate. I, therefore, will provide a cursory explanation of its provisions here and leave the details to the more knowledgeable committees of record.

H.R. 2643 provides reauthorization for numerous airport and airways development programs which had expired in 1980 and had been continued under the omnibus reconciliation bill and the Supplemental Appropriations Act of last year.

It provides $450 million per year—fiscal year 1981 through fiscal year 1983—in direct spending authority from the airport and airway trust fund for the airport development aid program (ADAP).

It further authorizes appropriations for airport facilities and equipment, aviation research, engineering and development, aviation security, training for State and local aviation personnel, and FAA operation and maintenance of the airport and airway system.

The Science Committee added authorization for FAA research and development for fiscal year 1981 and 1982 and H.R. 6193, if offered, would add FAA R. & D. authorizations for fiscal year 1983.

Finally, through H.R. 4800 the Ways and Means Committee recommends to the House several modifications of airport and airway revenue policies.

In 1980, the jet fuel tax expired and the gasoline tax was reduced from 7 cents per gallon to 4 cents per gallon for general aviation. H.R. 4800 sets both taxes at a level of 12 cents per gallon for the 18-month period ending December 31, 1983. After that time taxes will revert to the present level.

The domestic air passenger ticket tax is maintained at its present 5-percent rate and the international departure tax is reinstated and increased from $3 to $5.

The bill also transfers the revenues raised from the aviation related excise taxes from the general fund to the airport and airways trust fund for the 18-month period ending December 31, 1983.

This is obviously an important piece of legislation which affects the safety and efficiency of our air transportation system and hence each Members' constituency. I urge my colleagues to support this rule and move to expeditious consideration of H.R. 2643.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this rule. While I am ordinarily an advocate of rules which are more open than this one, I do feel that the handling of this matter by the Committee on Rules has been appropriate.

I want to stress from the outset that the current administration has expressed support for this rule.

As the gentleman from Texas has already explained, what we will have before us if this rule is adopted is legislation reported from three committees of this House. The rule which the Rules Committee has granted provides that the Public Works Committee's substitute will be considered as an original bill for purposes of amendment and will therefore serve as the principal vehicle for consideration of this matter.

The Committee on Science and Technology has reported an amendment to this bill and also a separate piece of legislation, H.R. 6193, both of which authorize research and development by the Federal Aviation Administration at levels different from those provided in the Public Works version. This rule permits consideration of these committee proposals as amendments to the Public Works bill.

In addition, the Committee on Ways and Means has reported H.R. 4800, which if adopted would add a new title to this bill making certain changes regarding the revenues which come into the airway trust fund. Consideration of this separate bill as an amendment to the Public Works bill is therefore provided for under this rule.

Clause 7 of rule 16, the germaneness rule, must be waived in order for the Ways and Means portion to be offered as an amendment. In addition, because of the time factor, section 402(A) of the budget act has to be waived, since new budget authority is required to be reported by May 15 of the year preceding the beginning of the fiscal year for which it becomes effective. Clause 5 of rule 21 must also be waived since provisions of the Public Works version and Ways and Means proposal could be construed to contain appropriations in a legislative bill.

Under this rule, there will be 4 hours of general debate—2 hours for the Ways and Means Committee and 1 hour each for Science and Technology and Public Works.

None of the amendments will themselves be subject to amendment. However, a motion to recommit with or without instructions is provided.

Mr. Speaker, as reluctant as I usually am to support rules which close off all but committee amendments, I am convinced that this is the correct approach in this instance. The Secretary of Transportation has asked the House to adopt this rule as the best method of getting a bill passed in this area. Because of the importance of enacting the legislation without delay, I urge my colleagues to support the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I do have requests for time, but first I do want to reemphasize that I am supporting the rule and I will be supporting the previous question.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. MOORE).

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Members of the House to vote against the previous question on this rule.

The tax title of the bill that this rule brings to the floor, H.R. 2643, once again is a closed rule. Once again Members of the House are being told, "You don't know enough about tax policy, you don't know enough about public policy, you don't know enough about aviation policy to have the right to make some decisions for yourself. They have been made for you and you just take it or leave it."

There are several important amendments I think my colleagues on the House floor can understand and ought to have the right to vote on. These amendments were requested of the Rules Committee, but were not voted upon by the Rules Committee.

If the previous question is defeated, I will offer a substitute modified closed rule which will allow three amendments to the tax title of this bill.

The first amendment will reduce the general aviation fuels tax from 12 cents down to 8 cents. That is not too difficult to understand.

Second, there are carryover aviation taxes that will still be allowed to go on under this bill after most of the other taxes in this bill sunset. I simply will offer an amendment to make all the taxes sunset. That, too, is not very difficult to understand.

Third, there is a special tax preference that air passengers going to Alaska and Hawaii receive special treatment that other passengers across the country do not. The gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) will offer an amendment to correct that and I think you will concur that it also is not too difficult for Members of the House to understand.

These three amendments have the support of the ranking minority members of the Ways and Means Committee, the Public Works Committee, and the Aviation Subcommittee of the Public Works Committee, which is all of the committees that this bill went through in its route to coming to you on the House floor.

The first amendment would reduce the general aviation fuels tax from the present 12-cent-a-gallon level in this bill down to 8 cents. The 12-cent level is not needed. An 8-cent gasoline tax will leave $2.1 billion of unobligated surplus funds in the trust fund at the end of the authorization period of this bill, $2.1 billion more than anybody has authorized to spend will still be there.

Second, the general aviation industry is already paying $1.80 a gallon for fuel and does not need to have us raising that fuel any higher than it need be.

Third, this bill triples—I repeat, triples the current tax paid on aviation gasoline. It is a 400-percent increase for jet fuel.

An 8-cent-a-gallon tax is still higher than was included in the previous 10-year aviation tax history, so the amendment I will offer will, in fact, raise taxes on what they are now by doubling and raise taxes over what they ever were on aviation fuel; but to triple it or to increase it 400 percent is uncalled for when you are still going to have a balance of $2.1 billion left when this authorization bill is finished.

Further, the general aviation industry is in a slump. An unnecessarily excessive tax will simply make that slump worse.

Unit sales of private aircraft are down 46 percent over last year. Unemployment in the general aviation industry is some 25 to 30 percent of unemployed. These taxes will just make that worse.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there is no point in raising a tax that is dedicated to a trust fund and those taxes in that trust fund are not going to be spent.

This trust fund is a prisoner of the unified budget and efforts to hold its outlays from that trust fund down to bring down deficits.

Now, while I support the FAA plan that will ultimately at some point in the future spend those funds, the point is that we are supposed to raise taxes to meet the authorized spending of this bill and that will happen with an 8-cent-a-gallon gasoline tax and still leave a surplus of $2.1 billion.

The second amendment I intend to offer will eliminate the carryover aviation taxes. When this bill expires, some taxes continue even though the tax portion of the bill sunsets most of the taxes.

These taxes are the result of legislative loose ends or just sloppy lawmaking. These taxes will not go into the trust fund, but go into the general fund.

In the past 21 months since the last aviation fuel tax expired, these carryover taxes paid by aviation consumers, some $2 billion, did not go into the trust fund for aviation growth and for aviation safety, but went into the general fund.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

This amendment, this second amendment, failed in the Ways and Means Committee by one vote—by one vote.

I want to conclude by saying that I think the Congress has the duty to raise the taxes to meet the authorization levels. In the entire 10-year history of this trust fund, the tax receipts have always been higher than the authorization levels and the appropriation levels have always been below the authorization level; so what it boils down to is that we are just raising taxes to sit in a fund and not be spent, in violation of what they are supposed to be spent for—for aviation safety.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that we reject this rule, vote down the previous question and allow us to begin to exhibit some sort of tax and fiscal restraint and policy by giving some control over these funds that are not being spent, but are just being collected and sitting there.

Mr. MINETA. I appreciate the gentleman's yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, it is particularly important that we vote "yes" on the previous question and adopt a rule permitting prompt consideration of legislation to renew the Nation's airport and airway programs for fiscal years 1982 and 1983. These important programs, which have been in effect since 1970, are fully supported by taxes paid by users of the system. Renewal of the programs is critical if our aviation system is to be able to handle the demands which will be placed on it during the coming decade.

For example, our air traffic control system now uses computers and radar technology which is more than 20 years old and is becoming increasingly expensive to operate and maintain. Unless the system is modernized, it is estimated that the number of severely congested airports will grow from the current 11 to 91 by the year 2000.

The administration has recently submitted detailed plans for modernizing the airway system. The modernization will make the system much more efficient and productive. FAA estimates that its proposal for modernization will save $43 billion in operating costs to the Government between now and the year 2000 at an estimated capital cost of $10 billion.

The needs for airport capital development are equally great. It would make no sense to develop the world's best airway system to accommodate aircraft in the air, but have no place for them to land.

Airport development needs have been estimated at $12 billion over the next decade. Unless this development is undertaken, capacity constraints, which are already becoming a problem in some major airports, will become more prevalent. Congestion will increase and significant delays will become normal.

H.R. 2643 will enable us to begin meeting the needs of aviation for the decade of the 1980's. The funding levels which our committee will support on the floor are the minimum required to begin the capital development of airports and airways which will be required if our system is to continue to be safe and efficient.

H.R. 2643 needs to go forward as promptly as possible. Until this legislation is passed, FAA will have no authority to make ADAP grants for fiscal 1982. Unless this legislation is enacted well before the end of the fiscal year, we may lose an entire year of airport development.

Passage of this legislation is also necessary to end the highly inequitable tax situation which has existed since October 1980. Since that time taxes paid by aviation users have been going into the general fund or the highway trust fund rather than the aviation trust fund. This is a great inequity to the airlines and their passengers, and to general aviation, who are paying user taxes but not having them set aside for aviation needs as promised by the Congress in 1970. This inequity must be remedied promptly.

I would also emphasize that the legislation reported by our committee, H.R. 2643, would be under an open rule, so that any Member with a disagreement with any portion of H.R. 2643 would have the opportunity to offer an amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join with me in voting "yes" on the previous question and adopting a rule today so that we can promptly pass legislation to renew the airport and airway programs.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this rule and urge the defeat of the previous question.

However, from the outset I would like it understood that the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. MOORE) and myself have no quarrel with the fine work of the gentleman from California (Mr. MINETA) and his subcommittee, not with their portions of the bill. Our attack on the rule and the previous question have nothing to do with their section of the bill. We support it.

What we want to do is to give this body the opportunity to make some choices on the Ways and Means part of the bill, which we find excessive.

I do support the Moore amendments and the Moore rationale, and I would like to be associated with the remarks just made by the gentleman from Louisiana, but I want to use my time this morning to talk about the amendment which I hope to introduce. It is printed in the RECORD on page H3273 of June 8, 1982.

Under the present law, individuals flying to Hawaii and Alaska are exempt from paying the domestic airline ticket tax. Under this bill, that tax is 5 percent. Instead, these passengers pay the international departure tax and are treated as though they were flying to a foreign country, not to the 49th and 50th States of our Union.

Now, due to the fluctuations in air travel ticket prices, the revenue estimates vary on how much this special-interest tax break for travelers to Hawaii and Alaska get. The low estimate, I understand, is that this benefit will cost the Treasury at least $40 million each year.

What Members have to understand is that this is a subsidy paid by all of the passengers who pay a regular ticket price for flying all around the United States, and the subsidy that they pay is given to those more affluent passengers who can afford to fly to Alaska or Hawaii for a vacation. Some very simply called this an outright gift from regular flying passengers to vacation travelers.

Whatever it is, at a time when Congress has to raise extra tax revenues, Congress should certainly not allow an unproductive special-interest tax break to continue in this part of the Tax Code.

Now, the supporters of this exemption usually argue that the flight is over water and they do not need all the wonderful FAA protection that over-ground flights get. However, they forget that flights between New Orleans and Miami, between here and the Northeast, between here and Florida, are also overwater flights and the principal FAA support is in taking off and landing anyway.

Obviously, those flights use the system. Passengers ought to pay what everbody else pays.

These States are the most recent additions to our Union. I think they are proud members of our Union and I think they would want to be treated like other citizens. They are not international destinations. They are not territories or possession. They are States.

I urge the defeat of the previous question in order that the entire House may have the opportunity to cast its vote against the continuation of an expensive, unnecessary, special-interest tax break for a select group of rather affluent vacationers.

The vote in favor of continuing this tax break was 17 to 14 in the Ways and Means Committee, which indicates to me there is substantial bipartisan support for eliminating this special tax break.

Mr. Speaker, going on to the Moore amendments, they do seek to moderate unneeded tax increases, and those amendments are especially meritorious. The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. MOORE) is trying to raise taxes just enough to finance the system which the gentleman from California (Mr. MINETA) would like to put in operation. Even though there will be a large surplus in the fund after the Moore amendments were adopted, if they were to be adopted, we do seek to moderate the tax increases so that we do not provide an extra-large amount in the fund. We know this Congress always looks for ways to spend out of that fund.

There have been three or four attempts, some for noise reduction, some for special buildings at airports, some even for roads leading to airports, from this fund. We think it is better if the taxes finance only what the gentleman from California thinks is necessary to improve the system in the future.

With respect to general aviation, the gentleman from Louisiana has made the point, I think, very well. General aviation is being overtaxed in this bill, and the Moore amendment to moderate the increase should be passed.

Mr. Speaker, I urge defeat of the previous question.

□ 1150

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes, for debate only, to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI), the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Texas (Mr. FROST).

Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means to speak in favor of the rule granted by the House Rules Committee for consideration of H.R. 4800, the Airport and Airway Revenue Act of 1982. I urge my colleagues to support the Committees on Ways and Means and on Rules by supporting the closed rule on H.R. 4800. This measure will be offered as a separate financing title to H.R. 2643, the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1982, as reported by the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

H.R. 4800 extends and reinstates various aviation excise taxes in order to finance the airport and airway trust fund through December 31, 1983. Under the bill, the domestic air passenger ticket tax would continue at its present 5-percent rate, and the air freight waybill tax would be reinstated at its prior rate of 5 percent. The international departure tax would be reinstated at a rate of $5 per person. The fuel tax for noncommercial general aviation would be imposed at 12 cents per gallon for both gasoline and jet fuel, and the aircraft tire and tube taxes would continue at their present rates. The aircraft use tax of prior law would be repealed for both commercial and general aviation.

The revenues from these excise taxes are needed to provide adequate funding over the short term for the spending on airport and airway programs that will be proposed by the House Public Works Committee. In addition, action on these taxes is long overdue. In 1980, several of these taxes were allowed to lapse or were automatically reduced by congressional inaction, and it is past time to reinstate these excise taxes at more appropriate levels.

I recognize that tax increases are never popular, and these are no exception. Yet, I would point out that the Committee on Ways and Means is presently required under the reconciliation instruction for the first concurrent resolution on the fiscal year 1983 budget to raise over $20 billion in taxes for fiscal year 1983. H.R. 4800 will make a very modest contribution toward that target, by raising $355 million in fiscal year 1983, but it is nevertheless a necessary and an equitable contribution. Indeed, a failure to achieve this modest tax increase, because of the objections of a few, would certainly call into question the will and ability of the House to meet the revenue goals it has established for itself as part of the budget process.

I would like to point out, too, for the benefit of those House Members who are not following the actions of the Senate Finance Committee closely, that the revenue bill passed by the Senate contains much higher aviation excise tax rates. The Senate bill will, in contrast to H.R. 4800, increase fiscal year 1983 revenues from these taxes by $813 million, more than twice the size of the tax increase in H.R. 4800 in fiscal year 1983, and substantially more over the entire period.

Finally, those opposing this rule would do so in order to propose amendments that were fully debated in the Committee on Ways and Means and were rejected. One amendment proposed to reduce the fuel tax rate on general aviation fuel from 12 cents to 8 cents. This amendment was rejected in committee on a rollcall vote by a substantial margin. An 8 cents fuel tax would reduce the tax burden on these taxpayers to a level below that paid in 1980, before the aircraft use tax and jet fuel tax expired and the aviation gasoline tax rate dropped from 7 cents to 4 cents per gallon. Another amendment would repeal all of the aviation excise taxes at the end of 1983, under the guise of forcing the Committee on Ways and Means and the Congress to act prior to that date to revise or extend these taxes. The committee also rejected this proposal. While we would fully expect to act on these taxes prior to December 31, 1983, an unavoidable failure to do so could mean as much as $1.3 billion in lost revenues for fiscal year 1984 under the proposed amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I make these points to assure my colleagues that the Committee on Ways and Means fully and fairly considered these matters. The committee's bill deserves the support of the House, and I ask for its support of the rule provided on this measure. The House has many important agenda item before it, and it is time to act expeditiously on this measure, which has been under consideration by the Committees on Ways and Means and on Public Works since last year. Every month of delay has cost the Treasury badly needed and deserve revenues.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. CLAUSEN).

Mr. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that I find myself in agreement with most of what has been said by our distinguished chairman of the Aviation Subcommittee as it relates to the need to modernize the airport and airway system. But I do have strong reservations about the rule and the manner in which it is being presented.

In particular—and this will be discussed very extensively during the debate and in the final disposition of the legislation, possibly next week—there is a substantial need for the construction of an adequate airport system in this country. As a matter of fact, we are falling behind. There is a desperate need for the establishment of an integrated airport system, with particular emphasis on providing the types of reliever airports that are very much needed in order to assure access for general aviation aircraft into metropolitan areas.

But, let me move to the reason I rise in opposition to the rule being presented, and I want to urge my colleagues to vote down the previous question on the rule. I urge them to take this action so that we can bring up amendments which would not otherwise be in order if House Resolution 489 is adopted. In its place, we intend to support an amendment in the nature of a substitute which has been alluded to, which will be offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, and which would allow separate votes on those amendments to the Ways and Means Committee tax provisions.

But, I am going to focus my remarks on the first amendment, which would decrease the general aviation fuel tax from 12 cents to 8 cents per gallon. I firmly believe that fairness and equity require that all Members of this body have an opportunity to vote separately on this important issue. As many of my colleagues are aware, much of general aviation does not—and I repeat—does not use the elaborate air traffic control and airway systems routinely used by the airline and the very sophisticated business aircraft. In spite of this, the Ways and Means Committee reported out a tax that has the potential of being three times the existing rate for gasoline, from 12 cents versus 4 cents.

I am sure the Members can understand a pilot's view that another 8 cents tacked onto the price of aviation fuel would make a pretty intolerable situation even worse, and in addition—and this is an area where we have to have some concern—there are many small business fixed-base operators who are on the marginal line today who would surely be irreparably harmed or forced to shut down if pilots refused to purchase fuel at prevailing prices.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the high price of general aviation fuel has already done severe damage to the industry by making it more difficult for our citizens to afford to fly. Deliveries of new general aviation aircraft are down markedly, and manufacturers have been forced to lay off a substantial number of workers. Therefore, I would urge my colleagues not to exacerbate the situation without submitting this issue to the full membership of the body for a separate vote.

So, Mr. Speaker, in summary, the proposed tax increase would triple the currently paid fuel tax of 4 cents per gallon, and a 12-cent tax would hurt the little guy. Business flyers, as the Members know, can deduct this as a business expense. The personal private pilot cannot.

Let me relate a little bit of my own experience, having been involved in aviation a goodly portion of my life. I can tell the Members that some 95 percent—95 percent of all aviation is general aviation, and 95 percent of them are involved in flying clubs, involved in experimental aircraft, as well as small business owners, so we are talking about a number of people that do not in fact utilize the air traffic control system being constructed essentially for the enroute traffic requirements of our air transportation system.

In addition, although the increase is justified as a user charge, I say that 95 percent of general aviation flies VFR and does not use that air traffic control system. By VFR I am talking about flying under visual flight rules and not under the instrument flight rules normally used by the airlines and business aviation.

An 8-cent-a-gallon fuel tax, which the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association incidentally indicated they would support—they have agreed to this—would make the tax twice as much as general aviation now pays for gasoline. They are willing to pay their share but see a tripling of the tax as unfair.

Mr. Speaker, I urge a vote against the previous question.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Hawaii (Mr. HEFTEL).

Mr. HEFTEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the rule that has been recommended for floor consideration of H.R. 2643, the Airport and Airway Imporvement Act of 1982. This bill represents the culmination of the cooperative efforts of the administration and three House committees, Ways and Means, Science and Technology, and Public Works and Transportation. This rule accordingly provides for the orderly consideration of a complex, long-overdue bill that deserves the full support of this body.

The redevelopment program that is funded and authorized by this legislation is urgently needed to modernize outdated and antiquated computer and other equipment in our Nation's airports. Recent events in New Orleans and at our own National Airport, whatever their causes, only serve to underscore the national urgency of this important redevelopment program. This country and this Congress, I believe, overwhelmingly support taking whatever steps are necessary to insure that our airports and airways are as safe as possible for the many millions of air travelers in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I particularly want to speak at this time in support of the Rules Committee's wise decision to provide a closed rule for the revenue provisions of the airport and airway improvement legislation that we will soon take up. These provisions, which were reported by the Ways and Means Committee in H.R. 4800, revitalize the separate airport and airway trust fund, which was allowed to expire in 1980, and establish tax levels that will insure that the trust fund is adequately funded to meet the needs of the redevelopment program.

The tax levels contained in this legislation represent the results of long and comprehensive bipartisan negotiations between Congress and the administration. H.R. 4800, the bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee, was originally sponsored by Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI, the able chairman of the committee, and Mr. CONABLE, the distinguished ranking minority member of the committee.

Moreover, the tax levels set in this bill are by no means onerous. In fact, they are generally substantially lower than the levels proposed by the President in his budget request last winter. The administration, for example, requested that the air passenger ticket tax be increased from the present level of 5 to 8 percent. The Ways and Means Committee, after careful deliberation, would continue this tax at its current 5 percent level. The administration requested that the gasoline fuel tax for general—noncommercial—aviation be raised from its present level of 4 cents per gallon to 12 cents per gallon this year, increasing to 20 cents per gallon by the end of 1986. The Ways and Means Committee would increase this tax to 12 cents per gallon.

Nevertheless, a last-minute effort was made in the Ways and Means Committee to reduce the tax levels contained in this legislation, and thereby the revenues for the trust fund. This effort, I believe, was poorly conceived and is clearly contrary to the best interests of the air travelers. of this Nation. The committee soundly defeated each of the proposals put forth during this effort. The levels reported by the Ways and Means Committee provide the necessary funding for the long-sought and long overdue improvements to our Nation's airway and airport system. Moreover, the Ways and Means Committee was careful to provide that most of the provisions of this bill will expire on December 31, 1983, to insure that Congress will thoroughly review the trust fund tax levels and projected trust fund authorizatons in advance of that deadline.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to take this opportunity to speak in support of a longstanding provision, section 4262(b) of the Internal Revenue Code, which the Ways and Means Committee voted to retain during markup of H.R. 4800. Under this provision, which was enacted 26 years ago when the air passenger ticket tax was first enacted, the air passenger ticket tax applies to all portions of commercial flights that occur over the United States up until the plane leaves and after it reenters the territorial limits of the United States. Portions of such flights that occur over water or foreign territory are subject, under H.R. 4800, to a $5 per person international departure tax in lieu of the overwater portion of the air passenger ticket tax.

Section 4262(b) was first enacted in 1956 when Congress first established the air passenger ticket tax and has existed unchallenged ever since in recognition of the unique geographic location of Hawaii and Alaska, the principal States affected by this provision. The vast distances that separate these two States from the rest of the United States, render residents of Hawaii and Alaska totally dependent upon air transportation to conduct personal business and commerce with the mainland. Section 4262(b) thus has the effect of making the boundaries of Alaska and Hawaii contiguous with the mainland United States for purposes of calculation of the air passenger ticket tax, while recognizing the distinction that exists between purely domestic flights and flights to and from these two States, which involve travel over international territory or water.

The reasons that existed in 1956 for enacting this longstanding provision are just as relevant and valid today as they were then. Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands are not subject to the overwater portion of the air passenger ticket tax, so that although Hawaii and Alaska are States, and not territories, any different treatment of flights to and from Hawaii and Alaska would clearly be inequitable. A different political status does not erase the 2,500 miles of ocean or foreign land that separates Hawaii and Alaska from the mainland United States.

Increased air fares would have a chilling effect on tourism, Hawaii's main industry, at a time when Hawaii's economy is already reeling from a drop in the world price of sugar, serious challenges from lower priced imports of agricultural products, and from the current, deep recession. However, it would be a mistake to characterize this provision as a subsidy or special tax break for tourists, wealthy or otherwise. Island residents doing business with the continental United States made up a substantial portion of the 3.1 million individuals who traveled round trip between these two locations in calendar year 1981, although exact figures are not available. Although airlines servicing Hawaii are currently experiencing a temporary fare war, transportation between the mainland and Hawaii and Alaska is exceptionally expensive, and any additional tax would only serve to further isolate these two States from the mainland United States.

Finally, flights over water to and from Hawaii and Alaska do not utilize the ground safety and support systems that are funded by the revenues collected from the air passenger ticket tax. Although such flights do take off from and land at domestic airports, the ticket tax does apply to all portions of the flights that occur over land and up until the plane leaves and after it reenters the territorial limits of the United States. Furthermore, Coast Guard or other rescue services that might be called upon to respond to any emergency that occurred over water are not funded from the airport and airway trust fund.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot have an airport and airway redevelopment program unless there are adequate revenues provided for the trust fund to finance that program. Anything short of providing the maximum in safety and comfort for the millions of Americans who use our airport and airway system each year is clearly unacceptable. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support the closed rule that the Ways and Means Committee voted in favor of by a margin of 2 to 1. The Ways and Means Committee's overwhelming support for a closed rule reflects, I believe, this Congress and this country's full support for taking whatever steps are necessary to insure that our airways and airports are as safe as possible for the traveling public.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. SNYDER).

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge my colleagues to defeat the previous question and later to support an amendment in the nature of a substitute which would make in order the three amendments heretofore discussed. First reduce general aviation fuel tax from 12 cents to 8 cents per gallon; second, terminate all user taxes on December 31, 1983; and third, modify the tax levied on commerical air transportation between Hawaii and Alaska and the coterminus United States.

On the issue of the general aviation fuel tax, I suggest to my colleagues that if we adopt House Resolution 489 as reported and go on to adopt a 12-cent-per-gallon fuel tax, we will be exacerbating an already grave situation for the general aviation industry.

According to AOPA in the first 2 months of this year, sale of Avgas was 24 percent below average. This is the lowest amount since 1960. It is especially alarming when one realizes that there are four times as many aircraft flying today.

Moreover, if an oil import tax of 8 cents per gallon is added, then general aviation users will be burdened with a tax that is three times higher than it has ever been and five times higher than it is today.

As evidence of the depressed state of the general aviation industry, the General Aviation Manufacturers Association estimates that its rate of unemployment is 38 to 40 percent. Deliveries of aircraft were down by 41 percent between 1978 and 1981 and down an additional 52.9 percent between May 1981, and May 1982. Needless to say, this is not an industry which can afford a 12-cents-per-gallon fuel tax when the price of fuel has already priced many potential pilots out of the market; that is, national average; Avgas—$1.95; Jet A—$1.71.

The second amendment which would be made in order if the gentleman from Louisiana's amendment to House Resolution 489 is adopted would terminate all aviation trust fund taxes on December 31, 1983, the date ADAP program would expire.

As reported, the ways and means tax title would provide that effective January 1, 1984, the same situation would exist as we have today; that is, a 5-percent passenger ticket tax with revenues going into the general fund and a 4 cent tax on Avgas and a tax on tires and tubes flowing into the highway trust fund.

The users have been paying O. & M. expenses through appropriations acts ($800 million in 1982) plus an additional $1.4 billion annually because the 5-percent ticket tax revenues have, since October 1, 1980, been going into the general fund. In addition, another $15 million per year has been going into the highway trust fund.

Or put another way, while aviation users are contributing substantially more to FAA operations and maintenance than ever before, they are being forced to contribute another $1.4 billion to the funding of non-aviation programs. And, to add insult to injury, there has not even been an airport development aid program since October 1, 1981. OMB has not been eager for a ADAP program. They like the idea of drawing down the trust fund while the aviation user taxes have gone with the Treasury. I submit to my colleagues that aviation users have been treated very unfairly.

Accordingly, to prevent this inequitable situation from arising in the future, I would urge my colleagues to make in order an amendment which would terminate all aviation user taxes effective December 31, 1983. If the authorization is itself renewed beyond fiscal year 1983, we would expect that the congress would act to keep all user taxes flowing into the aviation trust fund, something we would wholeheartedly support.

The final amendment which would be made in order if the gentleman's amendment to House Resolution 489 is adopted would eliminate the preferential tax treatment which Hawaii and Alaska have received on commercial air transportation.

As reported, the ways and means title treats the over-water or international portion of transportation between Alaska or Hawaii and the coterminus United States in the same manner as it treats transportation that begins or ends in a foreign country. The amendment would eliminate this situation and treat flights involving Hawaii and Alaska just the same as if they involved flights between points in the lower 48 States. According to the Joint Committee on Taxation, it would also raise $32 million in additional revenue to the trust fund beyond that generated by the Ways and Means reported version.

For the foregoing reasons, I urge my colleagues to defeat the previous question and to support an amendment to House Resolution 489 which would make these other amendments in order.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from South Dakota (Mr. DASCHLE).

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to ordering the previous question.

● Mr. ROBERTS of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to a modified closed rule on H.R. 2643/H.R. 4800, and I support the modified rule proposed by Mr. MOORE.

As my colleagues have pointed out, there is dispute as to the need to continue a holdover aviation tax, and dispute as to the size of the aviation fuel tax.

While I believe in the general concept of user fees and taxes, they must be equitable and unburdensome. I feel that the aviation fuel tax as formulated by the Ways and Means Committee is unfair to general aviation, and does little to benefit South Dakota and other rural States. Under the formula for distribution of the trust fund, the portion South Dakota and its aviators will receive, is grossly disproportionate to the amount those aviators will pay into the fund.

Open debate of the issues allows an honest evaluation of the merits of this tax plan, and I urge that my colleagues vote against the previous question and support the Moore rule.●

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, we have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 135, nays 178, not voting 121, as follows:

Mrs. Chisholm for, with Mr. Rousselot against.

Mr. Hawkins for, with Mr. Fish against.

Messrs. ALEXANDER, HOYER, COLEMAN, VOLKMER, WALGREN, and GRISHAM changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Ms. MIKULSKI and Mr. OBERSTAR changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the previous question was not ordered.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. MOORE

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. MOORE: Strike all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order, section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) to the contrary notwithstanding, to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2643) to provide for the improvement of the Nation's airport and airway system, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed four hours, one hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, one hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Science and Technology, and two hours to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Public Works and Transportation now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5, rule XXI are hereby waived, and each section of said substitute shall be considered as having been read. It shall be in order to consider the text of the amendments recommended by the Committee on Science and Technology now printed in the bill, and the text of the bill H.R. 6193 reported by that committee, if offered as amendments to said substitute. After the disposition of all other perfecting amendments to said substitute, it shall be in order to consider an amendment adding a new title to said substitute consisting of the text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means now printed in the bill H.R. 4800, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7, rule XVI and clause 5, rule XXI are hereby waived. Said amendment shall not be subject to amendment, or to a demand for a division of the question in the House or in the Committee of the Whole, except pro forma amendments for the purpose of debate, germane amendments recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means, and the following amendments: (1) amendments to said amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 16, 1982, by, and if offered by, Representative MOORE; and (2) an amendment to said amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 8, 1982, by, and if offered by Representative FRENZEL, and said amendments if offered shall not be subject to amendment, or to a demand for a division of the question in the House or in the Committee of the Whole, except pro forma amendments for the purpose of debate. Upon the disposition of said amendments, no further amendments to the bill shall be in order. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. MOORE) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate those Members of the House, my colleagues, who voted down the previous question on the rule, to now make in order three amendments to be offered to the tax portion of this bill when it comes up for consideration later next week.

The amendment to the rule which I have now offered does, as we said in debate, make in order three amendments.

First, to lower the tax on general aviation from a tripling down to a doubling, 12 cents a gallon to 8 cents.

Second, to sunset all taxes. The bill drawn by the Ways and Means Committee sunsets almost all of the taxes, but there are some carryover taxes that are not sunsetted and that do not go to general aviation but are simply put into the general fund. This has happened just because of a curious happenstance of the way these taxes were drawn over the years.

The second amendment will cause all of the taxes to be sunsetted, so the Ways and Means Committee will be starting from scratch 2 or 3 years from now to put these taxes back on again and put them into the trust fund.

The third amendment will be offered by my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL), which deals with the airline passenger ticket tax as it applies to Alaska and Hawaii.

Mr. Speaker, that is what the amendment to the rule does.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes, for the purposes of debate only, to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. FROST).

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI).

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, this legislative procedure is certainly not encouraging in terms of what might take place on the floor of the House of Representatives in the next several weeks.

What the Ways and Means Committee did, and I would like to explain this to the membership, was to modify and reduce the tax levels that the administration had proposed for raising revenue for the airport and airways system.

What has happened here is that the House has not agreed to those modifications.

I can see very clearly that, when the tax measure that the Ways and Means Committee will be considering in the next few weeks is up for debate, we are not going to get as much cooperation as we expected from the administration and from the minority.

May I say that I feel I have an obligation as Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I am trying to meet that obligation and serve this Congress by attempting to comply with the reconciliation instruction of the first budget resolution. But what is happening ultimately is that Members think we can play high political theater and not meet our responsibilities with respect to the deficits that have been incurred because Congress passed the Economic Recovery Tax Act of last year.

I just want to make this final observation—the Senate bill provides for much higher revenues from aviation taxes than does this measure. This bill is a modification of what the administration had suggested. What will happen ultimately is that when the Committee on Ways and Means bring a revenue measure in the neighborhood of $20 billion for this fiscal year to the floor, it is going to be even more painful for my colleagues, particularly those on the other side of the aisle, to support. But if I cannot expect the support of the minority and if we are going to go through the hassle of writing a bill and then not get the cooperation of this administration, I see no reason in the world why I should even reconvene the committee to consider tax legislation in the next week or two.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, in answer to my distinguished chairman, these humble amendments we are offering have nothing to do with the future of a tax bill to meet the first budget resolution. I think the chairman knows that. We offered these amendments in committee. One of them lost by one vote in the Ways and Means Committee and has no revenue implications at all.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. The very same measure passed by the Senate just last night raises much more money than does this provision.

Mr. MOORE. I say to my committee chairman that he admonishes me almost every meeting of our committee that we ought to have differences in any tax bill so that the chairman has the right to go to conference and have something to negotiate with the other body on. I do not think that is a real problem.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I agree that we ought to have negotiations and we ought to go to a conference and have differences, but, gentlemen, when we come back, I am sure that you have to recognize that the vote will be for the higher level of taxes recommended by President Ronald Reagan.

Mr. MOORE. I simply say, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that necessarily follows. We will be going to conference with a lesser figure here, one with a higher figure there, then the Members of the House will have a chance to vote on this tax and many others at a later time in a conference report or subsequent tax bill.

Let me give the gentleman an idea of how much money we are talking about. This bill that is going to be before us next week will raise $1.78 billion next year. The first amendment that this amended rule will make in order that I am going to offer lowers that by $50 million—$50 million out of $1.78 billion. That is chicken feed. Most people do not pay any attention to that minor a change.

The second amendment that I would make in order does not actually affect revenues at all. All it does is clarify what is going to be sunsetted so that we know all these taxes end on a certain date and the Ways and Means Committee does not have other taxes that are still continuing and going into the general fund.

The third amendment I will let the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) identify but that actually raises revenue and I am told even more than makes up for what my first amendment will reduce.

The chairman will be going to the conference committee actually with the same tax dollars as his bill, or perhaps even more.

Let me first yield to my colleague, the ranking member of the Aviation Subcommittee, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. SNYDER).

Mr. SNYDER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The Joint Committee on Taxation has indicated to us that the loss on the first amendment is $40 million. The gain on the Frenzel amendment is $32 million. So it is pretty much a wash, insofar as revenues are concerned.

But let me suggest to my colleagues that I think the critical amendment is the one that lets the taxes expire when the program expires. I bet most of you sitting here probably think that ticket tax on your airline tickets is going into the airport trust fund today, but it is not, because when the program expired that allowed the reduced ticket tax to go into General Treasury; $1.4 billion annually is collected under the pretense of going into the trust fund but it is not. It goes into general revenues. OMB loves it the way it is. That is the reason why we have not had an airport development aid program for a couple of years. They did not want one. They are able to draw down out of the trust fund and let the revenues go into General Treasury. The only way we can preserve the program in the days ahead, if you want a trust fund from ticket taxes and some other aviation related taxes to go for the development of the airport system as it has in these recent years, is to allow that tax to expire when the program expires. Do not let it funnel over into general revenues, which is what any administration would like when they have deficits. We have had no program now for over a year. We got the last one in the reconciliation bill. It expired over a year ago. The money has been going into general revenues, not into the trust fund, and that is what we do not want to happen when this authorization expires. We want to say when the authorization expires, the tax expires, and if you want another authorization then come on let us put one together and levy the taxes for the trust fund at that time.

It only makes good sense for the aviation community across the country and for every community that is supportive of this program.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, one of the two amendments that I will be offering that the amended rule will make in order, as just indicated, does nothing more than reduce from a tripling down to a doubling of the tax on private aircraft owners and pilots. I think that is equity. We are only talking about $50 million out of $1.78 billion. That is inconsequential.

The second amendment is the one the gentleman from Kentucky was just talking about, the one that failed by one vote in the Ways and Means Committee. That one will see to it that we do not keep ourselves in a box, that OMB Directors under President Carter, since I have been in Congress, and President Reagan, have put us in. That box is that taxes go in the trust fund and they sit and they are not spent for airport safety. Almost every airport in the country except the 35 largest need additional safety equipment. It is not allowed to be spent by OMB but the money just collects and sits there.

Even with the two amendments that I am offering there will be over a $2 billion balance in the trust fund when this authorization bill ends. So it is not like we are cutting back on the authorization, we are more than funding the authorization bill. There will be $2 billion left there when it is finished.

Mr. Speaker, there is no excuse for continuing to raise taxes like that beyond that.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment and on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. MOORE).

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution, as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5203, FEDERAL INSECTICIDE, FUNGICIDE, AND RODENTICIDE ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1982

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 528 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H.R. 5203

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5203) to amend the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Agriculture now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule and each section shall be considered as having been read. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. QUILLEN), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 528 is the rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 5203, the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1982. This is a straight open rule allowing any germane amendment to be offered under the 5-minute rule. There are no waivers of points of order. The rule provides 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture. It is in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Agriculture now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule, and each section shall be considered as having been read. Upon conclusion of the bill, one motion to recommit with or without instructions will be in order.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5203 extends the authorization for appropriations under the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act through September 30, 1984. The bill also contains a number of amendments to the act which were adopted by the committee after several days of markup sessions and extensive hearings.

The bill covers a wide variety of issues, several of which are controversial, which I am sure will be thoroughly debated by the House during consideration of the legislation. Among the major amendments to the act are changes in the procedures used by the EPA in registering pesticides; additional provisions to current law to protect pesticide manufacturers' trade secrets and research data; changes in the States' authority to regulate the sale or use of federally registered pesticides; and new protections for agricultural workers. To carry out the purposes of these amendments and the act, H.R. 5203 authorizes $56.3 million for fiscal year 1983 and $59.7 million for fiscal year 1984.

Mr. Speaker, although several provisions in the legislation have engendered considerable debate, I know of no opposition to this open rule. I urge my colleagues to adopt House Resolution 528 so that the House may consider H.R. 5203.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use.

(Mr. QUILLEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, there is no controversy on the rule that I have heard about. It is a good rule. It is merely an extension of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act with some modifications, much needed modifications.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WAMPLER).

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this rule providing for consideration of H.R. 5203, the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1982.

These amendments to FIFRA are not without controversy, but I have every confidence that Members in debating the issues will be able to resolve the controversial matters and produce a piece of legislation that can be signed into law by the President.

In that regard, I am sure there are Members in this Chamber who may have been advised that the administration may well oppose House passage of H.R. 5203 unless it is amended to delete section 11 of the bill, which deals with the authority of States and amends the authorization to reduce funding for EPA. I have not seen a signed letter from the administration indicating a final administration position and I should like to state that although I was told the administration opposed this provision on the day that the Rules Committee considered the request for a rule, I have since learned that the matter is still under active review at the Office of Management and Budget, and so it would be my recommendation that we proceed in an orderly fashion to consider the merits of this legislation and at a later time we can expect to hear from the administration on its position on the bill.

I will not take further time to explain the various features of this legislation, leaving that task to be dealt with when the general debate takes place.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge adoption of this rule so that we may consider the amendments to FIFRA that are vital to securing a workable law for pesticides.

[From the Washington Post, July 22, 1982]

PESTICIDES AND FEDERALISM

If you're worried that the stuff you spray around you garden or kitchen might be killing something other than bugs and germs, you might want to pay some attention to the reauthorization of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act (the ultimate government acronym: FIFRA—just try to say it). Amendments being recommended by the House Agriculture Committee could give you additional reason for concern.

At the urging of the chemical industry, the committee would make it much harder for states to set more stringent controls on pesticide use than those set by the federal government. Until now, FIFRA policy has followed the general pattern of other health, safety and environment legislation—federal law sets minimum standards, but also allows states to set stricter requirements if they see fit.

Few states have seen the need—or been willing to devote the substantial resources—to go beyond the minimum standards set by the Environmental Protection Agency for registering pesticide products. A notable exception is California, which set up a full-scale review process a few years ago and rapidly built up a large backlog of unprocessed registrations. Chemical manufacturers were understandably irked by long delays. They were also bothered by California's requests for expensive additional data on product safety and usefulness—although such requests were made in only a small percentage of cases.

Businesses can to to court to contest state actions that seem arbitrary or capricious or greatly disrupt the flow of interstate commerce. But lawsuits are expensive and time-consuming, and the industry wants Congress to require states to process registrations promptly and get EPA approval for requests for additional data on products—other than agricultural products of specific local concern.

California admits that, until it recently increased staff and simplified the review process, its program was inefficient. But the state also points to many cases in which it—and other states—have been well ahead of EPA in pointing out substantial public health hazards. The National Association of State Departments of Agriculture and a broad array of health, environmental and labor groups also question the wisdom of restricting state initiative in an area of traditional concern. The administration opposes the idea not only because EPA already has too much to do, but also because the new restriction would be so clear a contradiction of its emphasis on giving states more control over their affairs.

There are good reasons not to build unneeded bureaucratic obstacles to prompt review of new chemical products; many of them may be both more efficacious and safer than the ones they replace. But the people of a state also have the right to insist on higher standards in matters that concern them. If the California government opts for an overzealous approach, citizens of the state will pay the price of worm-ridden gardens and germ-infested toilet bowls—and they will surely take their case to the state legislature. And there—not in Congress—is where the matter belongs.

CHEMICAL SPECIALTIES MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., July 23, 1982.

MS. MEG GREENFIELD,

DEAR MS. GREENFIELD: The Chemical Specialties Manufacturers Association (CSMA) takes exception to the factual inaccuracies and the misleading implications contained in your July 22, 1982 editorial concerning household pesticides. CSMA represents over 425 firms, many of which manufacture non-agricultural pesticides including disinfectants and sanitizers; home, lawn and garden insecticides; and a wide variety of other pesticide products for home, industrial and institutional uses.

Each and every one of these products is rigorously reviewed at the federal level by the EPA under the requirements of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA). Manufacturers are required to test products extensively to meet very strict health and safety standards before EPA permits a new product to be marketed. The development and collection of these data to support a federal registration can take from four to six years and can cost manfacturers up to four million dollars. You can not categorize and summarily dismiss these federal safeguards by referring to them as "minimum requirements".

The specific amendment to FIFRA contained in Section 11 of H.R. 5203, now being considered in the House of Representatives, is intended to correct a problem which now exists in the State of California, but has the potential for developing in a number of other states. It can not be solved by the actions of a single state legislature.

Contrary to the statements in the editorial, some 80-85 percent of applications for registration have been affected by the State of California's policy of requiring the development of new data and additional review of existing data on the same products already registered by EPA and most other states. This does not represent a "small percentage."

Further, the amendment does not require EPA approval for requests for additional data, it merely allows the EPA to review a state request for additional data when the applicant for a registration believes that the request is arbitrary or capricious. The amendment maintains precisely the same authority the states now have. It permits each state to request additional data above and beyond the EPA requirements. No state is prevented from regulating the sale or use of a pesticide, and may at all times exercise its right to deny, to ban, to suspend or to cancel the registration of a product.

Finally, the implication that household pesticide products, including disinfectants, sanitizers, cleansers, etc., can harm people under normal conditions of use is inflammatory and misleading. No state, including California, has ever substantiated any situation where these products have been found to present a substantial public health hazard. This kind of careless statement regarding products which greatly contribute to public health and convenience is completely irrelevant to the legislative issues under consideration.

Sincerely,

RALPH ENGEL,
President.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN).

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, I basically support the FIFRA bill and the rule that we have provided for the FIFRA bill.

I wanted to take this time to alert Members of an amendment that I will be offering when the FIFRA bill comes on the floor next week. That amendment will be to strike section 11 of H.R. 5203. Basically, what section 11 does right now is it transforms a very simple four line provision authorizing States to establish a pesticide program stricter than the Federal program. It takes that simple four line provision that we have had in the FIFRA bill since 1972 and it changes it into a very complex, convaluted administrative nightmare that requires 137 lines to describe.

Congress has repeatedly in the past supported the authority of States to impose health, safety, and environmental standards tailored to local needs.

In addition to FIFRA, such flexibility is contained in the Clean Air Act, the Occupational Safety and Health Act, the Surface Mining Reclamation and Control Act, the Natural Gas Pipeline Safety Act, and the Flammable Fabrics Statutes.

Current State authority, section 24(A) of FIFRA to regulate federally registered pesticides was established, as I said, in the 1972 amendments. Since that time administrations of both parties have upheld this approach to State-Federal interactions in the pesticide regulations.

In a recent letter to the Agriculture Committee, the Environmental Protection Agency reaffirmed the Reagan administration's support of current law and strong opposition to section 11 of H.R. 5203.

Basically, the issue we are dealing with is whether or not a State can fashion its own pesticide regulations to its own individual needs. What we have is the Federal law and we say if the States want to tailor a law specific to their needs, that may be stricter than the Federal law, they are allowed to do so.

As I said, the administration has a statement of their policy. It is said that the administration opposes passage of this bill unless section 11 is deleted.

I would point out that the administration is not alone in opposing section 11. My amendment is also supported by the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture; the AFL-CIO; United Farmworkers; Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers; International Chemical Workers; and Bakery, Confectionery, and Tobacco Workers International. Joining labor and the administration in opposing these provisions are public interest groups representing a wide range of concerns including: March of Dimes; American Public Health Association; National Wildlife Federation; Friends of the Earth; National Audubon Society; Migrant Legal Action; Consumer Federation of America; and the National Coalition Against the Misuse of Pesticides.

These all support the continuation of the present law that we have, which is to allow the States to tailor their own pesticide regulations to their own needs.

I wanted to alert Members to this amendment that I am sure will be debated at length next week and to urge your support of deleting section 11 from the FIFRA bill as it is now written.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 301, nays 2, answered "present" 1, not voting 130, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NOTIFICATION TO SEEK RESTRICTIVE RULE

Mr. FORD of Michigan. This is to notify Members that when the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service appears before the Committee on Rules to request a rule for the consideration of the bill H.R. 6785, I may seek a rule which limits amendments. However, I will ask that the rule permit an amendment placing a 4-percent cap on cost-of-living adjustments for civil service, Foreign Service, and military retirees.

PERMISSION TO FILE CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 2332, ENERGY POLICY AND CONSERVATION ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the managers may have until midnight tonight to file the conference report on the Senate bill (S. 2332) to amend the Energy Policy and Conservation Act to extend certain authorities relating to the International Energy Program, to provide for the Nation's energy emergency preparedness, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. No. 97-663)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2332) to amend the Energy Policy and Conservation Act to extend certain authorities relating to the International Energy Program, to provide for the Nation's energy emergency preparedness, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the text of the bill and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Energy Emergency Preparedness Act of 1982".

SEC. 2. INTERNATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM AMENDMENTS.

(a) EXTENSION.—Subsection (j) of section 252 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. 6272(j)) is amended by striking out "August 1, 1982" and inserting in lieu thereof "at midnight December 31, 1983".

(b) LIMITATIONS.—(1) Section 251 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. 6271) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) No rule under this section may be put into effect unless—

"(1) an international energy supply emergency, as defined in the first sentence of section 252(1)(1), is in effect; and

"(2) the allocation of available oil referred to in chapter III of the international energy program has been activated pursuant to chapter IV of such program.".

(2) Section 252 of such Act (42 U.S.C. 6272) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(m) The authority granted by this section shall apply only to the development or carrying out of voluntary agreements and plans of action to implement chapters III, IV, and V of the international energy program.".

SEC. 3. ENERGY EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Title II of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act, relating to standby energy authorities, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new part:

"PART C—ENERGY EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

"CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS, POLICY, AND PURPOSE

"SEC. 271. (a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

"(1) a shortage of petroleum products caused by reductions in imports of petroleum products may occur at any time;

"(2) such a shortage may be sufficiently large to cause severe economic dislocations and hardships, or constitute a serious threat to public health, safety, and welfare; and

"(3) prior to the occurrence of such a shortage, the Federal Government has a responsibility to be prepared to mitigate the adverse impacts of such a shortage as a supplement to reliance on free market pricing and allocation of available petroleum product supplies.

"(b) POLICY.—The Congress declares that it shall be the policy of the United States that the Federal Government shall be prepared prior to any shortage of petroleum products to respond to energy emergencies, pursuant to authorities under provisions of law other than this part, as a supplement to reliance on the free market to mitigate the adverse impacts of a shortage of petroleum products on public health, safety, and welfare.

"(c) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this part is to carry out the policy in subsection (b) by providing for the preparation of comprehensive energy emergency response procedures to be available for use by the President under authorities contained in any provision of law other than this part.

"PREPARATION FOR PETROLEUM SUPPLY INTERRUPTIONS

"SEC. 272. (a) DESCRIPTION OF AVAILABLE LEGAL AUTHORITIES.—(1) The President shall submit to the Congress no later than November 15, 1982, a memorandum of law which describes the nature and extent of the authorities available to the President under existing law to respond to a severe energy supply interruption or other substantial reduction in the amount of petroleum products available to the United States.

"(2) The memorandum of law required by paragraph (1) shall be prepared by the Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Energy.

"(3) The memorandum of law submitted to the Congress pursuant to this subsection shall—

"(A) include the following subjects—

"(i) activities of the United States in support of the international energy program and the December 10, 1981, International Energy Agency agreement entitled 'Decision on Preparation for Future Supply Disruptions' including—

"(I) the National Emergency Sharing Organization;

"(II) emergency sharing systems; and

"(III) the supply right project;

"(ii) activities of the United States pursuant to its energy emergency preparedness obligations to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization;

"(iii) development and use of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve;

"(iv) Government incentives to encourage private petroleum product stocks;

"(v) reactivation of the following Executive Manpower Reserves:

"(I) the Emergency Electric Power Reserve;

"(II) the Emergency Petroleum and Gas Reserve; and

"(III) the Emergency Solid Fuels Reserve;

"(vi) energy emergency response management in coordination with State and local governments; and

"(vii) emergency public information activities; and

"(B) distinguish among——

"(i) situations involving limited or general war, international tensions that threaten national security, and other Presidentially declared emergencies;

"(ii) events resulting in activation of the international energy program; and

"(iii) events or situations less severe than those described in clauses (i) and (ii).

"(b) COMPREHENSIVE ENERGY EMERGENCY RESPONSE PROCEDURES. —(1) Not later than December 31, 1982, the President shall submit to the Congress comprehensive energy emergency response procedures for implementation, in whole or in part, of the authorities described under subsection (a).

"(2) The comprehensive energy emergency response procedures shall—

"(A) describe the various options the President would consider using to implement the authorities described in the memorandum of law submitted under subsection (a) to respond to a severe energy supply interruption or other substantial reduction in the amount of petroleum products available to the United States, including a description of the likely sequence in which such options would be taken;

"(B) specify how appropriate governmental actions in response to international and domestic energy shortages would be slected and implemented under such options, particularly which official or governmental entity would select and implement such actions, and what procedures would be used in doing so; and

"(C) recommend any additional statutory authority the President considers necessary to respond to a severe energy supply interruption or other substantial reduction in the amount of petroleum products available to the United States.

"(c) DISCLAIMERS.—(1) Nothing in this part, or in the comprehensive energy emergency response procedures submitted pursuant to subsection (b), shall—

"(A) limit the authority of the President under any provision of law to respond to a reduction in the amount of petroleum products available to the United States; or

"(B) grant any authority to the President to respond to a reduction in the amount of petroleum products available to the United States.

"(2) No State law or State program in effect on the date of the enactment of this part, or which may become effective thereafter, shall be construed to be superseded by any provision of this part.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT. —The table of contents for the Energy Policy and Conservation Act is amended by adding after the item relating to section 255 the following new items:

"PART C—ENERGY EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESSAS6343

"Sec. 271. Congressional findings, policy, and purpose.

"Sec. 272. Preparation for petroleum supply interruptions.".

SEC. 4. STRATEGIC PETROLEUM RESERVE AMENDMENTS.

(a) REQUIRED RATE FOR FILLING RESERVE.—(1) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (c) of section 160 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. 6240(c)) is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1)(A) The President shall immediately undertake, and thereafter continue, petroleum products acquisition, transportation, and injection activities, to the extent funds are available pursuant to section 167(b)(2) and (b)(3), at a level sufficient to assure that the petroleum products in the Strategic Petroleum Reserve will be increased at an average annual rate of at least the minimum required fill rate until the quantity of petroleum products stored within the Strategic Petroleum Reserve is at least 500,000,000 barrels.

"(B) Subject to subparagraph (C), the minimum required fill rate shall be 300,000 barrels per day for purposes of subparagraph (A), unless there is in effect a finding by the President in his discretion for good cause that compliance with such rate would not be in the national interest. Any finding by the President under this subparagraph takes effect on the date such finding is trasmitted to the Congress and ceases to have effect at the end of the fiscal year in which such finding was made. Any such finding trasmitted to the Congress shall include a statement of the facts upon which the finding is based. Any such finding shall not be subject to judicial review.

"(C) The minimum required fill rate shall be 220,000 barrels per day for purposes of subparagraph (A) during the period in which any finding by the President under subparagraph (B) is in effect.

"(D)(i) If funds are available in any given fiscal year after fiscal year 1982 to achieve an average annual fill rate higher than the minimum required fill rate in effect under subparagraph (C), the minimum required fill rate shall be the highest practicable fill rate achievable, subject to the availability of appropriated funds.

"(ii) The Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (31 U.S.C. 1400 and following) shall apply to funds made available under section 167 (b) and (e).

"(2) After the Strategic Petroleum Reserve reaches a level of 500,000,000 barrels, the President shall immediately seek to undertake, and thereafter continue, petroleum products acquisition, transportation, and injection activities at a level sufficient to assure that the petroleum products in the Strategic Petroleum Reserve will be increased at an average annual rate of at least 300,000 barrels per day until the quantity of petroleum products stored within the Strategic Petroleum Reserve is at least 750,000,000 barrels.".

(2) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall take effect July 1, 1982.

(b) INTERIM STORAGE.—

(1) AUTHORITY FOR IMPLEMENTATION.— Section 159(f) of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. 6239(f)) is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (3), by striking out the comma at the end of paragraph (4) and inserting "; and " in lieu thereof, and by inserting after paragraph (4) the following new paragraph:

"(5) the storage of petroleum products in interim storage facilities,".

(2) USE OF SPR PETROLEUM ACCOUNT; CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—(A) Section 167 of such Act (95 Stat. 619; to be codified at 42 U.S.C. 6247) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(e)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), nothing in this part shall be construed to limit the Account from being used to meet expenses relating to interim storage facilities for the storage of petroleum products for the Strategic Petroleum Reserve.

"(2) In any fiscal year, amounts in the Account may not be obligated for expenses relating to interim storage facilities in excess of 10 percent of the total amounts in the Account obligated in such fiscal year. If the amount obligated in any fiscal year for interim storage expenses is less than the amount of the 10-percent limit under the preceding sentence for that fiscal year, then the amount of the 10-percent limit applicable in the following fiscal year shall be increased by the amount by which the limit exceeded the amount obligated for such expenses.'.

(B) Section 159 of such Act (42 U.S.C. 6239) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h)(1) No amendment to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve Plan relating to interim storage facilities shall be required prior to the storage of petroleum products in such facilities.

"(2) Petroleum products stored in interim storage facilities pursuant to this part shall be considered to be in storage in the Reserve.

"(3)(A) No action relating to the storage of petroleum products in existing interim storage facilities in the Reserve shall be deemed to be 'a major Federal action significantly affecting the quality of the human environment' within the meaning of that term as it is used in section 102(2)(C) of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969.

"(B) For purposes of this paragraph, an interim storage facility shall be considered to be an existing interim storage facility if it—

"(i) is in existence on July 1, 1982;

"(ii) was constructed in a manner appropriate for storing petroleum products; and

"(iii) is not modified after July 1, 1982, in any manner which substantially increases the storage capacity of the facility. Any modification of such facility may not include replacement or reconstruction.

"(4) The term 'interim storage facilities', when used in this part, may include any vessel which meets the applicable requirements under this part.".

(C) Section 160(e)(4) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 6240(e)(4)) is amended by striking out "crude oil" and inserting in lieu thereof "petroleum product".

(c) STRATEGIC PETROLEUM RESERVE DRAWDOWN PLAN.—On or before December 1, 1982, the President shall transmit to the Congress a drawdown plan for the Strategic Petroleum Reserve consistent with the requirements of section 154 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act. Such plan shall be transmitted to the Congress as an amendment to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve Plan. Such amendment shall take effect on the date it is transmitted to the Congress and shall not be subject to section 159(e) of such Act relating to Congressional review. Subsequent amendments to such plan shall be in accordance with subsections (d) and (e) of such section 159.

SEC. 5. CONTINUATION OF PETROLEUM PRODUCT INFORMATION COLLECTION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Part A of title V of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. 6381 and following) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"PETROLEUM PRODUCT INFORMATION

"SEC. 507. The President or his delegate shall, pursuant to authority otherwise available to the President or his delegate under any other provision of law, collect information on the pricing, supply, and distribution of pertroleum products by product category at the wholesale and retail levels, on a State-by-State basis, which was collected as of September 1, 1981, by the Energy Information Administration.".

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of contents for such Act is amended by inserting the following new item after the item relating to section 506:

"Sec. 507. Petroleum product information.".

SEC. 6. REPORTS TO CONGRESS ON PETROLEUM SUPPLY INTERRUPTIONS.

(a) IMPACT ANALYSIS.—(1) The Secretary of Energy shall analyze the impact on the domestic economy and on consumers in the United States of reliance on market allocation and pricing during any substantial reduction in the amount of petroleum products available to the United States. In making such analysis, the Secretary of Energy may consult with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and the heads of other appropriate Federal agencies. Such analysis shall—

(A) examine the equity and efficiency of such reliance,

(B) distinguish between the impacts of such reliance on various categories of business (including small business and agriculture) and on households of different income levels,

(C) specify the nature and administration of monetary and fiscal policies that would be followed including emergency tax cuts, emergency block grants, and emergency supplements to income maintenance programs, and

(D) describe the likely impact on the distribution of petroleum products of State and local laws and regulations (including emergency authorities) affecting the distribution of petroleum products.

Such analysis shall include projections of the effect of the petroleum supply reduction on the price of motor gasoline, home heating oil, and diesel fuel, and on Federal tax revenues, Federal royalty receipts, and State and local tax revenues.

(2) Within one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Energy shall submit a report to the Congress and the President containing the analysis required by this subsection, including a detailed step-by-step description of the procedures by which the policies specified in paragraph (1)(C) would be accomplished in an emergency, along with such recommendations as the Secretary of Energy deems appropriate.

(b) STRATEGIC PETROLEUM RESERVE DRAWDOWN AND DISTRIBUTION REPORT.—The President shall prepare and transmit to the Congress, at the time he transmits the drawdown plan pursuant to section 4(c), a report containing—

(1) a description of the foreseeable situations (including selective and general embargoes, sabotage, war, act of God, or accident) which could result in a severe energy supply interruption or obligations of the United States arising under the international energy program necessitating distributions from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, and

(2) a description of the strategy or alternative strategies of distribution which could reasonably be used to respond to each situation described under paragraph (1), together with the theory and justification underlying each such strategy.

The description of each strategy under paragraph (2) shall include an explanation of the methods which would likely be used to determine the price and distribution of petroleum products from the Reserve in any such distribution, and an explanation of the disposition of revenues arising from sales of any such petroleum products under the strategy.

(c) REGIONAL RESERVE REPORT.—The President or his delegate shall submit to the Congress no later than December 31, 1982, a report regarding the actions taken to comply with the provisions of section 157 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. 6237). Such report shall include an analysis of the economic benefits and costs of establishing Regional Petroleum Reserves, including—

(1) an assessment of the ability to transport petroleum products to refiners, distributors, and end users within the regions specified in section 157(a) of such Act;

(2) the comparative costs of creating and operating Regional Petroleum Reserves for such regions as compared to the costs of continuing current plans for the Strategic Petroleum Reserve; and

(3) a list of potential sites for Regional Petroleum Reserves.

(d) STRATEGIC ALCOHOL FUEL RESERVE REPORT.—The Secretary of Energy shall, in consultation with the Secretary of Agriculture, prepare and transmit to the Congress no later than December 31, 1982, a study of the potential for establishing a Strategic Alcohol Fuel Reserve.

(e) MEANING OF TERMS.—As used in this section, the terms, "international energy program", "petroleum product", "Reserve", "severe energy supply interruption", and "Strategic Petroleum Reserve" have the meanings given such terms in sections 3 and 152 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. 6202 and 6232).

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the title of the bill.

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2332) to amend the Energy Policy and Conservation Act to extend certain authorities relating to the International Energy Program, to provide for the Nation's energy emergency preparedness, and for other purposes, submit the following joint statement to the House and the Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendment to the text of the bill struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and inserted a substitute text.

The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House with an amendment which is a substitute for the Senate bill and the House amendment. The differences between the Senate bill, the House amendment, and the substitute agreed to in conference are noted below, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by agreements reached by the conferees, and minor drafting and clarifying changes.

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

This section provides that the Act may be cited as the "Energy Emergency Preparedness Act of 1982".

SECTION 2. INTERNATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM AMENDMENTS

Extension

Subsection (a) amends section 252(j) of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (EPCA) (42 U.S.C. 6272(j)) to extend from August 1, 1982, to December 31, 1983, the expiration date of section 252. That section authorizes U.S. oil companies to participate in voluntary agreements for implementing the allocation and information provisions of the Agreement on an International Energy Program (IEP). That program provides a mechanism for an oil allocation system to be utilized by the participating countries in the event of a major oil supply disruption by the countries which participate in the International Energy Agency (IEA). Section 252 also provides a limited defense against antitrust suits that may be brought against United States oil companies participating in the IEP.

Limitations

The conferees adopted the substance of the Senate bill's provisions but made various modifications. In paragraph (1) of new section 251(e) of EPCA the phrase "or remain in effect" was deleted. This change was made for two reasons. First, it was necessary to make clear that upon official deactivation of the IEP emergency sharing system, any rule or order previously issued under section 251 would continue to be enforced to ensure that it is carried out effectively and equitably. Second, the deletion was necessary to foreclose an interpretation of the language leading to the conclusion that all activities relating to implementation of a rule or order would be terminated instantly upon deactivation of the IEP allocation measures. The deletion was made in recognition of the fact that it may be necessary to continue certain types of activities following deactivation of the IEP emergency sharing system. For example, it is possible that mandatory oil supply transactions might be needed after deactivation to satisfy allocation obligations previously incurred during the operation of the system, or to make allocation adjustments after the receipt of additional data. It also may be necessary to make adjustments in the supplies of participating U.S. oil companies to distribute equitably the burdens of participating in the IEP emergency sharing system.

The language of paragraph (2) of new section 251(e) of EPCA was changed in its entirety to make more specific the intent of the conferees that "the measures provided for under Chapter III" referred to in the Senate bill were those measures regarding "the allocation of available oil". The amendment of sections 251 and 252 was undertaken to preclude any misinterpretation of the scope of the authority conferred by those sections. Accordingly, the new subsection (e) of section 251 provides that no rule under such section may be put into effect unless an "international energy supply emergency" is in effect and the oil allocation measures referred to in Chapter III of the IEP have been activated pursuant to Chapter IV. It is the intent of the conferees that section 251 provide only the authority necessary to require oil companies to take actions to fulfill the international oil allocation obligations of the United States under Chapters III and IV of the IEP. The international allocations of oil under Chapters III and IV only can be activated when the group of participating countries as a whole or an individual IEA country sustains a minimum 7 percent reduction in base period oil consumption. Thus, section 251 provides no legal basis for ordering United States oil companies to participate in any oil sharing activities prior to activation of the IEP emergency sharing system.

Section 252 of EPCA is amended by adding a new subsection (m), which expressly limits the authority of section 252 to actions taken to implement the allocation and information provisions of the IEP, contained in Chapters III, IV, and V. The intent of the conferees is to ensure that the antitrust defense contained in section 252 cannot be extended to activities not within the allocation and information provisions of the IEP as originally signed by the United States in 1974. Thus, the antitrust defense would not apply to any actions taken by United States oil companies in response to so-called "subcrisis" supply disruptions, if such actions were not also authorized by Chapters III, IV, or V of the IEP. A subcrisis supply disruption is one that is less than the 7 percent shortfall in base period oil consumption necessary to activate the IEP emergency sharing system.

SECTION 3. ENERGY EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

in general

Section 3(a) amends Title II of EPCA, which relates to standby energy authorities, by adding at the end thereof a new part regarding Energy Emergency Preparedness.

Congressional findings, policy, and purpose (Sec. 271)

The conferees adopted the Senate provisions regarding findings (sec. 271(a)), policy (sec. 271(b)), and purpose (sec. 271(c)), after making several modifications and conforming changes.

Preparation for petroleum supply interruptions (Sec. 272)

Description of Available Legal Authorities: A new section 272(a) of EPCA requires the President by November 15, 1982, to submit to the Congress a memorandum of law describing the nature and extent of the authorities under existing law available to the President for his use in responding to a severe energy supply interruption or other substantial reduction in the amount of petroleum products available to the United States. The memorandum of law must be prepared by the Attorney General in consultation with the Secretary of Energy.

The conferees adopted the Senate provision requiring that the memorandum of law submitted to the Congress address several of the subject areas or programs currently being reviewed or developed by the Department of Energy.

Comprehensive energy emergency response procedures

A new section 272(b) of EPCA directs the President to submit to the Congress no later than December 31, 1982, comprehensive energy emergency response procedures which the President would consider using to implement the authorities described in the memorandum of law under subsection (a) in responding to a severe energy supply interruption or other substantial reduction in the amount of petroleum products available to the United States. The procedures submitted by the President must include a description of the likely sequence in which they would be undertaken.

The principal modification to Part C of Title II made by the conferees was the addition of disclaimer language in section 272(c). This language makes clear the intent of the conferees that Part C of Title II neither confers additional authority on the President, nor limits his authority under any provision of law, in responding to reductions in petroleum supply availability to the United States. Additionally, section 272(c) makes clear the intent of the conferees that the provisions of Part C would not in any fashion preempt state laws or programs already in effect or which would become effective after enactment of this Part. The authorities of the states to enact laws in anticipation of, or in response to, energy emergencies remain unaffected by this legislation.

SECTION 4. STRATEGIC PETROLEUM RESERVE AMENDMENTS

Section 4 amends sections 159, 160, and 167 of EPCA.

Required rate for filling reserve

Section 4(a) amends section 160(c)(1) of EPCA to require the President to fill the SPR at an average annual rate of at least the minimum required fill rate until 500 million barrels are in storage. The minimum required fill rate will be determined in one of three ways.

Subparagraph (B) establishes the minimum required fill rate of 300,000 barrels per day. Under this subparagraph, the President may make a finding that compliance with the 300,000 barrel per day rate would not be in the national interest for good cause. For instance, the President may find that:

(i) compliance with such rate significantly impairs the ability of the United States to respond to a severe energy supply interruption;

(ii) compliance significantly impairs the ability of the United States to meet its obligations under the international energy program; or

(iii) compliance is inappropriate due to economic conditions affecting the general welfare.

If he makes such a finding and transmits it to Congress, accompanied by a statement of the facts upon which the finding is based, the minimum required fill rate shall be 220,000 barrels per day, as required by subparagraph (C).

Subparagraph (D) establishes the minimum required fill rate that would be in effect where funds are available in any given fiscal year after fiscal year 1982 to achieve an average annual fill rate higher than the minimum required fill rate in effect under subparagraph (C). In such cases, the minimum required fill rate shall be the highest practicable fill rate achievable subject to the availability of appropriated funds.

Appropriation Acts will necessarily govern the availability of funds. The purpose of subparagraph (D) is to express the policy that the President shall fill the SPR at the highest practicable fill rate achievable subject to the availability of funds.

The use of the term "annual" in subsection (c) is intended to refer to the fiscal year.

Interim Storage

Section 4(b) clarifies the authority of the Secretary of Energy to take various actions (i.e., promulgate rules, enter into contracts, acquire storage space or land, purchase oil, etc.) in order to store oil in interim storage facilities. This section also allows the use of up to 10 percent of the SPR Petroleum Account obligated in each fiscal year for expenses relating to storage of SPR oil in interim storage facilities. If the amount obligated for interim storage in a particular fiscal year is less than the 10 percent allowed by this provision, then the following fiscal year's 10 percent limit is increased by the dollar amount of the carryover from the previous year.

Further, this section provides that any action relating to the interim storage of oil in any existing facility is not deemed to be a "major Federal action significantly affecting the quality of the human environment" under the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA). An existing facility for interim storage is a facility which was in existence on July 1, 1982; was constructed in a manner appropriate for storing petroleum products; and is not modified after July 1, 1982, in a manner which substantially increases the storage capacity of the facility. The term "interim storage facility" specifically allows the use of vessels which meet the applicable requirements under this part. It is the intent of the conferees that the NEPA waiver for vessels will be allowed only if the vessels meet the requirements of new section 159(h)(3) of EPCA. It would not be expected that a container cargo freighter or a fishing vessel would meet such requirements. Although the conference agreement permits some modification of the facilities used for such interim storage, it is not contemplated that replacement or reconstruction of such facilities would be permitted without NEPA compliance.

The conferees intend that the Department of Energy, in determining the type of facilities to be used for the interim storage of petroleum products in the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, shall consider floating storage as well as on-shore storage. Furthermore, the conferees recognize the extreme importance of maintaining a cost-effective, secure, and ready Reserve and therefore expect that the use of interim storage facilities to supplement existing permanent storage shall be undertaken in such a fashion to ensure that interim storage costs are minimized and that adequate security measures are employed. For example, to the extent that the Department chooses to employ vessels for interim storage, the conferees expect that the Department will consider the security aspects of using U.S. crews on such vessels.

There are widely differing estimates of the costs of expanding the permanent storage capacity of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve through the construction of new, above-ground, steel tank storage. The conferees expect the Department of Energy to review the estimated cost of steel tank storage and to analyze the impact on the economy of Federal expenditures for such steel tank storage.

Strategic petroleum reserve drawdown plan

Section 4(c) requires that the President transmit to Congress no later than December 1, 1982, a drawdown plan for the SPR consistent with the requirements of section 154 of EPCA. Such plan is to be transmitted to the Congress as an amendment to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve Plan and be subject to EPCA and any requirements for regional hearings. However, the amendment shall take effect on the date it is transmitted and not be subject to the Congressional review period which would otherwise be required by section 551(c), In addition, the amendment shall not be subject to section 159(e) relating to Congressional approval or disapproval of amendments to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve Plan. However, amendments to the plan made after the submission required by this subsection shall be in accordance with sections 159(d) and (e).

SECTION 5. CONTINUATION OF PETROLEUM PRODUCT INFORMATION COLLECTION

Section 5(a) amends Part A of title V of EPCA by adding at the end thereof a new section 507 regarding the collection of petroleum product information.

The conferees adopted the provision in the House bill with one modification. As a result, "product category" was added as another specification for the type of information to be collected. The conferees added the following language to the end of the provision: "which was collected as of September 1, 1981, by the Energy Information Administration." This language is intended by the conferees to serve as the means for determining the particular types of product categories to be collected, and for resolving other issues pertaining to the scope and level of detail of the required information. Further, it is intended that the information to be collected under the authority of this section will be collected by the Administrator of the Energy Information Administration.

The conferees expect that end-use information will be collected and published for the residential, commercial, industrial, and utility sectors.

The reference to September 1, 1981, is not to be construed to require only the information that was collected, or required to be collected, on that particular date. Rather, the conferees intend that the information requirement include all types of petroleum product information collected by the EIA as of that date. However, this requirement does not prescribe the particular collection methods to be employed. For example, the provision would not require the use of any particular data forms used prior to September 1, 1981. In addition, the authority granted by this section is not intended to expand the number of product categories for which information was previously collected. this provision would not prevent consolidation of forms.

SECTION 6.—REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS ON PETROLEUM SUPPLY INTERRUPTIONS

Impact analysis

Section 6(a) requires that within one year of enactment, the Secretary of Energy (in consultation with other agencies) must submit to Congress and the President a report analyzing the impact on the U.S. economy and U.S. consumers of reliance on the free market to allocate and set prices for supplies of oil during substantial reductions in available supplies to the United States.

Strategic petroleum reserve drawdown and distribution report

The conferees adopted the House provision which requires the President to submit to Congress a report containing information specified in this provision and discussed in the House report (H. Rept. 97-585, Part 1).

Regional reserve report

Section 6(c) requires the President to submit to Congress no later than December 31, 1982, a study assessing the costs and benefits of establishing regional petroleum storage as part of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve.

The Conferees intend that the study will describe the status and substance of any discussions or negotiations regarding cooperation with Canada either in supplying oil for, or providing support for, a regional petroleum reserve for use by the United States.

Strategic alcohol fuel reserve report

The conferees adopted the House provision requiring preparation and submission to Congress of a study assessing the potential for a strategic alcohol fuel reserve.

The conferees intend that the study contain—

(1) an assessment of the priority end uses which could be satisfied by use of alcohol in lieu of petroleum products;

(2) an evaluation of the relative economic benefits of establishing a Strategic Alcohol Fuel Reserve to supplement or supplant a portion of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, including projections of relative costs, impacts on balance of trade, and domestic employment;

(3) an analysis of the projected impact on the cost and operation of agricultural programs administered by the Federal government, including, but not limited to, estimated impacts on prices of domestic agricultural commodities and the cost of storage thereof; and

(4) assessments of alternative storage and distribution options.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

(Mr. PEPPER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Thursday, July 22, I had the privilege of leading a senior citizen's rally in Detroit, Mich. Unfortunately this caused me to miss a number of votes on amendments to H.R. 6030, the Defense Department authorization bill. I would like to take this time to read into the RECORD my position on those votes that I was not able to be present for.

Rollcall No. 201, on resolving into the Committee of the Whole, I would have voted "yea."

Rollcall No. 202, to prohibit use of authorized funds for procurement of binary chemical weapons or for production facilities for such. I would have voted "aye."

Rollcall No. 203, to authorize funds for production of binary chemical munitions, with an equivalent number of unitary chemical weapons from the existing arsenal be rendered useless. I would have voted "nay."

Rollcall No. 204, deletes $54 million in authorization for production of binary chemical weapons. I would have voted "aye."

Rollcall No. 206, an amendment that sought to delete the procurement authorization for the B-1 bomber. I would have voted "nay."

RADIO BROADCASTING TO CUBA ACT

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 529 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 529

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order, section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) to the contrary notwithstanding, to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5427) to authorize support to Radio Broadcasting to Cuba, Incorporated, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, thirty minutes to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and thirty minutes to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs now printed in the bill in italic as the original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5, rule XXI are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the able gentleman from Missouri (Mr. TAYLOR), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just one moment?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman, am I correct in assuming or did I hear that there was a waiver of the budget process involved in this legislation?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes, that is involved. I will explain that more fully here in my statement.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. It exceeded the limitation imposed by the budget?

Mr. PEPPER. No, it does not exceed the budget ceiling, but it does violate the Budget Act and I will state that more accurately in my statement.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 529 provides for the consideration of H.R. 5427, the Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act. The resolution provides 1 hour of general debate, 30 minutes to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and 30 minutes to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

This is an open rule, allowing any germane amendments to be offered, including the amendment reported by the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

The rule also waves points of order against the bill under section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act, prohibiting consideration of authorization bills not reported by May 15 before the fiscal year for which the bill is effective, and under clause 5 of rule XXI, prohibiting appropirations in a bill reported by a legislative committee. The 402(a) waiver is necessary because the bill contains a supplemental authorization for 1982, while the legislation was not reported by May 15, 1981.

However, the Foreign Affairs Committee has agreed to offer a floor amendment making the bill effective for fiscal year 1983, thus curing the Budget Act violation.

The waiver of clause 5, rule XXI, was included in the rule because several sections of the bill give the Board of International Broadcasting the power to make grants and payments and use reimbursements received from the other agencies, for the purpose of developing Radio Marti without action by the Appropriations Committee.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the rule makes the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee in order as an original bill for the purposes of amendment and provides a single motion to recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5427 authorizes $17 million for the construction of a new radio station to be called Radio Marti, of course, in honor of the great patriot and emancipator, Jose Marti of Cuba, to further the open communication of information to the people of Cuba. This station will be comparable to our Radio Free Europe program and will be operated by the U.S. Board for International Broadcasting. This new radio information effort is necessary to counteract the hundreds of hours of propaganda beamed weekly to the Cuban people by the Cuban and Soviet Governments.

Mr. Speaker, I think primarily the reason behind this proposal to create Radio Marti is to give information that carries with it the truth about what is going on in Cuba to those people who were once a part of the priceless island of the Carribbean—the "Jewel of the Caribbean," as Cuba was called.

That beautiful, fertile island, which was once the proud home of such great patriots as Jose Marti, now, of course, is the turf, the dominion, and the area under the direct and despotic control of Castro and communism, aided and abetted, of course, at an upper level by the Russian Government.

The people of Cuba are not being told what is happening to their economy or what is happening to their agriculture and that information is so vitally important to them. They are not told about how their sons are being sent to serve Russian military and political purposes to many nations of the world. The sons of Cuban mothers are dying upon foreign soil, not to defend Cuba, their homeland and all that they hold dear, but to perpetuate the dominion and the imperialistic control that is aspired to by the Soviet Government.

We are telling them that the people of the United States want to be their friends. They have been our friends for a long time. We gave them freedom, sacrificing American blood and treasure to do so, and we set an example when we liberated them. In spite of the fact that we had a treaty that bound them to us for a much longer time, we liberated them to their own freedom to enjoy for themselves.

So they know that we have been their friends. We are simply telling them that if they would get rid of these communistic dictators and if they will throw off the Russian yoke and become the people of Cuba again with their own free government and their own democratic institutions, America is still their friend and will gladly work with them and help them in every way we can to enjoy the highest potential of which they are capable.

So this institution will try to tell those people the truth instead of the lies which they are fed now by Cuban communistic and Russian propaganda.

Mr. Speaker, this bill will authorize the consideration of a very meritorious measure. I hope the rule will be speedily adopted and the measure favorably considered by this House.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I am glad to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I still want to find out a little bit more about what was waived in the budget process.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, the problem was section 402(a) of the Budget Act requires that a bill which provides new budget authority for a fiscal year must be reported by May 15 of the preceding fiscal year or it will not be eligible for consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Oh, I see.

Mr. PEPPER. This bill was not reported by May 15, 1980, and the introduced bill contains and authorization for fiscal year 1981.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. That was the only waiver?

Mr. PEPPER. We had to waive that requirement of the Budget Act.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. That was the only waiver?

Mr. PEPPER. As far as I know, that was the only budget waiver.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman very much.

I was concerned that we would find a way to waive a rule so that we can spend some more money when at the same time we are ruthlessly trying to cut funds that attack social problems.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I would not want the gentleman not to be fully informed.

What we do also is we do waive the rule against inclusion of appropriation in an authorization bill, because we do propose to allow the institution that runs this Radio Marti to make grants and payments and to use reimbursements received from other agencies that are proper and relevant in a case like this and when it is for the advancement of the program.

In this case there would be an instance of an appropriation of money in a way that does not go through the Appropriations Committee. That is a relatively small amount, but that is why the waiver is needed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. PEPPER. There was one other question about the Budget Act violation. We waived the Budget Act, but as I mentioned in my statement, the distinguished Committee on Foreign Affairs has agreed to offer an amendment on the floor to make this effective only for fiscal year 1983 so that the Budget Act violation would be cured.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

The intent, of course, is laudable, and I generally support rules. I think bills ought to be heard on the floor.

But I swear it is awfully difficult for me to understand, when we are slashing away at medicare, medicaid, and everything else and creating a potential internal danger for this Nation by alienating a whole lot of people, why we have to spend money on this. I guess the explanation will come out in the debate.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I say to my able friend, the gentleman from Maryland, that I am sure he knows there is nobody in this Chamber who is more opposed to cuts in social programs than I have been.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I realize that.

Mr. PEPPER. I share the gentleman's view 100 percent. But the appropriation that is authorized is $17 million. As believed by the administration and many of the supporters of the bill, it is in the national interest that we have this institution, and we think the advantage to be derived will greatly exceed the $17 million that will be involved in this expenditure.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

□ 1320

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would say to my very good friend from Florida, however, maybe one of the reasons they do not need the authority to exceed the budget in 1982 so much is that the military is already building the facility and moving a transmitter in, so they have taken care of part of their problem through military appropriations. That might be one reason they do not need it quite so badly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Even before this body has acted on the legislation?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Even before the body has acted.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. It assumes we are going to just roll over and play dead?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And the military will take care of it.

I wonder, my good friend, you say that you are going to tell the Cuban people to "throw off the yoke." Does that mean that if there is another Bay of Pigs that we are going to send in troops and help them?

Mr. PEPPER. I do not understand the purport of the gentleman's question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman in his statement said that we are going to tell, through Radio Marti the Cuban people to "throw off the yoke and to free themselves." Does that mean that if we have another Bay of Pigs this time that we will send in troops to help them? What are we going to do to help them throw off the yoke the next time?

Mr. PEPPER. I would rather not speculate about a contingency like that. I will allow my friend to form his own judgment.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 529 is an open rule under which the House will consider the President's proposal for a new radio station to broadcast to Cuba as part of the administration's effort to counter Cuban and Soviet influence in Central America.

This rule waives section 402(a) of the Budget Act against our consideration of the legislation, H.R. 5427. This waiver is necessary because the Committee on Foreign Affairs did not report the bill prior to May 15, 1981. The waiver is supported by the Committee on the Budget, because the Foreign Affairs Committee intends to offer a floor amendment curing the Budget Act problem.

The rule makes in order a Foreign Affairs Committee substitute as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule, and waives clause 5 of rule XXI against our consideration of the substitute. This waiver is necessary because certain portions of the Foreign Affairs Committee substitute may constitute appropriations in a legislative bill.

Last, Mr. Speaker, the rule divides the time for general debate between the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Energy and Commerce, which will offer a committee amendment.

The legislation this rule makes in order, H.R. 5427, authorizes appropriations of $10 million in fiscal 1982 and $7.7 million in 1983 for a U.S.-based radio broadcasting station which will broadcast to Cuba. Under the amendment to be offered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs designed to correct the Budget Act problem, the authorization will become $17.7 million for 1983.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation is fairly controversial, because some Members do not support the administration's foreign policy efforts in this area.

Let me just say, the station is designed to provide the Cuban people with information they cannot get under their repressive regime headed by Castro.

Mr. Speaker, there was not much controversy about this rule in the Committee on Rules, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI), a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the proposed new U.S. radio programing to Cuba, Radio Marti, will reach the audience most likely to influence the Cuban regime: the people of Cuba. For more than 20 years, they have received a steady diet of heavily censored and strongly anti-American indoctrination.

Castro's totalitarian regime controls the dissemination of information in Cuba. Radio Moscow is the only international broadcasting targeted specifically to Cuba. Cuba, on the other hand, operates an extensive broadcasting effort abroad in more than a half dozen languages and Indian dialects.

U.S. commercial broadcasts which can be received in Cuba are sporadic, most are not in Spanish, and not one is directed specifically to the Cubans on the island. Existing service provided by the Voice of America is limited, moreover, in time and scope: less than 6 hours a day in Spanish is designated for all of Latin America. No single program is tailored to the interests of Cuban audiences.

U.S. radio broadcasts to Cuba from Radio Marti will provide what would be essentially a Cuban domestic radio service, complementing the Voice of America which gives world news. Radio Marti would provide the truth so desperately sought by the captive people of Cuba.

Radio Marti is a bargain proposition. The $10 million sought for the first fiscal year would be a small price to pay for the gift of truth to the Cuban people. A small price indeed to pay for weapons of words rather than the vastly more costly weapons of war.

The administration has asked for Radio Marti as one aspect of its policy of containment of Fidel Castro. The beleaguered Cuban people will appreciate our providing them with true and accurate information. We, in turn, rely on the value of truth in the ideological struggle forced upon us. Truth is one of our most potent and important weapons. Let us use it.

The radio broadcasts would also help project U.S. policy in the Caribbean. A clear U.S. policy in America's backyard strengthens U.S. credibility in the face of Soviet encroachment in Latin America.

I urge the House to adopt the rule.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN).

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, while I do not oppose the rule, since it is an open rule, I do oppose the fact that the budget was waived, that points of order on the budget were waived. I really believe that what we have before us ought to be retitled, and the new title ought to be "The Dr. Strangelove Act of 1982."

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. Maybe I did not make it clear in my statement. This is only a technical waiver because the committee assured the Rules Committee that it would offer an amendment on the floor deferring this expenditure until fiscal 1983. So, a waiver would not in that case be required.

Mr. HARKIN. So, we will have a chance to vote against that amendment, too.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. I do not think, since the gentleman is opposed to the bill, he would want to vote against that amendment, because the amendment takes out the 1982 authorization and makes it just for 1983. That is not only within the budget, but it is not even an add-on to the budget. So I do not think the gentleman would want to vote against that amendment.

Mr. HARKIN. You want me to vote for it?

Mr. FASCELL. I think you should, if you are going to be consistent with your position.

Mr. HARKIN. We all ought to vote for it, right?

Mr. FASCELL. Right. I think everybody should vote for that amendment.

Mr. HARKIN. But no one ought to vote for the bill, which I started to say ought to be retitled, "Dr. Strangelove Act of 1982." The reason I say that is because I have information, verifiable information, and I will name the names next week, of individuals who made the following statements:

There was an individual in the Defense Department who said that this is "an international game of chicken and the United States will not blink."

With Radio Marti the United States will be "drawing a line across which Castro will know he cannot step without paying for it."

Or how about this one: Cuban interference with Radio Marti would be a violation of international law, and the United States would then have legal justification for going in and "surgically removing" their transmitters.

How about this one: Someone who helped the administration plan Radio Marti from the very beginning, not connected with either the Defense or the State Department, said that if Cuba elects to jam Radio Marti it would be "an act of war." Also, that a radio station in Iowa that would be affected by this ought to be proud to be on the front lines of finally putting "Castro in his place."

I know there are some well-meaning individuals in this body. I do not question their intentions in bringing this bill to the floor.

But what I do question is where the genesis of this began. With a small group of individuals in the White House and around the White House who, as they have said, want to "put Castro in his place."

So this, I think, is a very Dr. Strangelovean type of bill to bring up.

Aside from that, it is a waste of money, $17.7 million. We have two radio stations in Miami already, WINZ Radio and WQBA. Any of you who have ever traveled in the Caribbean listened to WINZ Radio. It goes all over Cuba, all day, and I think all night playing music and having commercials. I would suggest that if we want to spend our $17.7 million we ought to just buy commercials on WINZ Radio and tell the Cuban people how great America is. Is this not the administration that worships the temple of the free marketplace? Let us just buy some commercials on WINZ Radio and beam the truth to Cuba.

I think we ought to have a new title for this bill. I would suggest at least the following:

How about "The $17.7 Million Boondoggle Broadcasting to Cuba Act?"

How about "Throwing Money at the Castro Problem Through Broadcasting to Cuba Act?"

Or how about this one, "The Cuban Refugee Recruitment Through Broadcasting to Cuba Act," because the one thing we have learned in the past from our broadcasting to Southeast Asia is that is what brought all of these millions of refugees out. So even if this bill does what the authors purport it does, we are going to have more Cuban refugees in this country than we even have today.

But I think perhaps the best title of all for this bill ought to be the "John Foster Dulles Cold War Mentality Memorial Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act," which to me is what this bill is all about.

But I just want you to know that aside from all of this there are very legitimate reasons over and above this to be opposed to this bill.

□ 1330

Mr. Speaker, I will insert in the RECORD with my remarks a list of all of the groups opposed to this piece of legislation:

IOWA CATTLEMEN'S ASSOCIATION,
Ames, Iowa, April 13, 1982.

Hon. TOM HARKIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HARKIN: The Iowa Cattlemen's Association is very concerned about the impact that the possible jamming of "Radio Marti" by the Cuban government would have on the farm programming of radio station WHO in Des Moines, Iowa. Farmers rely very heavily on early morning farm news, market reports and weather reports on WHO to plan their farm schedules. The loss of WHO's signal would affect many producers in several states, not just those in Iowa. I have been interviewed on WHO several times and have had feedback from producers in several states concerning my comments.

Perhaps the message that "Radio Marti" would carry to Cuba is necessary. However, if the Cuban government were to jam the 1040 kHz signal little would be accomplished. This seems to be a foolish waste of dollars which are not plentiful today. We've learned from representatives of Palmer Communications, Inc. that another 50,000 watt AM station, already owned by the State Department, is used only six hours per day and could be used for the "Radio Marti" effort. Careful consideration should be given to this alternative. This alternative "Voice of America" station operates on 1180 kHz.

In view of the proposed costs of establishment of "Radio Marti" to operate at 1040 kHz and, more importantly, the valuable and irreplaceable services offered to farmers by current WHO programming, I urge you to reconsider this ill-advised decision and to consider all of the alternatives and consequences prior to making a final decision.

We appreciate your support for our position on this matter.

Sincerely,

JOHN HENNING, President.

IOWA BEEF IMPROVEMENT ASS'N.,
April 8, 1982.

Re "Radio Marti"—the threatened jamming of 1040 k.H.z.

Hon. TOM HARKIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE HARKIN: We have been advised the U.S. State Department has planned to beam a message to Cuba on 1040 k.H.z. and Cuba has let it be known they will jam the frequency with ten times the power that is broadcast. This will create a problem for many people in Iowa and the Midwest as frequency 1040 is "Clear Channel WHO Radio". The early morning and late evening are critical times for farmers to get the latest weather, markets and agriculture news. Palmer Communications Inc., licensee of radio WHO, is the source of this information for over 100,000 farmers in the Midwest. Using this frequency for a message to Cuba and having it jammed will do irreparable damage to WHO and deprive many farmers of this essential information. We strongly urge the U.S. Government to reconsider plans to use 1040 k.H.z. for "Radio Marti" and explore the use of "Voice of America" frequency 1180 for this purpose. The efforts of this country to educate the Cuban people as to what is happening in the world is a commendable endeavor and one that we support, but it must be done in a way that does not impair our society and economic strength. Using 1040 k.H.z. is potentially quite damaging to the food producing Midwest.

We will appreciate your consideration and support on this problem.

Sincerely yours,

VAREL BAILEY,
President, IBIA.

IOWA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
West Des Moines, Iowa, March 31, 1982.

Hon. RONALD REAGAN,
President of the United States,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We are concerned about the effect of the government's proposal to establish Radio Marti on the same frequency as Radio Station WHO in Des Moines.

Many farmers throughout Iowa and the Midwest depend upon WHO for farm news, grain and livestock and weather reporting at all hours of the day.

It is our understanding that the Cuban government has announced plans to jam the proposed Radio Marti station with a 500,000 watt AM station on the same frequency. If this occurs, the effective signal for Station WHO on frequency 1040 will be reduced to 45 miles during early evening, nighttime and pre-sunrise broadcasting.

We've been told that the State Department already has a 50,000 watt AM station that operates no more than 6 hours per day on the 1180 frequency. It seems logical to use this facility which is located near the proposed site of the new station in Florida and which is already beamed toward Cuba.

In this period of overwhelming need for restraints on federal spending, the decision to use an existing facility and already-assigned frequency makes economic sense. To spend additional money and risk the jamming of WHO's highly regarded farm and news broadcasts would be costly to Iowa farmers, Iowans and taxpayers.

We respectfully ask that you favorably consider our request to protect a valuable domestic broadcast station's service to Americans while finding a way to communicate the truth to the Cuban people.

Sincerely,

DEAN KLECKNER, President.

IOWA DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Des Moines, Iowa, April 7, 1982.

Hon. TOM HARKIN,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR TOM: I am enclosing a copy of the letter I sent to President Reagan regarding the issue of "Radio Marti." I feel that WHO has provided a tremendous service to the citizens of Iowa, particularly the rural population through their farm broadcasting service.

The proposal by the Presidential Commission to use "Radio Marti" on a separate channel 1040 kHz will definitely shrink the ability of farm broadcasts during those critical hours to reach out in the radius it now covers. In fact, in eastern, northeast and northwest Iowa our Iowa stations will not have the benefit of the farm broadcast service, whereas now that service reaches out into a wide radius to the Canadian border, as far east as western New York and Pennsylvania, as far south as Louisiana, and as far west as Wyoming and Colorado.

I hope that you will try and urge the Presidential Commission to use the principal option available in the best interests of the economy and service to Iowa and to other areas which WHO currently serves.

Thank you for your support on this issue.

Sincerely,

R. H. LOUNSBERRY,
Secretary of Agriculture.

IOWA DAIRY INDUSTRY COMMISSION,
Ankeny, Iowa, April 1, 1982.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Recently I became aware of the State Department's plan to operate a 50,000 watt AM station, designated as "Radio Marti." Also, according to information I have received, "Radio Marti" would operate on a frequency of 1040 kHz, the same as radio station WHO of Des Moines, Iowa.

I understand the purpose of "Radio Marti" is to tell ". . . the truth to the Cuban people about their government's domestic mismanagement and its promotion of subversion and international terrorism in this hemisphere and elsewhere . . ." While I believe the Cuban people have a right to hear this information, and while it may serve our national interest, Mr. Castro most assuredly would not stand idly by. In fact, he has announced plans to jam "Radio Marti" broadcasts with a 500,000 watt AM station, also using the 1040 kHz frequency.

Who, then wins this political battle of the airwaves? No one. But there are losers—those being radio station WHO and the hundreds of thousands of midwestern farmers who depend on their early evening, night-time and pre-sunrise broadcasts. Farmers, as you know, Mr. President, depend on accurate weather and market information, and here in the midwest they have counted on WHO for over 50 years to bring this information to them.

I also believe, Mr. President, that to ask taxpayers to foot the bill for this multi-million dollar project that will not achieve its goal due to Castro's plan to jam the station is wrong.

Thank you for your time and consideration of this matter.

Sincerely,

KEITH R. MAXEY,
Executive Secretary.

IOWA SOYBEAN ASSOCIATION,
West Des Moines, Iowa, March 25, 1982.

RONALD REAGAN,
President, United States of America,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: WHO Radio of Des Moines, the station on which I used to hear your broadcasts of the Drake Relays, is in serious trouble if the Department of State goes ahead with plans for "Radio Marti" on a frequency of 1040 kHz.

Proposed jamming of "Radio Marti" by the Cubans would effectively eliminate early morning and late evening broadcasts of farm markets, weather, and news so vital to midwest agriculture.

Iowa's Clear Channel WHO Radio has an outstanding farm department that provides needed, up to the minute agricultural information. Interruption of this service would mean the loss of a valuable news source on which farmers make costly decisions.

There must be a better way!

Thank you for your serious consideration of this matter.

Sincerely,

RAYMOND HECK,
President, Iowa Soybean Association.

IOWA CORN GROWERS ASSOCIATION,
March 26, 1982.

Hon. TOM HARKIN,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HARKIN: The enclosed letter describes the concern with which the Iowa Corn Growers Association views the proposed Department of State 50,000 watt "Radio Marti" plan.

If the plan goes into effect and Cuba jams the transmission as anticipated, consequences for Iowa agriculture will be severe, as dusk-to-dawn programming on WHO will be affected.

Farmers in Iowa truly do depend on WHO for weather and market information. I find WHO "Farm Radio" a reliable source of the information so crucial to my operation.

In light of the fact that the Department of State has a reasonable alternative to broadcasting on the same frequency as WHO, I feel that proceeding with this plan would be a real disservice to Iowa farmers. I trust you will take whatever action you deem appropriate to direct the State Department to avoid interference with the 1040 kHz frequency.

Sincerely,

ROBERT BOYLE,
Director.

IOWA CORN GROWERS ASSOCIATION,
March 26, 1982.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Iowa Corn Growers Association would like to bring to your attention a situation that we feel has severe implications to the majority of the 110,000 Iowa corn producers.

We understand the Department of State plans to operate a 50,000 watt AM radio station designated as "Radio Marti" on a frequency of 1040 kHz. Proposed programming is directed toward the people of Cuba. Additional information we have obtained indicates that if such a station would operate, the Cuban government would jam that frequency with a signal being broadcast from a 500,000 watt station. Such a situation would seriously affect a major farm radio station in Iowa, WHO, operating on their assigned frequency of 1040 kHz.

We can appreciate the need to provide the Cuban people with accurate and reliable information about their government, however, the adverse effect this will have on Iowa agriculture we feel merits selecting another alternative.

Jamming of the 1040 kHz frequency would prevent farmers in a 200 mile radius of Des Moines from receiving the WHO farm programming from dusk to dawn. Of major concern to us is the weather reporting services during late evening and early morning hours in the planting and harvesting seasons. Obviously, during these seasons of the year the weather conditions are very critical to farmers and they depend on the predawn radio weather reports to determine work activities for the day. WHO has devoted substantial resources to provide sophisticated weather reporting services that are needed by farmers. The loss of this information to Iowa farmers could cause considerable financial losses to these grain producers as well as affect the U.S. and world food supplies in a drastic manner.

Additionally, farmers depend upon the timeliness of radio for much of their market information and farm news. Most of the farm news is provided in the time slots of 5:30 a.m. to 6:30 a.m. and during the noon hour. Thus, interference on the 1040 frequency during early morning hours would prevent most farmers in Iowa from receiving the critical market information plus coverage of issues that you and your Administration have selected as high priorities such as soil conservation, increased agriculture exports, additional basic research related to agricultural production and marketing and a short-term priority of farmer awareness and participation in the 1982 farm program.

We are advised that an alternative to the present plan is available. The "Voice of America" presently operates a 50,000 watt station on the frequency of 1180 kHz within a short distance from the proposed "Radio Marti" site. Additionally this station operates no more than six hours per day and could be used for the project "Marti" effort.

Mr. President, based on the serious consequences that the loss of WHO weather, market and farm information would have on Iowa's farmers and the economy, we strongly urge you to encourage the Department of State to chose an alternative to the present 1040 kHz "Radio Marti" proposal.

Sincerely,

DAN STADTMUELLER,
President.

IOWA DAIRY PRODUCTS ASSOCIATION,
Ankeny, Iowa, April 15, 1982.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Representatives of Palmer Communications, Inc., licensee of Radio Station WHO, Des Moines, Iowa, have been advised that the Cuban government has announced plans to operate a 500,000 watt AM station on WHO's frequency of 1040 kHz, which will jam its broadcasts and reduce its early evening, nighttime and pre-sunrise coverage from 800 to 45 miles. The supposed purpose of the Cuban plan is to jam the 50,000 watt AM station, designated as "Radio Marti", which the state department proposes to operate on the same frequency of 1040 kHz directionalized toward Cuba.

We understand the purpose of "Radio Marti" is to tell ". . . the truth to the Cuban people about their government's domestic mismanagement and its promotion of subverion and international terrorism in this hemisphere and elsewhere . . ." Although this effort may serve our national interest, it will also antagonize the present Cuban administration and it appears certain they intend their proposed 500,000 watt AM station to jam "Radio Marti." Unfortunately, in doing so at this point, they will also jam the early evening, nighttime and presunrise broadcasts of WHO, depriving Iowa farm families, and thousands of others in surrounding states, of the farm service programs the station broadcasts during those hours.

We are also advised that the "Voice of America", a state department agency, already owns another 50,000 watt AM station presently operating on the former I-A Clear Channel of 1190 kHz, from a site no more than 30 miles from that under consideration. That station is already beamed toward Cuba. We also understand it operates no more than 6 hours per day, and could be readily used for the proposed "Radio Marti" effort and would probably kill the plans for the proposed 500,000 watt Cuban station at the 1040 kHz frequency.

In view of the irreparable loss of agricultural news, commodity markets, and weather reporting service, thousands of midwestern families would suffer if WHO's early evening, nighttime and pre-sunrise broadcasts are jammed, we urge you and your colleagues to propose reassignment of the "Radio Marti" effort to the frequency of 1180 kHZ now being used part time. To precipitate the jamming of WHO's farm and agricultural broadcasts would be a disservice to midwestern families vitally in need of this reporting service on a regular daily basis.

In addition to maintaining the status quo of WHO's broadcast efforts, substantial funds could be saved in avoiding construction of a duplicate unneeded facility by the government. We will appreciate your consideration of our position on this important matter.

Respectfully yours,

MARSHALL O. INMAN,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH).

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the legislation currently before us involves a great deal more than the establishment of Radio Marti. The policy implications, both domestic and foreign, underlying adoption of this bill in its present form are profound.

The establishment of a no-nonsense news program to be beamed in Spanish to Cuba makes sense—assuming it is not jammed. But a good idea becomes a bad one if it is likely not to work. President Reagan is in the position of a quarterback who has called a pass in the huddle and walks up to the line of scrimmage and sees a defensive alignment likely to foil the play called. Based on newly available intelligence information that Castro has the capacity to jam broadcasts, the administration should reconsider its strategy.

To understand the situation we are in, it is important to understand the background of this legislation.

If current plans are implemented, Radio Marti will broadcast on 1040 kHz—precisely the same frequency as WHO of Des Moines, Iowa. The 1040 kHz frequency was chosen because the signals emitted by Radio Marti from Florida to Cuba would cause relatively little interference for WHO and other private broadcasters in the United States. However, the government survey that led to this frequency selection did not take into account the effects of potential Cuban jamming to prevent Radio Marti from reaching its intended audience.

We do know that Castro has both the capacity and the stated desire to jam Radio Marti with a 500-kilowatt transmitter. If this occurs, Cuban jamming would restrict WHO's range to a 30-mile radius of Des Moines and jeopardize the functional viability of America's best known agricultural and talk show station. Instead of sending a clear signal from Minnesota to Louisiana and from Wyoming to Pennsylvania, WHO would barely reach Ames. Towns as close as Grinnell and Iowa City and Ottumwa would be deprived of a familiar and valuable source of news and entertainment. And, most importantly, few Cubans would receive the news intended for their ears.

The potential for Presidential embarrassment is extraordinary if current Administration plans are not modified. President Reagan, who began his work career with Palmer Broadcasting, has always identified with and expressed great fondness for WHO. If WHO's frequency is used for Radio Marti, Castro will be given enormous incentive to jam its initial broadcasts and thus thwart an Administration initiative to which the President has lent his personal prestige.

Jamming is not a difficult art. It is just expensive. The fact that Castro is so insecure as to feel compelled to block "truth" from invading Cuba's shores is a reflection of a leader in trouble. The concern I have is that a commendable idea—the establishment of Radio Marti—does not cause the President such embarrassment as to increase the prospect of militant retaliations on our part against Cuba.

For months, Secretary Haig obliquely warned of the possibility that the administration may "go to the source" and commence significant moves against Cuba. There are a few in inner circles in Washington that appear bent on confrontation with Cuba. One strategically placed Pentagon appointee went so far as to tell WHO representatives that jamming Radio Marti might be considered an "act of war."

Somewhere a more responsible perspective must be found. The jamming of Radio Marti is not equivalent to the sinking of the Maine. Should Radio Marti not have the effect our Government might hope, care must be taken not to overreact. Interventionism has not served us well in the immediate past. It is not likely to in the immediate future. The Bay of Pigs mentality reflected in the desire to establish confrontational policies with Cuba demand reconsideration. Now is the time to de-escalate rather than increase inciteful rhetoric in the Caribbean region. Another confrontation with Russia over Cuba has all the "déjà vu" earmarkings of man's pride jeopardizing man's fate.

Beyond the grave foreign policy questions posed by Radio Marti, questions that touch the heart of our constitutional system have been raised by the actions of the administration. I am saddened to learn that this administration, which is so committed to preserving the Constitution and its meaning, has already expended funds, without authorization or appropriation, from the Department of Defense, for the construction of a four-tower-array system in the Florida Keys. These towers are ostensibly to be used by the Navy, but everyone knows they are intended for Radio Marti. Such efforts to circumvent our constitutional process strikes at the heart of our system of government. The implications for this manner of decisionmaking is not characteristic of a constitutional government.

Mr. Speaker, we have much more to lose than we have to gain by establishing Radio Marti. Castro, intelligence sources tell us, has never been lower in Cuban public esteem. Cuba's economy is in disarray and Cuban mothers, not unlike their American counterparts, have grave reservations about sending their sons to fight civil wars on foreign soil. Dictatorships have a habit of collapsing from the weight of incompetence and ideological rigidity. Great power intervention in the affairs of small states all to frequently makes martyrs out of villains. Generally it ensconces rather than curtails the authority of petty potentates. The greatest threat to Castro is to ignore him. Restraint is the order of the day.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the able gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH).

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the rule for H.R. 5427, the Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act. This rule, which provides an open rule with 1 hour of general debate, to be divided equally between the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Energy and Commerce, has been agreed to by both committees. It will insure adequate discussion of the proposal by all interested parties and will enable all Members to offer appropriate amendments.

There is, however, a minor problem with respect to a necessary Budget Act waiver for 1982 which I understand will be corrected by an amendment to be offered by my distinguished colleague from Florida (Mr. FASCELL). This amendment will obviate the need for a Budget Act waiver for 1982 by moving the effective authorization date forward to October 1, 1982—the beginning of fiscal year 1983.

Mr. Speaker, this technical waiver, however, will not address another very serious budgetary problem which has been completely overlooked in the rush to enact this legislation. It has come to my attention, and the attention of several other Members of Congress, that the facility to be used by Radio Marti has, in fact, already been constructed at Saddlebunch Key in Florida. Why are we voting on legislation to authorize funds to construct and operate a radio station when the Department of Defense has already constructed this station? I would like to provide the Members with the sequence of events which have led me to conclude that the executive branch has expended funds without any congressional authorization.

On September 18, 1981, Under Secretary of Defense Fred Ikle wrote to Assistant Secretary of Commerce Bernard Wunder:

> On request of the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, the Department of Defense is preparing to provide, upon enactment of authorizing legislation, a medium-wave [AM] transmitter facility for Radio Broadcasting to Cuba.

Four days later, on September 22, 1981, President Reagan signed an Executive order creating the Presidential Commission on Broadcasting to Cuba. This legislation was introduced over 3 months later, on February 2, 1982.

Mr. Speaker, while the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Energy and Commerce were holding hearings and deliberating on the legislation before us today, the U.S. Navy was proceeding with construction of a facility to be turned over for use by Radio Marti when the authorizing legislation is passed. Based on the letter from Under Secretary of Defense Ikle to Assistant Secretary of Commerce Wunder, and on a report in the June 7, 1982 issue of Broadcasting magazine that the Navy was in the process of constructing the facility, I wrote to Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Enders, who is in charge of the Radio Marti project, to inquire about possible unauthorized construction and to caution the administration that such construction would be illegal. Mr. Enders responded in a June 18 letter that:

> There are no plans to make Radio Marti operational, over any facility, and that the administration will spend no public moneys to that end prior to the enactment of authorizing legislation.

But note that in the Enders' letter, there was no assurance at all that the facility had not been constructed for use by Radio Marti, only that Radio Marti would not become operational until authorizing legislation was passed. This strikes me as an obvious back-door means of constructing a facility for use by Radio Marti without obtaining the necessary congressional authorization.

Mr. Speaker, I call to the attention of my colleagues a June 16, 1982, story which appeared in the Miami Herald which states that Lt. Cmdr. Mark Neuhart, a public affairs officer for U.S. Caribbean forces, admitted that the transmitter facility being built by the Navy in the Florida Keys is designed for Radio Marti. Subsequent to this Miami Herald report, the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee staff conducted an investigation into the matter and concluded that the Navy is building a facility for Radio Marti. The New York Times, in an editorial appearing in this morning's paper states:

> The Navy says it is already building four 250 foot antennas in Key West, even before Congress has voted a dime for this objectionable and extravagant project.

Mr. Speaker, article 1, section 9, clause 7 of the Constitution of the United States says:

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by Law.

It is apparent that the executive branch, under the guise of a Department of Defense national security requirement, has proceeded with the construction of a facility which it planned from the outset to turn over to Radio Marti—despite the fact that Congress has not enacted authorizing legislation.

Mr. Speaker, while the rule before us is a fair one, I must question why we are adopting any rule for this legislation if the executive branch has seen fit to proceed with Radio Marti before the U.S. Congress has granted its approval and authorized the expenditure of taxpayers' money.

This is one of a whole series of events related to Radio Marti that make it indeed not only a questionable venture but one that I hope when we get to Radio Marti, Members will not only vote for our amendments, but then will vote down this whole sad project.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. TAUKE), a member of the Energy and Commerce Committee.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAUKE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I rise in opposition to this legislation and I join my other colleagues from Iowa and would like to associate myself with their remarks and I commend them for their action on this piece of legislation.

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that today and next week we will have every opportunity to discuss many of the details of Radio Marti during the course of the debate on this legislation. But it occurs to me that today we should take a moment to pause and think about the logic of the proposal before us. Basically the proposal before us is designed to broadcast the truth about Castro to the Cuban Government, yet the problem that we have with the proposal before us is that that broadcast is going to take place on the AM frequency, a frequency that is easily jammed. Even the proponents of this legislation have indicated in testimony before the various committees and in debate on the issue that, yes, an AM station can be easily jammed, or counterbroadcasting can easily prevent the station from being heard in Cuba.

Now if we take the position of those who support this legislation on face value and say that if the information we were going to broadcast to Cuba would have a dramatic effect on Castro and the Cuban Government, then it seems to me it also is fair to assume that Castro will take the relatively easy step of preventing this material from being heard by the Cuban people.

Now, if we are going to make a foreign policy expenditure or an expenditure for foreign policy reasons that will have virtually no impact on those who are supposed to hear the message, then one has to ask what other implications does this policy have?

The first major implication that it has is that there will be retaliation for this policy against domestic broadcasters in this country.

So while it may seem from a foreign policy standpoint to be a risk worth taking, one must look then at the domestic implications, and I think then one has to conclude that it is a risk that perhaps should not be taken, because when Castro decides to prevent the Radio Marti from being heard within Cuba he has basically two choices, either he can jam the station, which would have little impact on the United States but would prevent it from being heard in Cuba, or he can interfere with the station by broadcasting on the same frequency.

He has indicated he intends to do the latter and he has more than indicated that he is building the stations right now to broadcast 500 kilowatts on the same frequency as Radio Marti. That of course would have disastrous indications for a number of broadcasters in this country. In essence, we would be sacrificing them to a foreign policy decision which probably will never be able to be successful in its implementation.

There are some who are suggesting that we have no other alternatives. The fact is there are other alternatives. The first alternative and one which I will discuss at greater length in debate is to broadcast on shortwave. That is what we do with "Radio Liberty," that is what we do with "Radio Free Europe." The reason we do it is because it is the accepted form of international broadcasting.

The second reason we do it is because it is not easily jammed. True, not many Cubans have shortwave receivers but it better to reach the few who do than to reach none at all on the AM band.

A second alternative is to use the Voice of America station. In fact today, Voice of America, Radio Marathon, which broadcasts into the Caribbean, broadcasts only 5 hours a day; 19 hours a day it is not used. It, too, is a 50,000 watt station; for 10 years it, too, carried programs about Cuba. In fact, there was a program begun in 1963 directed toward the Cuban people that was 5 hours a day. For lack of information, it gradually dwindled from that 5 hours a day down to half an hour a day, and in 1973 was taken off the air.

If this is a mission that we really want to fulfill, why not use the existing station that is there, that has been used before, the Cubans allegedly are accustomed to listening to, to broadcast the information that we wish to relay to the Cuban people?

I guess it just appears to me that after looking at this proposal that from a logical point of view there are other alternatives besides erecting a new station. If we erect a new station it undoubtedly will not have the desired impact of reaching the Cuban people but will have substantial negative impact on domestic broadcasters in this country. The sacrifice we are asking them to make is not outweighed by the benefits that we will achieve from this proposal.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the able gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH).

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that if we vote for this rule we are not voting just for another Radio Free Europe or something like that.

The gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) and I both indicated earlier they are already building the station. The report tends to help with this on page 6 by indicating that they are to use an existing facility. It will be existing by the time this bill passes and the military expect to secure reimbursement out of this bill. That is the way they would use an existing facility.

Also, there are some other dangerous differences between Radio Free Europe and the proposed station in this bill. Not only is Radio Free Europe not an AM, but it is so far away they cannot jam us from Sri Lanka. In addition to that this bill actually permits the military to furnish support and services for this station. That is something we have never permitted in Radio Free Europe. We prohibit broadcasts and rebroadcasts from over there for use in the United States but they will hear these broadcasts from here, and I think that is dangerous. There is no way to keep them from recording the broadcasts because the broadcasts will be made from right here and somebody in Florida can pipe it from Miami back up to New York or somewhere else in the United States any way.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman said the military will provide support and services?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is in the bill that they can provide support and services.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Does that mean they might be the disc jockeys, the announcers?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think the way they have proceeded so far indicates they do not care what we think it means, they are going to do whatever they want.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. They are thumbing their nose at the Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TAUKE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I hesitate to ask the gentleman to give up his time. I do think that the point he made about the interference of the military in this project is critically important.

When asked why the State Department insisted on building a new facility instead of using the Voice of America station already built in Marathon, Fla., it is the same type of station, the Assistant Secretary Enders said the Voice of America station would not have the same credibility that Radio Marti would have.

I think if Radio Marti is built by the military and it is being broadcast from a military base in Florida, it certainly will not have the same credibility as a Voice of America station, it will have a lot less credibility.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Under this bill they permit the Assistant Secretary of Commerce to determine the frequency. Whoever heard of such a thing? Radio stations all over this country that broadcast on an AM frequency have to secure permission from the FCC. In this bill, the Assistant Secretary of Commerce would determine the frequency. If they jam that frequency 1 week, he can turn to another frequency.

If you vote against this bill, the radio station you save may be your own. This is no ordinary bill we are talking about here.

Also, they say the need to get the truth to Cuba. They are going to give them some radio music and some ballgames and some newscasts, and tell them the truth about Castro.

□ 1350

They may decide to give us the truth about Reagan.

Anyway, we do know that what they are describing as the programing for Radio Marti amounts to public radio for Cuba. We are cutting down on public radio for this country, but now, this bill would furnish public radio for Cuba.

How much sense does this bill make to those who really read the bill? I know very few people have read the bill carefully. Those who think they need not read it carefully may not know what it does until they appropriate the frequency in a radio station in their area; but read this bill and I think most will agree that they should vote no on this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SHAW).

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I rise in very strong support of this bill and the rule that is presently before the House.

We have heard a great deal of talk in this House today with regard to the question of whether we were overreaching, the question of the value of such a station. Well, I think what we are talking about is the value of truth. We have talked to many of the refugees who have come into this country just recently and found that they did not even know about the adventurism of Castro in Africa. They have no idea of the meddling of that government in Central America. They do not know what their government is doing.

History will show that there is no greater weapon in the arsenal of the United States than the truth.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. SHAW. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It seems to me, in all candor, that saying Cubans are unable to hear the truth is really a condemnation of the Miami radio stations. They reach two-thirds of the people in Cuba. Why have they not been telling them the truth?

Mr. SHAW. What we are talking about is a Spanish speaking station that will talk about Cuba. We heard here mention of WQBA, we heard mention of WINZ, two wonderful stations that are in Dade County, Fla.; however, they are speaking to the people in the Miami area, to the Cuban community in Miami, as well as the rest of the community. They are beamed to the Caribbean, but they are not talking about what needs to be told, and that is, the Cuban people need to be told the truth about Cuba, and the truth will make them free.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say this. This a fair rule. We are not now debating the merits of the bill that this rule would authorize the House to consider. I hope the House would adopt this rule.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Nelson for, with Mr. Dellums against.

Mr. Florio for, with Mr. Bonior of Michigan against.

Mrs. Boggs for, with Mrs. Collins of Illinois against.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5427) to authorize support to Radio Broadcasting to Cuba, Inc.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL).

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 239, nays 8, answered "present" 1, not voting 186, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 5427, with Mr. RATCHFORD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) will be recognized for 15 minutes; the gentleman from California (Mr. LAGOMARSINO) will be recognized for 15 minutes; the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) will be recognized for 15 minutes; and the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RINALDO) will be recognized for 15 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL).

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, as we all know, the House will adjourn at 3 o'clock, and the Committee will rise at that time. When we are in the House, I will request unanimous consent for all Members to revise and extend their remarks in general debate on this matter. And in order to get the bill presented and to have both proponents and opponents make their presentation here today, and perhaps conserve some time for the rest of the Members, I will just briefly do that and submit my remarks for the RECORD.

The purpose of the legislation, of course, is to increase the broadcasting capabilities of the United States. Despite all of the issues that have been raised in the discussion on the rule, suffice it to say that I think there are clear and sensible responses to all of those issues, and we will address those, each one, in the course of the amendment process under the 5-minute rule. There is, as usual, more than one side to this issue. There are more than two. There are probably three or four. So I would not want my colleagues who are listening in on this or watching it to be overly consumed by the crocodile tears that they have heard so far. There is a need here. The need is clear. And we will address that, Mr. Chairman, and I would hope that our colleagues would approach the matter, as they usually do, in a very responsible, openminded way. We will have ample opportunity to discuss many amendments, some frivolous, some humorous, some ridiculous, and, hopefully, they will all be disposed of under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5427, legislation to authorize support to Radio Broadcasting to Cuba. The purpose of this legislation is to increase the broadcasting capabilities of the United States in the Caribbean by establishing a new broadcast service to be called Radio Marti. In particular, this enhanced international broadcast capability would allow the United States to provide accurate, up-to-date and uncensored news and information to the people of Cuba regarding Cuban activities at home and abroad. The bill also provides discretionary authority to provide compensation to U.S. broadcasters for expenses they might incur in mitigating the effects of Cuban interference on domestic U.S. broadcasts.

The need for such a service is clear. Cuba is a nation located just 90 miles off the coast of the United States, yet it is truly an island both in terms of the forced physical isolation of its populace and the isolation of its people from free access to information. Although the people of the United States currently provide the basic human right of greedom of information to the peoples of the Communist bloc nations of Eastern Europe as well as the people of the Soviet Union through the broadcasts of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty, no such broadcasting service is provided the people of Cuba who also live in a closed society. Their right to know is confirmed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The value of such broadcasts has been well tested over time, most recently during the ongoing crisis in Poland. The people of Cuba have an equal right to know. Aside from our demonstrated commitment to the free flow of information worldwide, that island presents a national security interest that we cannot ignore.

This bill would amend the Board for International Broadcasting Act to state that the United States supports the right of the Cuban people to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas through any media regardless of frontiers. The BIB, the parent organization for RFE/RL, Inc., is uniquely capable of producing a similar indigenous broadcast service for the people of Cuba.

Perhaps more importantly, this bill provides an opportunity for us to expand and improve America's public diplomacy activities. To ignore this opportunity to radio the truth to the Cuban people is to abdicate our responsibility and to surrender our integrity to the diet of anti-American sentiments fed to the Cuban people by Cuba and the Soviet Union. The United States has a message to deliver and the way to deliver it is through public diplomacy.

Public diplomacy is not a propaganda effort. It is news. It is objective reporting. It is a major element of the nitty-gritty operations of a modern foreign policy which seeks to strengthen mutual understanding among peoples through communication and educational programs. It is diplomacy that may be practiced, not just between diplomats in foreign offices, but in people-to-people contact which can offset the huge, tightly controlled, and pointed broadcast efforts of the Soviets.

The Soviets spend millions on a broadcasting effort which includes broadcasts of Radio Moscow twice a day. They currently outspend us about 7 to 1 in their broadcasting and information efforts around the world. The United States currently broadcasts through the Voice of America fewer than 6 hours a day in Spanish language broadcasts to the whole of Latin America. This is not a targeted broadcast which could provide the Cubans the free, indigenous radio which they are now denied.

In drafting this legislation, both committees of jurisdiction, Foreign Affairs and Energy and Commerce, paid strong attention to choice of frequency on which Radio Marti would operate. It provides that the Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Communications and Information identify a frequency, in consultation with the FCC and after receiving public comment, which will provide protection to nongovernment radio broadcasters in the United States. In addition, it provides a mechanism for the U.S. Government to focus on the problems in the U.S. domestic broadcast industry which already exist because of Cuban interference. Private U.S. broadcasters have long been plagued by the interference from illegal Cuban broadcasts. Aside from calling for a Presidential task force to analyze the depth of the problem and to seek a practical solution, the bill authorizes the FCC to instruct the Board for International Broadcasting to compensate U.S. broadcasters for expenses they incur in mitigating the effects of Cuban interference on their operations.

We are aware that some Members of Congress have expressed concern that broadcasting interference from Cuba would increase if Radio Marti were to become operative. Those who hold this view should be reminded that the problem of Cuban interference has been with us for 10 to 15 years. The most serious interference has been directed against my own Florida broadcasters, yet they support the creation of Radio Marti.

Radio Marti seems at least to have brought the interference problem into focus and has lifted it to a level where it can be discussed seriously. Whether or not Radio Marti broadcasts to Cuba, the Cubans have been interfering with and will continue to interfere with U.S. domestic broadcasting efforts if their participation in the last regional broadcasting conference is any indication. We have seen no evidence that Cuba plans to sign the regional broadcasting agreement drafted in Brazil last November. On the contrary, the Cubans walked out of that conference before an agreement was reached. Instead, Cuba is going ahead with its plan to build, among others, two 500 kilowatt transmitters which would by far surpass the power needs of Castro's island. These plans were formulated long before legislation for Radio Marti was ever drafted. There is no reason to believe that Castro will lose interest in constructing these transmitters or in broadcasting to the United States if Radio Marti is not authorized and established.

The solution to the problem of Cuban interference lies not in Radio Marti, but in bringing Cuba to the international bargaining table and making it a responsible member of the hemisphere in the areas of international broadcast allocation and regulation. It does not lie in a choice by the United States to forego its international responsibilities regarding the right of freedom of information.

At this point, I would like to insert into the RECORD the "Dear Colleague" letter which has been circulated to the Members and which addresses the questions raised about H.R. 5427.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., July 22, 1982.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: H.R. 5427, to establish a new radio station, "Radio Marti", to broadcast to Cuba, is scheduled for floor action on Friday, July 23. This is an important foreign policy initiative about which there has been much misinformation. The purpose of this letter is to give you a bipartisan view of what is proposed and why, based on detailed consideration of the bill by both the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Energy and Commerce Committee.

The Administration has undertaken a series of measures to increase the cost of Cuban adventurism and to moderate Cuban foreign policy. Radio Marti is one of these measures. Its purpose it to make the Cuban people more aware of the costs to them of Castro's mismanagement at home and adventurism abroad and to provide them with the information needed to make informed judgments on these policies and actions and to try to hold their government more accountable. Radio Marti would broadcast to Cuba information and programs similar to those broadcast by Radio Free Europe (RFE) and Radio Liberty (RL) behind the Iron Curtain.

This concept of Radio Marti is based on the right of the people of Cuba "to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers," in accordance with Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Nonetheless, opponents of the measure have raised a number of questions.

Some have questioned why an AM frequency has been proposed for Radio Marti. The answer is that AM receivers are common in Cuba some 2.12 million receivers at last estimate. Shortwave receivers are not. Cuba does not use shortwave broadcasting domestically, so the average Cuban does not need to own one. Furthermore, since the Revolution, shortwave sets have been very difficult to acquire. Shortwave broadcasts would thus probably reach only the political elite. While the International Radio Regulations state that "in principle" the AM band is for domestic service, in practice it is well established that this band is also used for international broadcasting. The BBC, Deutsche Welle (West Germany), Radio Free Europe, Voice of America, Radio Moscow and Radio Havana all use the AM band in addition to shortwave for their international broadcasts.

Another question concerns the reason for the $10 million authorization for the radio. The cost of Radio Marti is not "gold plated," as has been charged, and cannot be compared to the cost of establishing a commercial station for domestic broadcasting. The closer analogy lies with Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. Radio Marti's costs include not only expensive four-tower directional antennas but also high personnel and administrative costs related to its inique research and program development requirements. These include Spanish language requirements, studios, reporters and researchers based in U.S. cities and overseas.

Some have also asked why the Voice of America could not serve Radio Marti's purposes. The VOA is a highly inapproprate entity for this purpose because VOA's purposes and operations are radically different from those of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty and thus from those proposed for Radio Marti. VOA's mission is worldwide and its primary purposes are to present world news and to express and explain U.S. official policy and American society and institutions. The Charter does not contemplate a surrogate "home service" like Radio Marti. For the same reason, Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty have maintained separate identities and operations from those of the VOA. Attempting to focus on the news of one country such as Cuba would violate the Charter of the Voice of America and would completely change the nature of its broadcating efforts.

Much concern has also been expressed about the problem of Cuban radio interference with U.S. broadcasters and whether Radio Marti will worsen this problem. These concerns are addressed in this bill, and we discussed extensively in committee, but with recognition that the problem of Cuban interference with U.S. domestic broadcasting predates Radio Marti by at least fifteen years and should be considered as separate issue. Indeed, the very broadcasting who today are most seriously damaged by Cuban interference—those in Flordia—are strongly in favor of the creation of Radio Marti. The fundamental point is that Cuban interference with broadcasting efforts in the United States wil not cease if Radio Marti does not go on the air.

Long before Radio Marti, in the mid-1960's, the Castro government embarked on a program to redesign its domestic AM broadcasting system and to initiate broadcasting directed toward the United States and other neighboring countries. New Cuban plans to increase significantly the number and power of its AM radio stations to meet both internal and external requirements were announced in 1979 as part of a five-year plan and were submitted to the International Frequency Registration Board in May 1980. Where Cuban's plans to be implemented, its stations would cause greatly increased interference with U.S. broadcasters. Cuba's broadcasting plans were made known well before our announcement in September 1981 that we intended to establish Radio Marti. The problem of increasing Cuban interference is a separate and distinct issue which will remain whether Radio Marti goes on the air or not.

The question of how Cuba would react to Radio Marti is unanswerable at this time, although logic and technology dictate three possibilities:

1. Cuba may take no action at all. The Voice of America has been broadcasting to Cuba for more than 21 years and Cuba has not seriously tried to jam or interfere with these broadcasts.

2. Cuba may seek to prevent Radio Marti's signals from reaching its Cuban audience. In this case, jamming by low-powered transmitters would be targeted to the island of Cuba, that is, to the Cuban radio receivers, and would have no appreciable effect on U.S. broadcasters, including those using the same frequency as Radio Marti. It also would not prevent reception of Radio Marti in Cuba.

3. Cuba may try counterbroadcasting, similar to its "Radio Dixie" broadcasts of the 1960's appealing to minorities in the United States. However, Cuban intentions to broadcast with high power on 1040 kHz and 1160 kHz predate Radio Marti and are not in reprisal for Radio Marti. In fact, Cuba chose 1040 kHz as a broadcast frequency, in contravention of the old North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement, of which Cuba was a signatory, before the United States chose the same frequency for Radio Marti. There is no reason to believe that Cuba will relinquish its interest in 1040 kHz if Radio Marti does not go on the air, or if Radio Marti broadcasts on another frequency.

In fact, Cuba is already broadcasting on 1160 kHz with high power, despite the rejection by the 1981 Rio Conference of Cuba's application to use that and many other frequencies. Even if Cuba uses frequencies not allocated to it, the use of directional antennas could prevent interference with U.S. domestic broadcasting. Furthermore, Cuba may broadcast to the Caribbean and Central or South America rather than to the United States.

Some have suggested that another AM frequency be chosen for Radio Marti even though the above objections still apply. Furthermore, if an off-band AM frequency were chosen it would be tantamount to a rejection of Radio Marti. Broadcasts on off-band frequencies are difficult to hear without good AM receivers, which means that part of the Cuban audience would not be reached by Radio Marti. In addition, these frequencies are not internationally regulated, which means that the United States would have no legal basis for objections to Cuban interference.

If the U.S. were to delay or back down on Radio Marti in the hope of reducing the likelihood of increased Cuban interference, Castro would interpret this as a sign of weakness. His intransigence on the interference problem would increase, and the threat to U.S. broadcasting would grow, not diminish.

The best way to solve this problem is through negotiations with Cuba, but efforts to do this have not been fruitful, either under the last Administration or this one. The Cubans showed no flexibility or interest in accommodation during bilateral talks on frequencies on several occasions last year. Their withdrawal from ITU's regional AM broadcasting conference last year after the rejection of its frequency proposals clearly ratified Cuba's outlaw status in the field of international telecommunications. Cuba appears unwilling to negotiate seriously on this issue at this time.

The State Department is very much aware of the interference problem and is working with the National Association of Broadcasters to develop a position acceptable to U.S. broadcasters should the opportunity for talking to Cuba present itself.

Radio Marti is a non-confrontational, peaceful initiative which could be implemented quickly and easily at relatively low cost. We urge your vote for H.R. 5427 without weakening amendments.

Sincerely,

James T. Broyhill, Matthew J. Rinaldo, Norman F. Lent, Edward R. Madigan, L. A. (Skip) Bafalis, Clement J. Zablocki, Dante B. Fascell, Larry Winn, Jr., Edward J. Derwinski, Dan Mica.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Puerto Rico (Mr. CORRADA).

Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5427, the Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act as it was reported by the Foreign Affairs and Energy and Commerce Committees.

This bill constitute a very important element of the U.S. foreign policy toward Cuba and is completely consistent with the realities of Cuban-American relations at present time.

It is a plain fact that Cuba, under Fidel Castro dictatorship has been continuously conducting its foreign affairs toward the United States in a provocative and aggressive way.

Cuba is exporting its Communist propaganda, arms and subversion to every corner of the world from nearby Central America, South America and the Caribbean to far away places like Africa.

Puerto Rico and its 3.2 American citizens have been constantly affected by Cuban interference with the internal affairs of our island in its relatiaonship with the United States and by the encouragement of subversive activities in Puerto Rico.

It is a very well known fact that every year the Cuban Government urges the United Nations Decolonization Committee to intervene in the U.S. domestic affairs and presses that organization to express itself in support of the independence of Puerto Rico. The ultimate goal of the Cuban Government is to transform our Puerto Rican democratic society into a Communist totalitarian regime.

In such circumstances this bill establishing Radio Marti, to disseminate our democratic values and the truth about Cuba to Cubans, is not only proper but necessary.

We, as American citizens, enjoy the privilege of living in a free democratic society in which the human being is the most valuable element. We have freedom of religion, association, expression and every other constitutional protection against tyranny. It is not proper for us to neglect our responsibility to disseminate our democratic values especially to these whose slavery is nurtured by keeping them in a state of ignorance.

I would not consider, even for a second, that any commercial or business interest would be important enough as to relinquish our responsibility.

I am sure that any technical or particular problem that may arise from the implementation of this act would be corrected within a span of time.

On behalf of my fellow Puerto Rican constituents and of the Cuban community living in Puerto Rico, I urge all my colleagues to support and vote in favor of H.R. 5427 as it was reported by the committee.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5427, providing for the broadcasting of accurate information to the people of Cuba, as amended.

At the outset, I would like to commend the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) for his expert stewardship of this important legislation and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) for his support and guidance. I would also like to thank the Committee on Energy and Commerce, in particular Chairman DINGELL, Mr. WIRTH, Mr. BROYHILL, and Mr. RINALDO for their cooperation in reporting this legislation to the House.

Mr. Chairman, this bill as amended by the two committees, represents a judicious and fair balance between U.S. foreign policy interests and domestic concerns.

With respect to our foreign policy interests, the legislation would provide the people of Cuba with accurate information about Cuba and Cuban activities worldwide. The broadcasting would be carried out under the aegis of the Board for International Broadcasting which also oversees the activities of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty.

Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty have long served as beacons of news, information and ideas to the oppressed peoples of the Soviet Union and Communist Eastern Europe. The operation of these radios is an integral part of U.S. foreign policy serving in particular our interest in promoting the free flow of information and ideas, regardless of frontiers, a right which is confirmed under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. H.R. 5427, as amended, would provide to the people of Cuba, who exist under the Marxist dicatorship of Fidel Castro, the same free market of news and information now denied to them.

The bill, as amended by both committees, recognizes that our foreign policy initiatives often have a domestic impact in the United States. Because of the possibility that the Castro government may retaliate with jamming and other interference activity which would affect domestic U.S. radio stations, the committees' amendments authorize the Federal Government to pay compensation to U.S. broadcasters for expenses they may incur as a result of any retaliatory Cuban interference.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 5427, as amended by the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Energy and Commerce is an improvement over the original executive branch request. The bill, in its present form, is both balanced and fair with respect to our foreign policy and domestic needs. I urge its approval.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 5427, legislation to authorize the establishment of Radio Marti.

The administration proposed the creation of this new radio station for broadcasting to Cuba as one of the few peaceful options available to the United States in confronting the insidious penetration of Cuban aggression in this hemisphere. By broadcasting news reports and commentaries to the people of Cuba, Radio Marti would serve the same vital role as Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty serve in broadcasting to the Soviet bloc in Europe.

For tens of millions of East Europeans, the most reliable information about their country comes from the outside world. There is no comparable source of news for those living in Cuba. The Radio Marti project is consistent with international law, which is in contrast to the Cuban Government's practice of jamming U.S. domestic stations. The illegal Cuban broadcasts have already continued more than 10 years and are a serious problem; however, we cannot base U.S. policy on some threat from the Cubans that they will increase their jamming activities. The creation of Radio Marti is an important ingredient in bringing to the Cuban people the reality of their Government's failure at home and its subversive activities abroad.

The concept of Radio Marti is based on the right of the people of Cuba "to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers," in accordance with article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Nonetheless, opponents of the measure have raised a number of questions.

Some have questioned why an AM frequency has been proposed for Radio Marti. AM receivers are common in Cuba—some 2.12 million receivers at last estimate—whereas shortwave receivers are not. The BBC, Deutsche Welle (West Germany), Radio Free Europe, Voice of America, Radio Moscow and Radio Havana all use the AM band in addition to shortwave for their international broadcasts.

Another question concerns the reason for the $10 million authorization for the radio. The cost of Radio Marti cannot be compared to the cost of establishing a commercial station for U.S. domestic broadcasting. Radio Marti can be compared with Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. Its costs include not only expensive four-tower directional antennas but also high personnel and administrative costs required by its unique research and program development requirements. These include Spanish language requirements, studios, reporters, and researchers based in U.S. cities and overseas.

Some have also asked why the Voice of America could not serve Radio Marti's purposes. VOA's purposes and operations are radically different from those for Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty and thus from those proposed for Radio Marti. VOA's mission is worldwide and its primary purposes are to present world news and to express and explain U.S. official policy and American society and institutions. The question of how Cuba would react to Radio Marti cannot be answered at this time, although logic and technology dictate three possibilities:

One, Cuba may take no action at all. The Voice of America has been broadcasting to Cuba for more than 21 years and Cuba has not seriously tried to jam or interfere with these broadcasts.

Two, Cuba may seek to prevent Radio Marti's signals from reaching its Cuban audience, jamming by low-powered transmitters Cuban radio receivers. This would have no appreciable effect on U.S. broadcasters, including those using the same frequency as Radio Marti. It also would not prevent reception of Radio Marti in Cuba.

Three, Cuba may try counterbroadcasting. However, Cuban intentions to broadcast with high power on 1040 kHz and 1160 kHz predate Radio Marti and are not in reprisal for Radio Marti. In fact, Cuba chose 1040 kHz as a broadcast frequency, in contravention of the old North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement, of which Cuba was a signatory, before the United States chose the same frequency for Radio Marti. There is no reason to believe that Cuba will relinquish its interest in 1040 kHz if Radio Marti does not go on the air, or if Radio Marti broadcasts on another frequency.

In fact, Cuba is already broadcasting on 1160 kHz with high power, despite the rejection by the 1981 Rio conference of Cuba's application to use that and many other frequencies. Even if Cuba uses frequencies not allocated to it, the use of directional antennas could prevent interference with U.S. domestic broadcasting. Furthermore, Cuba may broadcast to the Caribbean and Central or South America rather than to the United States.

Even with the establishment of Radio Marti, the United States will still remain far behind the Soviet Union and Cuba in the amount of resources and time devoted to international radio broadcasts. I believe it is essential that we meet this challenge and provide for the creation of this new voice of truth for the Cuban people.

It is often charged, and by many in this body, that the United States is losing the battle of ideas and that we are not doing what we should to counter the Soviet Union. Unfortunately, although we clearly have the best of the argument, that is not being made known to the world, and especially to Cuba. Radio Marti will be an important element in the battle of ideas.

I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 5427.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN).

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5427 to provide for the broadcasting of accurate information to the people of Cuba and for other purposes.

As in other Communist countries around the world, the people of Cuba have for more then 20 years been denied access to an uncensored view of their country and the world. They are a captive target of state controlled dissemination of information. Between Radio Moscow and the other Cuban domestic programs, they have been subjected to a constant barrage of pro-Soviet, anti-American propaganda with little or no knowledge of their own Government's exploits.

The truth is a precious commodity for all people. In Europe we have all seen the important role that Radio Free Europe has played giving hope to the millions behind the Iron Curtain. Most recently we saw how important RFE was to the Polish people as a shining light in the darkness of Soviet-dominated official Communist media.

The establishment of Radio Marti will help provide a type of domestic radio service for Cuba that complements the Voice of America. As the VOA focuses on world news and the U.S. official views of those events, Radio Free Europe, Radio Liberty, and now Radio Marti will provide uncensored news on the domestic events of the nations they serve.

In the mission statement of the Board for International Broadcasting which oversees the operation of Radio Free Europe, it describes what such radio stations are designed to do and not to do. Likewise, Radio Marti will "seek to create neither 'American Radio,' in the narrow national sense, nor 'exile radio,' sense of organized political opposition, but an international radio. It is international in the breadth of its coverage, its freedom from national or sectarian bias, its dedication to the open communication of accurate information, and a broad range of democratic ideas."

The proposed new radio broadcasts to Cuba will reach the audience most likely to influence the Cuban Government, the Cuban people. They deserve the right to know what the Castro regime is doing in their name and what they themselves must endure at home and abroad to support those policies. As stated in a Miami Herald editorial last fall (October 6, 1981):

There is no freedom of expression in Cuba. The flow of information is tightly controlled by the Communist dictatorship. As long as that remains true, the U.S. Government has a right—even a duty—to fill the void by broadcasting to Mr. Castro's captives.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH).

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in very strong support of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, the most powerful force in the world is still "what people think." But because it is an intangible it is more difficult for some to appreciate this concept. Therefore, we spend billions on physical hardware for military defense but peanuts on the most important tool in our arsenal, the ideas of hope and democracy.

For more than 22 years the Cuban people have lived in a police state. They have been denied access to information, and have been subjected to intentionally distorted and false information. The security of many nations is threatened seriously by Cuban activities. Radio Marti will be informing the Cuban people of this fact. It will attempt to counteract the propoganda dumped on the Cuban people by telling them the truth. It is the Cuban people's right to know what their Government is doing not only to them, but to millions of others.

Radio Marti will carry news about Cuba to Cuba. This would provide a balance to the current broadcasting it now receives by Radio Moscow, which is the only international radio service with special programming targeted to Cuba.

A consulting firm surveyed Cubans who fled their home country and the results showed the people still living in Cuba want and need to know the truth about what is going on in their country. It would be much wiser to spend dollars informing Cuban people of the truth than having to spend those same dollars on military aid to counteract the misconceptions and propaganda the Cubans now receive. The Cuban people deserve the truth. Radio Marti will tell the truth.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH).

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding, and I will reserve any further comments until next week.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Florida used the words "humorous, ridiculous, and frivolous," which I think is probably a relevant description of the piece of legislation before us.

I rise in opposition to the bill.

As chairman of the Telecommunications Subcommittee, my concern over this legislation relates very strongly to the devastating impact that the establishment of Radio Marti would have on American broadcasters and the radio listening public.

There are a variety of concerns that are very, very serious in this, related to a rampant cold war mentality that exists, and is irrelevant in 1982.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the bill. As chairman of the Telecommunications Subcommittee my initial concern over this legislation related to the devastating impact the establishment of Radio Marti would have on American broadcasters and the radio listening public. After referral of this bill to my subcommittee and consideration of it by the full Energy and Commerce Committee, I remain convinced that the "Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act" represents an ill-conceived proposal which is likely to have extremely harmful consequences to American broadcasters and their audiences.

The Energy and Commerce Committee's jurisdiction over this bill is limited to the issues involving interference caused by the inevitable Cuban retaliation to Radio Marti's operation. Our committee adopted an amendment which gives domestic broadcasters some very limited protection against this threat. However, it is my firm belief that if Radio Marti becomes operational along the lines proposed by the administration, there is no way our broadcast industry and the public it serves can be properly protected against the Cuban interference which will ensue. Moreover, beyond these issues related to the integrity of the Nation's broadcast system, I have another grave concern with this legislation. To state it as plain and simply as possible—Radio Marti is a waste of the taxpayer's dollar—it is a facility which is totally unnecessary in order that its purported foreign policy objective be met.

The proponents of this legislation argue that it is purely speculative whether the Cuban Government will retaliate against Radio Marti broadcasting news and information to the Cuban people. But any realistic assessment of this situation leads one inevitably to the conclusion that the probabilities of Cuban interference are great, and leads me to ask the question, is it fair to ask the broadcast industry to assume this heavy burden which will be cast upon it?

The Cuban Government has threatened to build a 500 kilowatt station—that is 10 times more powerful than the most powerful American broadcast station—in order to block Radio Marti from reaching the Cuban people. Not only would this render Radio Marti useless but would wreak havoc with our own airwaves. Such Cuban countermeasures could also take the form of counterbroadcasting propaganda to the United States, jamming Radio Marti's broadcasts, constructing a high-powered transmitter on Radio Marti's frequency, or simply exacerbating interference problems in general. In fact, if Radio Marti incites the Cubans into moving ahead with the frequency shifts and new station inventory it proposed last fall, over 200 AM radio stations in 32 States and the District of Columbia would suffer significant interference. Such countermeasures would literally devastate the U.S. broadcast industry and cost broadcasters millions of dollars to overcome.

There can be no doubt that Cuba is an international telecommunications "renegade" that has no intention of abiding by international agreements in this area, and, thus, Radio Marti is nothing more than needless provocation. Cuba is already operating a high powered station that is causing interference as far away as Salt Lake City and which the Cuban Government states is intended as retaliation against Radio Marathon, the Voice of America station already broadcasting into Cuba. I am extremely concerned that in an effort to further this administration's foreign policy objectives, Radio Marti could well lead to a radio war with Cuba—and its victims will not be Fidel Castro's government, but rather, American broadcasters and radio listeners.

But this issue aside, there is simply no need for Radio Marti, and the proposal represents a totally wasteful expenditure of Federal funds. This bill authorizes $17.7 million for Radio Marti. The people of Cuba are already able to listen to the Voice of America's Radio Marathon, as well as to our own commercial radio stations in south Florida. What could possibly give the Cuban people a better sense of American life and truthful news reporting than being able to tune into these commercial Spanish language stations? I do not believe that the Government should spend any money at all for Radio Marti in light of the administration's proposed budget cuts in funding for public broadcasting which bring news and information to the American public. In fact, the administration has recommended totally abolishing the very limited Federal program that provides assistance for the construction of public broadcasting stations in parts of the country which are presently unable to receive public radio. This is extremely disturbing in light of the administration's gold-plated request for this project which seeks funding far in excess of the cost of constructing such a facility.

I urge my colleagues, at the very least, to join me in adopting the Energy and Commerce Committee amendments which provide some limited protection for American broadcasters, but further urge them to join with me in opposition to this legislation.

RADIO WAR WITH CUBA

One can imagine how indignant Ronald Reagan would be if a Democratic Administration spent money it didn't have to create a superfluous propaganda station, all to placate an ideological claque. That pretty well describes his Administration's determination to establish Radio Marti, to broadcast to Cuba. The Navy says it is already building four 250-foot antennas in Key West, even before Congress has voted a dime for this objectionable and extravagant project.

About the only argument for the station is that Fidel Castro is threatening a radio counterattack if Radio Marti is built. Cuba could send signals that would interfere with broadcasts of 200 AM stations in 32 states. No one would want to appear to yield to such Castro bluster.

But that aside, what affirmative reasons are there to build the station? Does the White House really believe that Cubans need special propaganda to expose the lapses of Communism? In truth, what has most unsettled Mr. Castro's tyranny are the stories told by more than 100,000 visiting exiles of their success in the United States. Perversely, in order to look tough on Cuba, the Reagan Administration has made traveling to Havana harder, not easier.

The evident reason for starting Radio Marti is to appease Congressional right-wingers and provide employment for loyalists like F. Clifford White, recently named to head the station. Mr. White managed Barry Goldwater's 1964 run for the Presidency and James Buckley's Conservative Party Senate victory in New York in 1970.

Building antennas before Congress even votes the $10-million "start-up" costs may not be legal, and those masts may be usable for defense, as the State Department argues. But starting a radio war on Cuba promises nothing more useful than static.

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 5427, the Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act. This legislation authorizes the establishment of the administration's ill-conceived Radio Marti project, which purportedly would broadcast the truth to the Cuban people.

After having been reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, this legislation was sequentially referred to the Committee on Energy and Commerce for consideration of portions of the legislation falling within the committee's jurisdiction over telecommunications. The Commerce Committee adopted amendments designed to protect the integrity of the U.S. broadcasting system and the jurisdiction of the Federal Communications Commission. However, the very operation of Radio Marti on the AM band, as proposed by the administration, poses a serious threat of interference to the domestic radio broadcasting industry that could deprive the listening public of valuable programing that is currently available.

Radio Marti is a blatant example of this administration's skewed spending priorities. At a time when the administration has cut funding for public broadcasting to the bone, it proposes to spend $17.7 million for radio broadcasting that may never reach the Cuban people due to the very real possibility that the Cuban Government will jam Radio Marti's signals. This jamming could disrupt broadcasts emanating from over 200 U.S. radio stations in 32 States.

The impacts of Radio Marti on the domestic radio industry were not even publicly aired until after the proposal was submitted to the Congress. But these impacts are of little concern to the administration, which views this project as a game of chicken with Fidel Castro. The product of this rigidly ideological cold war mentality is a project with speculative benefits at best and serious adverse domestic consequences at worst.

While the stated Goal of Radio Marti is laudable, the numerous problems surrounding the cost effectiveness, technical feasibility, and sociopolitical impacts of Radio Marti demand that this proposal be shelved. These problems are identified in the report of the Committee on Energy and Commerce and I urge the Members to read the committee's report before voting on this bill next week.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point an editorial which appeared in today's New York Times that concisely describes the defects of Radio Marti and its highly questionable foreign policy justifications.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Members to reject this legislation. The editorial follows:

[From the New York Times, July 23, 1982]

RADIO WAR WITH CUBA

Perversely, in order to look tough on Cuba, the Reagan Administration has made traveling to Havana harder, not easier.

The evident reason for starting Radio Marti is to appease Congressional right-wingers and provide employment for loyalists like F. Clifford White, recently named to head the station. Mr. White managed Barry Goldwater's 1964 run for the Presidency and James Buckley's Conservative Party Senate victory in New York in 1970.

Building antennas before Congress even votes the $10-million "start-up" costs may not be legal, and those masts may be usable for defense, as the State Department argues. But starting a radio war on Cuba promises nothing more useful than static.●

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. LELAND).

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in oppostition to this legislation. I would ask that the record reflect that I be associated with the remarks of the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH), the chairman of the Telecommunications Subcommittee.

It is my hope that the House will exercise its ability to look beyond the agitated and provocative rhetoric of the administration and defeat this legislation. H.R. 5247 is poorly conceived and wasteful. It richly deserves the term "boondoggle."

Three points must be made about Radio Marti:

First, it will not do what it is intended to do. Flooding the Cuban airwaves with midfrequency broadcasts from the United States telling people in Cuba that their human, political, and economic liberties are being abridged will change nothing. The Reagan administration cannot have it both ways. If the Cuban Government is politically inclined and strong enough to subjugate its people, it is probably strong enough to handle the discontent the Radio Marti broadcasts are intended to foment.

It also disturbs me that the White House and the State Department believe it is necessary to spend $18 million for duplicative radio broadcasts designed in part to tell people whose freedoms have been abridged and whose lives have been adversely affected by the Castro government that their freedoms have been abridged and their lives affected. They were probably the first to know. That is an idea very much like Ronald Reagan addressing the Nation and beginning the speech by saying "some of you out there in America are poor."

The truth is, at a technical level, most of the Radio Marti broadcasts will not be heard by the people of Cuba or at the very best, the static will be punctuated by an occasional burst of anti-Castro rhetoric. The Cubans have made it clear that they will jam the Radio Marti broadcasts, And by rejecting the use of a shortwave frequency, which is more difficult to jam, the administration has made the Cubans' job easier.

If we are really concerned about improving the lot of the Cuban people; if we are really concerned about offsetting the influence of the Castro government in Central America; if we are really concerned about countering Soviet influence in Havana, and through Havana, in Latin America—what we need is a rational foreign policy that allows us the same diplomatic relationship and communication with Cuba that we maintain with the Soviet Union and China. A new batch of anti-Castro radio broadcasts will not only fail to improve the lot of the Cuban people, it will make not only fail to improve the lot of the Cuban people, it will make it even more difficult for some future and enlightened administration to open lines of communication with Cuba—communication which will enhance our national security and serve our foreign policy interests.

My second major objection to Radio Marti involves the technical problems the system will create for American broadcasters. Existing Cuban radio broadcasts already create frequency interference for American radio stations, not only in Florida and along the gulf coast, but in States much farther north. It is anticipated, by supporters and opponents of Radio Marti alike, that the anti-Castro broadcasts will produce a similar effort by the Cuban Government, but at a power level five times higher than Radio Marti. We are talking about signal interference that will adversely affect a substantial number of radio stations and millions of listeners.

At the very least, the Radio Marti legislation should have given some consideration to the technical problems which will result from the anti-Castro broadcasts. They should have required, as has been suggested to the State Department, that the Radio Marti broadcasts be on shortwave, as are the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe broadcasts.

This bill should also have required, given the administration's desire to take over an existing AM frequency for Radio Marti, that the process of allocating that frequency be in the hands of an independent agency with technical expertise in this area and with a rulemaking process that will allow public-interest questions to be aired and considered. The F.C.C., not the N.T.I.A., should be responsible for the technical allocation of the Radio Marti frequency. But knowing that the time delay associated with a conscientious and thorough consideration of that allocation would further subject the Radio Marti concept to public scrutiny, the State Department rejected F.C.C. jurisdiction—after agreeing to such jurisdiction in a meeting with members of the committee.

But how does the administration deal with the serious technical problems which will result from Radio Marti? They are asking us to approve nearly $8 million, almost half of the total cost of this legislation, to compensate U.S. broadcasters subject to signal interference or frequency displacement. Our answer ought to be a resounding "No."

My third objection to Radio Marti combines the first two. Radio Marti broadcasts will not succeed in altering the nature of the government in Cuba or the political deprivations or human rights problems which have befallen the Cuban people because the broadcasts will not be heard in Cuba. Radio Marti will succeed in creating serious problems for U.S. broadcasters. And in the process, we will allow the administration to spend $18 million on this boondoggle. That is $18 million that will not be spent on school lunches or health care or job training or cost-of-living adjustments in benefits for the elderly and the disadvantaged. That is $18 million down the drain, as part of a seriously misguided foreign policy and at a time when we are telling the American people they must sacrifice and accept less in benefits from essential programs because this is a time that calls for austerity. Frankly, if we pass this legislation, we have given lie to that austerity argument once and for all.

And what does the adminstration say in the face of these serious objections to Radio Marti? They say, and with a straight face, that Radio Marti is a matter of national security. And they have the audacity to tell the Congress that in questioning the rationale behind Radio Marti, and its chaotic effects, that we are meddling in U.S. foreign policy. If the Congress does not have a right to address foreign policy questions, who does? That argument gives voice to an arrogance that we must not tolerate. It is an insult to this body.

And the arrogance of the Reagan administration concerning Radio Marti is not limited to their rhetoric. They are playing an appropriations shell game with us. They have begun construction of the towers they intend to use for Radio Marti before we have decided the issue.

The administration believes that if they raise the flag of national security and assert that only the administration is capable of properly considering such foreign policy questions, Congress will roll over and play dead and give them whatever they want. I don't believe Congress is prepared to accept such arrogance. We have demonstrated our willingness to accept our constitutional responsibility to address foreign policy matters in this body, either directly or through the authorization and appropriation processes.

If we are truly concerned about the plight of the Cuban people * * * if we believe that Castro's Cuba represents a national security question for the United States and for other Latin American Nations—we must demand that the Reagan administration formulate a policy toward Cuba that will allow this country to use political and economic influence in direct contact with Cuba, just as we seek to influence policies in Moscow and Peking and other Communist capitals through a diplomatic relationship. That would be a reasonable course of action for this body, given our deep concerns about Castro's Cuba. Giving the administration $18 million for the Radio Marti boondoggle is far from a reasonable response. It amounts to an abbrogation of our good judgment and our constitutional responsibilities.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in support of H.R. 5427, which authorizes the creation of Radio Marti.

This station will broadcast to the Cuban people—not propaganda—but news, entertainment, and other programs, just as if they had a free, uncensored station in their own country.

Radio Marti is an important foreign policy initiative, one which is enthusiastically backed by the President, the State Department, and a blue ribbon, nonpartisan Presidential panel.

The bill was overwhelmingly reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee by a vote of 20 to 5, and by the Energy and Commerce Committee, on which I serve, by a vote of 23 to 3.

In the Commerce Committee, we adopted an amendment designed to protect the interests of U.S. radio broadcasters that National Telecommunications and Information Administration, which will choose Radio Marti's frequency, must insure that the frequency chosen will produce the least interference from any Cuban countermeasures.

The amendment also requires that NTIA receive public comment on the choice of frequency.

Our action assures that NTIA will fully consider the interests of all affected parties.

One issue underlies the criticisms that have been made by a minority against Radio Marti.

It is the fear that if Radio Marti broadcasts on the AM band, Castro will retaliate by counterbroadcasting on the same frequency, thereby interfering with American broadcasting in this country.

Radio Marti has to be on AM because most Cubans have only AM radios: They have virtually no access to shortwave receivers and would be subject to imprisonment if they utilized a shortwave radio.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the central issue, and it goes to the very existence of Radio Marti.

The truth of the matter is that the fear of Cuban interference is largely unfounded.

Such interference is completely speculative. Castro could more effectively keep Radio Marti from his people by jamming, which would not affect broadcasters in the United States.

With respect to counterbroadcasting, Castro has been causing interference with U.S. broadcasters since the mid 1960's.

In 1979, he announced a 5-year broadcasting plan, that, if implemented, would greatly increase such interference.

These plans were made known well before Radio Marti was proposed on September 23, 1981.

Castro's actions demonstrate that if he wants to broadcast propaganda into our country, he will do so, and that he will choose whatever frequency he wants, whether it's the one chosen by our Government for Radio Marti or any other.

Even if Castro tries to destroy Radio Marti by counterbroadcasting on the same frequency, he would cause major problems in countries with which he tries to maintain good relations, such as Mexico.

Furthermore, his station would itself lose effectiveness because of mutual interference with any affected U.S. station as well as Radio Marti.

That brings us to the main point, Radio Marti is not the cause of Cuban interference with U.S. broadcasters. Cuban interference is a separate issue which has existed for over 15 years.

Mr. Chairman, there is a fundamental issue at stake in this debate. If we appease Castro by abandoning Radio Marti—or by crippling it, as the proposed amendments would do—Castro will, like all dictators, see our action as a retreat. He will be more likely, not less, to interfere with U.S. broadcasting in the future if we let him dictate our actions today.

Enactment of this bill will convey our determination to stand up for our rights under international broadcasting treaties and will further the interests of our broadcasters, not harm them.

Enactment of H.R. 5427 will also bring some light into the darkness that envelops the Cuban people.

Radio Marti will communicate information and ideas that will enable them to think and act like all free men and women, instead of as puppets of their leader, who usurps their rights and sends young Cubans to distant countries to fight as mercenaries, and in many cases, to lose their lives.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is, in the highest sense, human rights legislation.

I urge enactment of H.R. 5427 to communicate the truth and offer hope to the people of Cuba.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL).

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5427, the Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act. This legislation has been requested by the administration and is an important part of U.S. foreign policy toward Cuba. It was favorably reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee by a vote of 20 to 5. It was then sequentially referred to the Energy and Commerce Committee, where it was again favorably reported by a vote of 23 to 3.

The bill would establish a new Government radio station, to be called Radio Marti, which would be similar to Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. Its purpose is to broadcast to the Cuban people objective information about Cuba and Cuban activities throughout the world.

Our country needs to counteract the steady barrage of anti-American propaganda which the Cuban people receive from the Castro government and from Radio Moscow, the only international broadcast service targeted specifically to Cuba. Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty are known and relied upon by millions of listeners in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union for their objective information and interesting programing. Radio Marti will offer the same wide appeal to the Cuban people, who have been deprived of this type of programing under Castro's government. Such an effort to inform the Cuban people is essential in view of the increasingly belligerent activities of the Cuban Government in the Caribbean and throughout the world.

We must insure that the bill establishing Radio Marti does not set up roadblocks in the way of its speedy and effective implementation. For example, it is vital that Radio Marti operate on the AM radio band rather than on shortwave. Shortwave is not the predominant means of receiving radio programing in Cuba, as it is in other parts of the world. In order to reach the largest Cuban audience, the use of the AM band is essential for Radio Marti.

It is also important to avoid lengthy and unnecessary delays in selecting a frequency for Radio Marti. The Energy and Commerce Committee amendment provides that the National Telecommunications and Information Administration (NTIA) will assign a frequency for Radio Marti. This agency, which is a part of the Department of Commerce, is charged with managing the Government's share of the frequency spectrum, and it is appropriate that it select the frequency for Radio Marti.

Assignment of Radio Marti's frequency by NTIA will also avoid the long delays which are inherent in any proceeding before the Federal Communications Commission. An FCC proceeding, with judicial review, could well delay the implementation of Radio Marti for up to 6 years. Such a delay would, in effect, be the death knell for Radio Marti.

At the same time, the bill provides that the potential impact on U.S. broadcasters is taken into consideration in the establishment of Radio Marti. NTIA is required to receive public comment from interested parties and must consider certain factors set forth in the legislation affecting interference and harm to broadcasters which may result from countermeasures taken by Cuba.

I urge the adoption of the Energy and Commerce Committee amendments and the passage of the bill.

At this point, I would call attention to Members the views of Representatives ZABLOCKI, FASCELL, WINN, DERWINSKI, MICA, BROYHILL, RINALDO, LENT, MADIGAN, and BAFALIS expressed in a "Dear Colleague" letter.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: H.R. 5427, to establish a new radio station, "Radio Marti," to broadcast to Cuba, is scheduled for floor action on Friday, July 23. This is an important foreign policy initiative about which there has been much misinformation. The purpose of this letter is to give you a bipartisan view of what is proposed and why, based on detailed consideration of the bill by both the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Energy and Commerce Committee.

The Administration has undertaken a series of measures to increase the cost of Cuban adventurism and to moderate Cuban foreign policy. Radio Marti is one of these measures. Its purpose is to make the Cuban people more aware of the costs to them of Castro's mismanagement at home and adventurism abroad and to provide them with the information needed to make informed judgments on these policies and actions and to try to hold their government more accountable. Radio Marti would broadcast to Cuba information and programs similar to those broadcast by Radio Free Europe (RFE) and Radio Liberty (RL) behind the Iron Curtain.

This concept of Radio Marti is based on the right of the people of Cuba "to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers," in accordance with Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Nonetheless, opponents of the measure have raised a number of questions.

Some have questioned why an AM frequency has been proposed for Radio Marti. The answer is that AM receivers are common in Cuba—some 2.12 million receivers at last estimate. Shortwave receivers are not. Cuba does not use shortwave broadcasting domestically, so the average Cuban does not need to own one. Furthermore, since the Revolution, shortwave sets have been very difficult to acquire. Shortwave broadcasts would thus probably reach only the political elite. While the International Radio Regulations state that "in principle" the AM band is for domestic service, in practice it is well established that this band is also used for international broadcasting. The BBC, Deutsche Welle (West Germany), Radio Free Europe, Voice of America, Radio Moscow and Radio Havana all use the AM band in addition to shortwave for their international broadcasts.

Another question concerns the reason for the $10 million authorization for the radio. The cost of Radio Marti is not "gold plated," as has been charged, and cannot be compared to the cost of establishing a commercial station for domestic broadcasting. The closer analogy lies with Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. Radio Marti's costs include not only expensive four-tower directional antennas but also high personnel and administrative costs related to its unique research and program development requirements. These include Spanish language requirements, studios, reporters and researchers based in U.S. cities and overseas.

Some have also asked why the Voice of America could not serve Radio Marti's purposes. The VOA is a highly inappropriate entity for this purpose because VOA's purposes and operations are radically different from those of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty and thus from those proposed for Radio Marti. VOA's mission is worldwide and its primary purposes are to present world news and to express and explain U.S. official policy and American society and institutions. The Charter does not contemplate a surrogate "home service" like Radio Marti. For the same reason, Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty have maintained separate identities and operations from those of the VOA. Attempting to focus on the news of one country such as Cuba would violate the Charter of the Voice of America and would completely change the nature of its broadcasting efforts.

Much concern has also been expressed about the problem of Cuban radio interference with U.S. broadcasters and whether Radio Marti will worsen this problem. These concerns are addressed in this bill, and were discussed extensively in committee, but with recognition that the problem of Cuban interference with U.S. domestic broadcasting predates Radio Marti by at least fifteen years and should be considered as a separate issue. Indeed, the very broadcasters who today are most seriously damaged by Cuban interference—those in Florida—are strongly in favor of the creation of Radio Marti. The fundamental point is that Cuban interference with broadcasting efforts in the United States will not cease if Radio Marti does not go on the air.

Long before Radio Marti, in the mid-1960's, the Castro government embarked on a program to redesign its domestic AM broadcasting system and to initiate broadcasting directed toward the United States and other neighboring countries. New Cuban plans to increase significantly the number and power of its AM radio stations to meet both internal and external requirements were announced in 1979 as part of a five-year plan and were submitted to the International Frequency Registration Board in May 1980. Were Cuba's plans to be implemented, its stations would cause greatly increased interference with U.S. broadcasters. Cuba's broadcasting plans were made known well before our announcement in September 1981 that we intended to establish Radio Marti. The problem of increasing Cuban interference is a separate and distinct issue which will remain whether Radio Marti goes on the air or not.

The question of how Cuba would react to Radio Marti is unanswerable at this time, although logic and technology dictate three possibilities:

1. Cuba may take no action at all. The Voice of America has been broadcasting to Cuba for more than 21 years and Cuba has not seriously tried to jam or interfere with these broadcasts.

2. Cuba may seek to prevent Radio Marti's signals from reaching its Cuban audience. In this case, jamming by low-powered transmitters would be targeted to the island of Cuba, that is, to the Cuban radio receivers, and would have no appreciable effect on U.S. broadcasters, including those using the same frequency as Radio Marti. It also would not prevent reception of Radio Marti in Cuba.

3. Cuba may try counterbroadcasting, similar to its "Radio Dixie" broadcasts of the 1960's appealing to minorities in the United States. However, Cuban intentions to broadcast with high power on 1040 kHz and 1160 kHz predate Radio Marti and are not in reprisal for Radio Marti. In fact, Cuba chose 1040 kHz as a broadcast frequency, in contravention of the old North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement, of which Cuba was a signatory, before the United States chose the same frequency for Radio Marti. There is no reason to believe that Cuba will relinquish its interest in 1040 kHz if Radio Marti does not go on the air, or if Radio Marti broadcasts on another frequency.

In fact, Cuba is already broadcasting on 1160 kHz with high power, despite the rejection by the 1981 Rio Conference of Cuba's application to use that and many other frequencies. Even if Cuba uses frequencies not allocated to it, the use of directional antennas could prevent interference with U.S. domestic broadcasting. Furthermore, Cuba may broadcast to the Caribbean and Central or South America rather than to the United States.

Some have suggested that another AM frequency be chosen for Radio Marti even though the above objections still apply. Furthermore, if an off-band AM frequency were chosen it would be tantamount to a rejection of Radio Marti. Broadcasts on off-band frequencies are difficult to hear without good AM receivers, which means that part of the Cuban audience would not be reached by Radio Marti. In addition, these frequencies are not internationally regulated, which means that the United States would have no legal basis for objections to Cuban interference.

If the U.S. were to delay or back down on Radio Marti in the hope of reducing the likelihood of increased Cuban interference, Castro would interpret this as a sign of weakness. His intransigence on the interference problem would increase, and the threat to U.S. broadcasting would grow, not diminish.

The best way to solve this problem is through negotiations with Cuba, but efforts to do this have not been fruitful, either under the last Administration or this one. The Cubans showed no flexibility or interest in accommodation during bilateral talks on frequencies on several occasions last year. Their withdrawal from ITU's regional AM broadcasting conference last year after the rejection of its frequency proposals clearly ratified Cuba's outlaw status in the field of international telecommunications. Cuba appears unwilling to negotiate seriously on this issue at this time.

The State Department is very much aware of the interference problem and is working with the National Association of Broadcasters to develop a position acceptable to U.S. broadcasters should the opportunity for talking to Cuba present itself.

Radio Marti is a non-confrontational, peaceful initiative which could be implemented quickly and easily at relatively low cost. We urge your vote for H.R. 5427 without weakening amendments.

Sincerely,

James T. Broyhill, Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Energy and Commerce; Matthew J. Rinaldo; Norman F. Lent; Edward R. Madigan; L. A. (Skip) Bafalis; Clement J. Zablocki, Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs; Dante B. Fascell, Chairman, Subcommittee on International Operations; Larry Winn, Jr.; Edward J. Derwinski; Dan Mica.

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. LENT).

Mr. LENT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5427, the Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act authorizing the operation of Radio Marti. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL), the gentleman from California (Mr. LAGOMARSINO), and the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RINALDO), for their leadership in bringing this matter before us.

Radio Marti will be transmitted over the AM band from a station in south Florida to the citizens of Cuba. The bill recognizes the importance of broadcasting over the AM band, as opposed to shortwave, because more Cubans have access to AM radio. Radio Marti will be important to the foreign policy of the United States in the Caribbean, and especially important to the information-starved Cuban people. Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Enders said it best when he remarked that Radio Marti will give the Cubans "the means to hold their Government accountable."

There are some who question the usefulness of such broadcasting to Soviet-dominated countries, but I think we need only look at the success of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty over the past 30 years to see the value of these programs. Those of us fortunate enough to live in a democracy recognize the importance of many sources of information. I believe we have a responsibility to extend to the oppressed citizens of the world the same privilege we take for granted here at home. The broadcasting of news and information from the West may not break down the barriers the Soviets have erected, but it will give those oppressed citizens some hope that might otherwise have been lost, and reason to consider the fate and direction of their nation.

I strongly urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 5427 represents an important component in our country's efforts to counter Castro's subversive activities throughout the hemisphere, as well as to promote one of our Nation's most cherished principles—the free flow of information and ideas. As it presently stands, the United States has no broadcasting entity which specifically communicates the truth about Cuba to the Cuban people. While the Voice of America does broadcast to countries in Latin America, its coverage of news and events is meant to be general in nature, and highlights occurrences on a worldwide basis. What H.R. 5427 would do, is to establish a broadcasting service that details news of specific interest and concern to the Cuban people. We already provide such a service to the oppressed people of Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. I am speaking of Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe. This same concept is embodied in this legislation before us. It would set up radio broadcasting to Cuba, commonly known as Radio Marti.

Once established, Radio Marti would fill a crucial void in information for the Cuban people. A void created by Castro's Communist domination of all information sources within Cuba with Radio Marti in service, the Cuban people would have knowledge of Castro's economic failures at home, as well as his subversive adventures in Central America and Africa. The Cuban people would be able to learn about their country's efforts to undermine democratically elected governments in our own region. And they would obtain additional information concerning the Soviet Union's domination of important elements within Cuba.

This bill is important not only because it serves as a counterweight to Castro's propaganda machine, but because it is consistent with America's own philosophy of affording an opportunity for the Cuban people to hear all sides of an issue and to decide, for themselves, where the truth lies. Castro has been filling the airwaves for years with propaganda and rhetoric designed to delude his people into accepting the Communist version of reality. I believe we have an obligation, not only to the people of Cuba, but to our own citizens and to millions more in the hemisphere, to insure that the people of Cuba have a chance to hear the truth about Castro's activities. To delay in approving this legislation, is to risk the further spread of Castro's influence beyond the already established beachheads in Nicaragua and Grenada.

I should note that the International Telecommunication Union, an organ of the United Nations, has already approved our use of certain radio frequencies for Radio Marti.

I urge the adoption of H.R. 5427. It is in America's long-term interest to do so, and it is in the long-term interests of the Cuban people as well.●

● Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Chairman, today we are debating the merits of directing special U.S. broadcasts to the people of Cuba. I have developed a special interest in this subject in my role as chairman of the Subcommittee on Government Information and Individual Rights. The subcommittee has oversight jurisdiction over all government international broadcasting activities.

Last October, my subcommittee conducted a hearing on the administration's proposal to create Radio Marti. As chairman of the subcommittee I support legitimate efforts to promote the free flow of information, not only within this country but throughout the world. I strongly support the international broadcasts sponsored by this country in the past. Therefore, I would be delighted if I could give undivided support to Radio Marti. Unfortunately, I cannot.

At my subcommittee's hearing, I learned that the United States has previous experience in broadcasting to Cuba. Not many Members are aware of those old programs. Before starting a new broadcast, we should look at the record and see what can be learned from the past.

In 1962 the Voice of America began broadcasting a program to Cuba for approximately 5 hours daily. By 1973, the program broadcast schedule had dwindled to a half hour per day. On July 1, 1974, the special Cuban programing went off the air. The program was reportedly phased out because its continuation was not warranted due to lack of news. Items previously carried in the Cuban broadcasts were continued in a new format and broadcast to Cuba, the Caribbean, and Latin America.

It is still unclear what Radio Marti will broadcast to Cuba. Through the Voice of America, the United States presently broadcasts 5½ hours of Spanish language programing to Cuba and other countries of Latin America every day. The VOA program includes news of the United States as well as news of international importance and special significance to Latin America. In addition to the U.S. Government broadcasts, Cuba can receive U.S. commercial radio broadcasts. Obviously, the Cuban people are not isolated from the rest of the world.

I asked the administration to explain what information Radio Marti will provide. I was told that the citizens of Cuba will receive information regarding the activities of its Government. One example mentioned was the presence of Cuban troops in Angola. Of course, I agree that this is information that the Cuban people should have. The same news should be of interest to the rest of Latin America and I assume that it is presently a part of current VOA broadcasts to Cuba and the rest of Latin America.

What other programing could we broadcast that would be of special interest to the people of Cuba? It may sound like a bad joke but the only direct answer I received to this question was that Radio Marti could broadcast live baseball games. Baseball is certainly the great American pastime, and I am delighted that there are others in the world who appreciate the game. I just wonder whether we need to spend so much money to export baseball to Cuba.

At the time of the subcommittee hearing, I was deeply disturbed by the lack of organization regarding this project. The administration witnesses who testified at the hearing admitted that they were unprepared to argue their case in support of Radio Marti. That was almost 9 months ago. Today, just like the questions about programing, other important questions about Radio Marti remain unanswered.

One of these questions relates to the resources that will be devoted to Cuban broadcasting. Limited financing has hindered the ability of both Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, and the Voice of America to reach their designated audiences in Iron Curtain nations and elsewhere in the world with a strong, reliable signal. Due to lack of funding, VOA continues to operate vacuum tube studio equipment purchased in 1954.

Further, research and development funds have not been made available to Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty to study the effects of jamming or to assess future technological needs. Only this week, the President acknowledged the serious nature of these deficiencies. I sincerely believe that the $17.7 million proposed for the operation of Radio Marti would be put to better use updating the operations of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty and the Voice of America.

At a time of strict budget cuts, I wonder if it makes sense to spend so much money on a project of questionable value and one that could increase international broadcasting tension within this hemisphere. Will Radio Marti give us the biggest bang for the buck?

Cuban radio interference within the United States is already a severe problem. The broadcasts of Radio Marti could well increase the chances of Cuban retaliation and result in interference to U.S. radio broadcasters. Recognizing this fact, H.R. 5427 provides for interim assistance to U.S. broadcasters experiencing Cuban-caused interference. While this is only fair, it raises again the questions about the application of scarce resources to new ventures that have such undesirable consequences.

In the final analysis, problems of increased interference, the uncertain content of Radio Marti programing, limited resources available to other U.S. international broadcasters, and the cost of the project, all make it difficult for me to generate any enthusiasm about Radio Marti. As sympathetic as I am to the purpose of Radio Marti, I still have many doubts about the details.

Nevertheless, I want to commend the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Energy and Commerce. There is no question that their work on the legislation has resulted in a measure far superior to the original proposal submitted to Congress by the administration. A number of the amendments proposed on the floor today promise to further improve this legislation. These changes, along with careful and thoughtful planning and implementation, could still result in a workable U.S. broadcast presence in Cuba.●

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5427 because it is high time that we help get the truth to the Cubans enslaved by communism. More importantly, the bill addresses the nagging problem of illegal radio interference from Cuban stations that have plagued U.S. radio stations in the last 15 years. I would like to share with my colleagues a resolution adopted by the Maryland-District of Columbia-Delaware Broadcasters Association calling for prompt and strong action against Cuban interference and ask that it be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point.

The text of the resolution follows:

RESOLUTION

Be it adopted this 17th day of June, 1982, by the members of the Maryland-District of Columbia-Delaware Broadcasters Association, in convention assembled, that:

Whereas, radio broadcast stations in the the standard broadcast band throughout the United States have been receiving illegal destructive electrical interference from radio stations operating within the Republic of Cuba for almost fifteen years; and,

Whereas, radio stations in Florida and numerous other states have been specifically adversely affected by the destructive interference emanating from Cuba; and,

Whereas, reports have been received that additional radio broadcast stations in the standard broadcast band within the Republic of Cuba are either under construction or are proposed to be constructed, all of which would operate with power greatly in excess of the maximum 50 kilowatts permitted in the United States; and,

Whereas, these new "super power" Cuban stations would cause destructive interference to the nighttime operations of most United States standard broadcast stations, including those operating within Maryland, the District of Columbia, Delaware and Northern Virginia, and in some instances would reduce the nighttime interference-free service areas of standard broadcast stations by over 90 percent; and,

Whereas, negotiations between the United States and Cuba have been unproductive in reaching a solution to this devastating problem caused both by existing and proposed Cuban stations in the standard broadcast band.

Whereas, Maryland-District of Columbia-Delaware Broadcasters Association is composed of most of the broadcast stations operating in Maryland, the District of Columbia, Delaware and Northern Virginia, all of whom are desirous of maintaining the integrity of their nighttime service so as to permit their continued operation in the public interest.

Now, therefore, be it resolved:

That the members of Maryland-District of Columbia-Delaware Broadcasters Association, urge the United States Government to take the strongest possible action looking toward the adoption and enactment at the earliest possible time of a statute, treaty, compact or executive order which would result in resolving the Cuban interference problem in a manner satisfactory to broadcasters in the United States; and,

Be it further resolved:

That a copy of this resolution be sent to members of Congress and Senators from Maryland and Delaware, the non-voting delegate from the District of Columbia, the Senators and members of Congress from the 8th and 10th Congressional Districts of Virginia, the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission and the Secretary of State.

WILLIAM F. LEFEVRE,
Secretary.●

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, in establishing Radio Marti, a news radio station geared exclusively to the needs of the Cuban people, we have an excellent opportunity to not only spread the truth of what goes on in America, Cuba, and the world, to the Cuban people, but also to take positive nonmilitary action in strengthening the security of the United States. The Cuban people are presently barraged morning, noon, and night by Castro's self-serving propaganda; some of it they probably believe, some of it they probably disbelieve while most of it probably leaves them in doubt as to what they should believe. Through Radio Marti we can offer the Cubans an alternative and a window to the world. They will get news concerning not only American and world events, but more importantly about Cuban events; happenings in Cuba which directly affect and concern them. We should remember that during the most uncertain days of the Polish crisis, even the Polish leaders had to resort to listening to Radio Free Europe broadcasts to learn what was happening in Poland. In a possibly similar situation in Cuba, the Cubans through Radio Marti would also have accurate information which otherwise would be denied them.

Critics may argue against the cost, and make charges of duplication of Voice of America and Spanish language stations from Florida, but these arguments are rather weak. While the cost may at first seem a lot, stop a minute and ask what is the price of truth. How can you attach a dollar tag to truth and say it is too much? Radio Marti would not duplicate other broadcasting stations simply because the focus of Radio Marti would be on the concerns of the Cubans. The Voice of America seeks to let other peoples know what is happening in America and what America is about; the Spanish language programs in Florida are geared to the Spanish-speaking population of Florida and are filled with local news which would be meaningless to the people of Cuba. Radio Marti, on the other hand, will offer them news about their concerns and will focus on their needs. In this aspect it will be totally unique, and very worthwhile.●

● Mr. BAFALIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to express my strong support for H.R. 5427, establishing Radio Marti to broadcast to Cuba.

Through Radio Marti, the captive Cubans will learn the truth—about their failing economy, about their regime's expansionism throughout the world, and what their Russian "benefactors" are really up to.

For more than two decades, Cubans have been held hostage on an island prison—inundated with propaganda devised by Government-controlled media, insulated and isolated from news of volatile world conditions created by their own dictator—Fidel Castro.

Radio Marti will, at long last, offer these 10 million shackled citizens a choice between the truth and the blatant lies circulated by Castro's repressive regime.

Cuban mothers will learn that their sons are dying on foreign soil—not in the defense of their homeland.

Cuban families will become aware of the real state of their nation's economy, and the bleak, dismal future that awaits them and their children.

The Cuban Government will be exposed for what it really is: a perpetrator of worldwide terrorism and a puppet for the Soviet Union.

Through Radio Marti we will be able to launch the most massive nonmilitary barrage against the Castro regime in recent times—so the minds of the Cuban people can be liberated.

We are in a position to offer an alternative to the unrelenting bombardment of propaganda dished out by the Castro regime. Propaganda that distorts and twists the truth. Propaganda that brainwashes the people into believing that guns are better than butter; that shortages of food and clothing are a way of life they must accept for the good of their country. Propaganda that defiles and maligns America.

Radio Marti—named in recognition of the great Cuban patriot and liberator Jose Marti—can be our counterattack.

This important foreign policy initiative is long overdue. Its purpose is simple enough: To make the Cuban people acutely aware of the personal price they are paying for their despotic leader's mismanagement and adventurism so they can make judgments on policies that will make their government more accountable.

With frequency we vehemently condemn human rights violations, and one of the most blatant offenders is just 90 miles from our shores. In accordance with article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the people of Cuba have the right to "seek, receive, and impart information and ideas through any media regardless of frontiers."

The authorization of $17.7 million is a small price to pay to reach out with the gift of truth to more than 2 million Cuban families who own radios, and the millions more who will find a way to receive Radio Marti's message.

With the first beam transmitted to Cuba from Radio Marti, we will mark the beginning of the end of two decades of darkness and deception.

Mr. Chairman, if we are sincere in our concern over the fate of these 10 million Cuban citizens, it is incumbent upon us to take whatever steps necessary so that Radio Marti can spread the word of freedom. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation.●

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, the Akron Beacon Journal for July 17 contains an excellent editorial concerning the dubious wisdom of spending Federal taxpayers' dollars to finance an anti-Castro radio station. Since H.R. 5427, which would authorize such a station, is scheduled for action by the House later this week, I am offering this timely editorial for printing in the RECORD.

As the editorial points out, in addition to the $17 million that the bill would authorize, it also authorizes assistance to U.S. radio stations that might suffer interference by Cuban retaliation. Since Cuban jamming could affect 200 stations in 32 States, the disruption is significant and could cost as much as $40 million to alter the domestic stations to overcome the interference.

The editorial also points out that the planned broadcasts come at a time when United States-Cuban relations show signs of thawing for the mutual benefit of both nations. The editorial concludes that, instead of spending millions to make Castro look bigger than life to the rest of the world, it would be better to open up two-way lines of communications with Cuba and work toward improved relations.

The full text of the editorial follows:

ANTI-CASTRO U.S. STATION NOT WORTH THE PROBLEMS

The Reagan administration is a step closer to getting approval of a radio station to broadcast our propaganda to Cuba, to counter the propaganda Cubans receive from their own government.

No one is really quibbling with that goal. Certainly not the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which voted 23-3 this week to send to the House floor a bill that would authorize $10 million for the venture.

But critics have been attacking the radio proposal for two reasons: that the returns won't justify the cost, and that Cuban jamming devices would disrupt broadcasts of many American radio stations.

Under the bill, the cost would be $10 million in fiscal 1982 and $7.7 million in 1983. The bill also includes provisions to fund assistance to U.S. stations that might suffer interference by Cuban retaliation. But a Congressional Budget Office report said the alterations to domestic radio facilities that would be needed to overcome the interference might cost $40 million.

So, who cares if Cuba jams a few weak stations in south Florida? But the problem doesn't stop there—it could affect 200 stations in 32 states.

In fact, the most outspoken critics of the radio proposal include two staunch Republican gentlemen from Iowa—Sen. Charles Grassley and Rep. Tom Tauke—who say the interference would most harm station WHO in Des Moines, which would share frequency 1040 with Radio Marti, the proposed Cuban station.

WHO, it is claimed, would be reduced from a broadcasting radius of 800 miles to one of only 45 miles. Farmers throughout the Midwest and Canada would lose an important source of information on crops, livestock and weather. No one questions the patriotism of these people, say the Iowans, but this is asking too much.

The two main arguments against the station—cost and the threat of retaliation—contain sound reasoning. A third criticism should be added: timing.

The planned broadcasts come at a time when U.S.-Cuban relations show slight but unmistakable signs of thawing, for the mutual benefit of both nations.

Cuba's President Fidel Castro has made no secret of the fact that he is looking for markets and investors within this hemisphere. Cuba's current major trading partner, the Soviet Union, has its own economic troubles and President Castro would like to broaden Cuba's trade base.

Of course, the 21-year-old U.S. embargo on trade with Cuba is still in effect. But increased trade ties could broaden our own markets—for farm products and technology—and help lure Cuba, economically at least, back into the Free World sphere.

This is no time to return to the old Cold War rhetoric toward Cuba if there is a chance at opening up of relations. like it or not, any Caribbean initiative—like the one proposed by President Reagan—will have to consider Cuba's presence in the area.

And there is the flip side to the propaganda dilemma. Sen. Christopher Dodd attacked the radio idea and said he was embarrassed to be hearing a plan to spend "$17 million to make Castro look bigger than life" to the rest of the world.

A better way would be to open up two-way lines of communications with Cuba and work toward improved relations.

The only defense of the station seems to be that it shows the world the Reagan administration is still tough on communism. No one doubts that. But this particular way of showing it should be reconsidered.

When even the folks in Des Moines are against it, it looks like a bad idea.●

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yielded back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has been yielded back.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. GARCIA) having assumed the chair, Mr. RATCHFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5427) to authorize support to Radio Broadcasting to Cuba, Inc., had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous material, in the general debate on the bill, H.R. 5427.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

□ 1440

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, JULY 26, 1982

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

THE SENIOR COMMUNITY SERVICE PROGRAM

(Mr. McDONALD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, during election years, one expects a lot of rhetoric for the benefit of special interest groups. Usually, there is little action to benefit the Nation or its economy but rather a lot of pandering that, in the long run, proves to be harmful to our future.

This was the case recently on a vote regarding a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress that funding appropriated for title V of the Older Americans Act, the senior community service employment project, should be maintained in future years at the level necessary to insure that its current jobs and other services be maintained or expanded.

On the surface, this resolution sounded magnanimous and full of compassion for our fine elderly citizens. As could have been expected, it passed by an overwhelming margin in the House. I voted against it for several reasons.

First. I do not dispute the intrinsic worth of a senior community service program. I am well aware that our older citizens have much to offer their communities and Nation and that too often they are shunted aside by the "now generation." My concern centers around which segment of government should finance such a program. With a budget deficit of more than $100 billion this year, it should be obvious that the Federal Government does not have the money. I have absolutely no objection to programs of this nature, and local and State governments, and perhaps private enterprise, might wish to consider maintaining and expanding this program. State and local governments generally have to operate within balanced budgets, lack the massive money-absorbing bureaucracy of the Federal Government, and allow local people to have more control over their own programs.

Second. It is pure hypocrisy for Congress to decry massive budget deficits and overspending by the Federal Government and to sponsor balanced budget amendments—while at the same time "playing to the grandstand" with proposals that add to the Federal deficit.

Third. It is wildly inaccurate to claim that Federal programs "pay for themselves" and do not end up costing the taxpayers. If overspending by the Federal Government "paid for itself" as is claimed for virtually every domestic program contained within the budget, we would not have $100 billion deficits or trillion dollar national debts today.

Fourth. Such resolutions are, in themselves, meaningless because Congress will either appropriate the funds, or it will not. Therefore, one must assume that the purpose of such proposals is simply another liberal ploy to encourage partisan and philosophical demagoguery prior to the November general elections. Liberals—and many "conservatives"—are quite aware that they will be painted as ogres, "haters of the elderly," and uncompassionate individuals if they vote against such grand sounding proposals.

Fifth. Spending on the Federal level for this and similar programs actually worsens the lot of those it is designed ostensibly to help. Federal overspending robs the elderly and forces their backs against the wall by creating inflation. Inflation destroys the purchasing power of the elderly, more than any other group, because so many are dependent on fixed incomes. So while the "seen hand" of Federal largesse may have the public relations image of "helping" the elderly, the "unseen hand" of Federal deficits, debt and inflation soon destroys any positive effects that earlier "help" may have had.

Sixth. Such resolutions actually make prostitutes of many politicians because they, in effect, "sell" their votes for the programs in return for the votes of specific groups on election day. In other words, the "unspoken agreement" is that the various lobbying groups will urge their members to vote for Congressman X because he voted for the program pushed by that lobbying group. The problem is that the money of current taxpayers—and future taxpayers, considering the national debt—is being used to "buy" the votes.

Finally, this process and the lack of courage on the part of many politicians are the reasons why our Nation is in such an awful economic mess today.

We must realize the Federal Government cannot "give" something to anyone, or any group, that it has not first taken away from someone else. This is especially true where deficit spending is concerned because it obligates money from future taxpayers.

With our national defenses desperately in need of rapid rebuilding—it has been "postponed" for more than a decade due to commitments for "social" spending—and our economy in dire straits, the American people deserve more than irresponsible rhetoric and demagoguery from Congress. Unfortunately, in the case of this vote, they did not get it from the majority of House Members.

THE REAL COSTS OF THE B-1

(Mr. DICKS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Speaker, as we debate and examine various aspects of the defense authorizations bill for fiscal year 1983, I think it is important to exercise additional scrutiny on the cost estimates which are being provided to us by the Pentagon, and especially by the Air Force. Yesterday, you will recall that I argued—perhaps too long—that we should not accept the Air Force and DOD recommendation to restart the C-5 production line and pay $128 million each for a new fleet of 50 of the large cargo planes. We have to remove all unnecessary expenditures from the budget of the Defense Department this year, because, as every Member here knows, we have an afforedability problem which is getting worse year by year.

I want to call the Members' attention to a rather incredible revelation which occurred just yesterday morning in the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee that I hope you will keep in mind as we complete the debate over the defense authorizations bill. This morning, representatives of the General Accounting Office testified to the subcommittee that the baseline cost of the B-1 airplane, our Nation's most expensive military aircraft, was underestimated when the Air Force convinced Congress to approve the B-1 over the advanced technology bomber last year.

The GAO reported today that the cost estimate approved by the Deputy Secretary of Defense excluded cost elements that will be incurred and are usually included in a program estimate. According to two independent estimates—both of which were available to the Secretary of the Air Force last year before the B-1 budget was presented—the baseline cost of the B-1 bomber may be as much as 25 percent greater than the Air Force said it would be. Members of Congress were told a year ago that the fleet of 100 B-1 bombers would cost the taxpayers a total of $20.5 billion, even though they had estimates that showed costs could exceed $25 billion. That means instead of costing $200 million per plane, we are going to be paying $250 million per plane. And that is in current-year dollars. The preliminary estimate by the Congressional Budget Office for the actual cost of the B-1's in the years they are delivered is about $400 million per plane. Ladies and gentlemen, we cannot afford this kind of cost escalation, and we certainly cannot tolerate the deception which is being practiced by the Air Force on the B-1 bomber, and I am sure, on other weapons systems.

In fact, GAO representatives testified they had an exceedingly difficult time getting DOD's own independent cost estimates. It was not until they threatened legal action that DOD made these documents available.

I think we have simply got to be more vigilant in questioning the over-optimistic figures and "best-case" estimates that are being handed to us by the Air Force in this case, and by the other branches in justifying other weapon systems. Our distinguished majority whip stated yesterday that Congress must not abdicate its responsibility in exercising its budgetary control over the agencies of the executive branch. If we want the Air Force to do our job for us, and just submit its budget unquestioned, we might as well close up shop here.

I hope the Members who are here today and who are watching these proceedings will take heed, and will begin to question more aggressively the testimony of the well-meaning but often inaccurate representatives of the armed services. The shock of a 25-percent cost under statement on the B-1 bomber, just a year after we approved it, should jolt us all into a renewed sense of skepticism as we finish debating the fiscal year 1983 defense appropriations bill.

I include in the RECORD important excerpts from the GAO briefing on the real costs of the B-1:

STATEMENT OF DONALD E. DAY

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, we are pleased to be here today to discuss the cost estimates for the B-1B aircraft program. As you know, the Air Force's program cost estimate was reviewed independently by a team from the Air Force and a team from the Office of the Secretary of Defense in late 1981. The independent reviewers also prepared estimates of their own but the Air Force and Department of Defense were reluctant to give us access to the details of those estimates, and not until June 1982 were we provided information and comparisons from the independent analyses.

Mr. Robert Murphy from our Cincinnati Regional Office will give a briefing on the details of the cost estimates in just a moment, but first, I would like to emphasize two points. One, these independent estimates are not new—the results were available to the Deputy Secretary of Defense before he issued a directive on November 4, 1981, concerning management of the B-1B program. Second, despite the controversy surrounding the estimated cost of the B-1B, we think the Air Force and Office of the Secretary of Defense are making a concerted effort to acquire the B-1B program within its estimated cost baseline of $20.5 billion (fiscal year 1981 dollars).

The independent estimating teams generally dealt with (1) the adequacy of the baseline estimate as proposed, (2) the exclusion of certain necessary program costs from the baseline, and (3) the cost associated with potential future growth in the program.

Both the Air Force and OSD independent teams surfaced concerns about the $20.5 billion baseline estimate, indicating that certain assumptions leading to the baseline estimate were optimistic. Air Force officials responsible for managing the B-1B program believe their baseline estimate is justified by experience with the earlier B-1A program. Our briefing compares the estimates and provides certain information about the cost issues.

Since October 1981, an important concern to us has been the exclusion of certain program costs from the B-1B baseline. Those costs, such as acquisition of simulators, certain engineering programs for the engines, acquisition of equipment needed to provide the Air Force an in-house depot maintenance capability, etc., could add up to over $1.4 billion. We believe excluding these costs from the B-1B baseline provides poor visibility of the B-1B program acquisition cost as well as annual funding requests. We believe OSD and Air Force guidance on establishing program baselines needs to be improved to provide uniformity in establishing baselines and reporting them to the Congress.

With these few introductory remarks, I would now like to turn the briefing over to Mr. Murphy. Please feel free to ask questions as we go.

OVERVIEW OF B-1B COST ESTIMATES (ALL DOLLARS ARE FISCAL YEAR 1981)

B-1B SPO estimate: 20.5 billion baseline.

Air Force independent estimate: $21.01 billion baseline; $1.453 billion identified as appropriate additions to SPO baseline; about $1.1 billion in other potential costs if program scope is expanded

OSD independent estimate: risk analysis indicated SPO baseline cost may be exceeded by $4.74 billion (to $25.27 billion); $1.433 billion identified as appropriate additions to SPO baseline; $.474 billion in potential costs if program scope is expanded.

More detailed comparison later.

SUMMARY COMPARISON OF ESTIMATES

[In billions of fiscal year 1981 dollars]

Cost category	SPO	Independent estimate
		Air Force	OSD
"Baseline":
Airframe	9.885	11.258	11.285
Engine	1.770	1.885	1.800
Avionics	2.885	3.165	3.515

Organic depot capability	0	.237	.400
Misc. (first destination transp. other)	0	.028	.100
Interim contractor support	0	.034	.263
Facilities improvement (contractor production)	0	.008	[3].070
Retrofit costs	0	.567	0
Manufacturing technology	0	0	[3].150
Baseline additions total	0	1.453	1.433
Total recommended baseline	20.530	22.466	26.703

[1] The Air Force team estimated the cost for only an external ALCM capability.
[2] Although the OSD report did not include a "baseline" estimate of $25.27 billion, its assessment of potential added costs due to risk, when added to the SPO baseline, totals $25.27 billion.
[3] Although not included in the SPO baseline, these items are identified as related programs on the B-1B SAR.

SUMMARY COMPARISON OF COST ESTIMATES

Development of depot support capability (nonengine)[1]	do	do	Do.
First destination transportation[1]	do	do.[2]	Do.

[1] Not initially part of the $20.5 billion baseline, but subsequently directed to be included.
[2] R.D.T. & E. only.

OBSERVATIONS

B-1B baseline cost estimate approved by the Deputy Secretary of Defense excludes cost elements that will be incurred and are usually included in a program estimate. During acquisition of the B-1B, over a billion dollars will be funded in program elements not identified specifically with the B-1B baseline estimate.

Guidelines on what should be in the baseline are unclear. Other weapon systems have also excluded certain directly related acquisition costs from their estimate.

Excluding program acquisition costs from the baseline provides poor visibility of annual requests for funds as well as total program costs.

REDUCTION IN TELEPHONE SERVICE BETWEEN THE WEST AND THE SOVIET UNION

(Mr. FASCELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Government body charged by law with monitoring the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act, I was greatly disturbed by a recent development that I consider a violation of at least two provisions of the Final Act.

I am referring to recent reports that the Soviet Union has begun to drastically reduce the number of telephone lines connecting that nation with Western Europe and the United States. According to several reports from Moscow, approximately two-thirds of the international circuits with the West will be taken out of service. On July 15, 20 of the 24 lines from Vienna, Austria, to Moscow were shut down by the Soviet Postal Service. Britain, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, and Finland have also been notified of plans for similar cutbacks in phone service. The Commission on Security and Cooperation has been informed by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. that 8 of 23 long-lines from the United States to the Soviet Union are scheduled to be removed.

Soviet authorities have claimed that these steps are necessitated by technical factors that will not be corrected until 1984. If this is true, these are very convenient technical factors. It is no secret that the Soviet Government is concerned about telephone communications, particularly from Vienna, Austria, between recent Soviet emigres and their friends and relatives who have remained in the Soviet Union. Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko was recently quoted as telling Austrian President Kirchschlaeger that, "There are good telephone calls, and there are bad ones."

And obviously, the Soviet security apparatus will have less difficulty monitoring the reduced volume of calls to and from the West.

In connection with these cutbacks, the Soviet Union has eliminated direct-dialing from Moscow to the West, a move that has prompted numerous protests from Western diplomatic circles, including our own American Ambassador. Direct dialing systems from abroad, which from the time of the Moscow summer olympics until November 1981 included not only Moscow, but also the cities of Leningrad, Tallinn, Kiev, and Minsk, have also been reduced to the point of virtual nonexistence.

Mr. Speaker, the Helsinki Final Act declared that the participating states:

Make it their aim to facilitate freer movement and contacts, individually and collectively, whether privately or officially, among persons, institutions and organizations of the participating states, and to contribute to the solution of the humanitarian problems that arise in the connection.

In addition, the participating states pledged to facilitate the flow of information between journalists and the information organs that they represent. Information is difficult enough to come by behind the Iron Curtain. These latest developments will make it even more arduous for Western journalists and newspersons to communicate from the Soviet Union to their home offices.

Mr. Speaker, Senator ROBERT DOLE, co-Chairman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, and I have directed a letter to the Soviet Ambassador to the United States, Mr. Dobrynin, protesting this violation of the Helsinki Final Act and calling for a restoration of the previous levels of telephone communications between the Soviet Union and the West.

The letter in full follows:

COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE,
CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C. July 23, 1982.

Hon. ANATOLY DOBRYNIN,
Soviet Ambassador to the United States,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: As Chairman and Co-Chairman respectively of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, charged by the American Government with monitoring implementation of the Helsinki Final Act of 1975, we would like to call your attention to events that we feel constitute a grave violation of the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act.

We are referring to the announcement by the Soviet Ministry of Communications concerning drastic reductions in telephone connections between the Soviet Union and the nations of Europe, and the United States. It is our understanding that such drastic reductions have already taken place between Austria and the Soviet Union, with similar steps planned for the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Great Britain, Finland, the United States, and perhaps other Helsinki signatory states.

Mr. Ambassador, we feel that these steps are a clear violation of the human contacts provisions of the Helsinki Final Act and a direct contradiction to the provisions of the Final Act that call for an improvement in the ability of journalists to communicate with the information organs they represent.

We must convey to you our deep disappointment over this action by the Soviet Government and our strong protest over yet another step backwards from the commitments which your government undertook when Secretary Brezhnev signed the Helsinki Final Act on August 1, 1975. It is difficult to accept repeated Soviet assurances of an intent to return to Madrid in November to complete a comprehensive and balanced concluding document at the CSCE review meeting when the continuing pattern of behavior by the Soviet Union since the Madrid Meeting began indicates nothing but contempt for the undertakings of the Helsinki Final Act.

We hope you will convey our concern about these matters to your authorities in Moscow.

Sincerely yours,

DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman.

BOB DOLE,
Co-Chairman.

USURPATION OF AUTHORITY BY THE NAVY

(Mr. VENTO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, it is ironic that during the week the House considers the DOD authorization for fiscal year 1983, an authorization of over $180 billion, we learn that the Pentagon and, in particular, the U.S. Navy has been using Federal funds to conduct a covert intelligence operation aimed against the Members of Congress participating in the Military Reform Caucus.

This gross usurpation of authority by the Navy was reported this past Monday in Defense Week and is contained in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Plans and Policy Division of the Navy's Office of Legislative Affairs have breached the bounds of ethics and even legality, by preparing an analysis of the Military Reform Caucus in terms of philosophy, membership, and concerns. Beyond this, they provided a rating system for members of the caucus. Among those who received copies were the Chief of Naval Information and the Secretary of the Navy. The documentation was not classified and thus presumably intended for public distribution.

The purpose of this campaign seems clear. Despite record high Defense budgets, the Navy is employing tactics to intimidate Members of Congress into rubber stamping Navy pet projects. The Navy wants a blank check and is seeking to eliminate congressional oversight of the Pentagon budget and congressional efforts to eliminate DOD waste.

Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that the House conduct an investigation into this situation. The expenditure of public funds to influence the Members of Congress—or even to influence the composition of Congress—is specifically illegal under title 18 of the United States Code and the Hatch Act. We know what the Navy did here. What we do not know is what other ratings and other information on Congress the Pentagon has compiled for use at a time of their choosing.

The Military Reform Caucus is a group interested in providing an efficient and strong national defense in the face of a changing technical military environment. We disagree on specifics but share a common concern. For the Navy to secretly investigate and rate Members of Congress in the way it did is the height of arrogance which could have a chilling effect on the deliberations of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, there is no legitimate reason for the Navy to have investigated the caucus or any Member of Congress. Such misbehavior goes beyond the misuse of appropriated funds for lobbying. This issue is a clear violation of the constitutional separation of powers. Under the guise of congressional relations, the Navy is secretly interfering with congressional internal affairs in order to dominate the decisionmaking process.

The House must respond to this flagrant abuse of our system of government. The basic question is who really gives the orders? Is it the democratically elected officials or the Pentagon? What was the purpose of this poll, and what other similar secret activities against Congress have been conducted by the Pentagon?

I am requesting a full investigation by the House Judiciary and Government Operations Committees. I urge my colleagues to support efforts to eliminate these abuses and to restore the proper balance to our decisionmaking process.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Resolution 489, the rule on the airport and airway development bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

PRESIDENT SIGNS CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK PROCLAMATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, as we conclude this year's official Captive Nations Week observance, I wish to draw attention to one of the most dramatic events which highlighted this annual commemoration. For the first time in the history of this observance, a special Presidential signing of the Captive Nations Week Proclamation was held.

On Monday, President Reagan joined with over 400 distinguished guests from ethnic organizations, newspapers, and fraternal groups from across the country as well as many Members of both the House and Senate in a ceremony in the White House Rose Garden. Joining President Reagan on the podium, were many of our former colleagues who cosponsored the original resolution which was signed into Public Law 86-90 in 1959. This law established Captive Nations Week to be observed annually during the third week in July.

While the official week draws to a close, it is important for us to continue to carry the spirit and dreams of the captive peoples in our hearts and pray that their desire for human liberty will soon be answered.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in my remarks, I wish to insert the 1982 Captive Nations Week Proclamation of the President of the United States, the Honorable Ronald Reagan, and his remarks at the signing ceremony at which he used the occasion to voice a strong verbal statement against Soviet tyranny and expansion of totalitarianism:

REMARKS OF THE PRESIDENT AT SIGNING CEREMONY FOR CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK PROCLAMATION

The PRESIDENT: Thank you very much. Thank you. I heard all that applause that you were getting. I almost didn't come out. (Laughter).

Six weeks ago when I visited our friends and allies in Europe, I found a warm response to this nation's call for a global campaign for freedom. Our straightforward criticism of totalitarianism regimes and our willingness to promote the ideals of individual liberty and representative government struck a responsive chord among Europeans and I believe many other millions of people around the globe.

Yet, even as I expressed our confidence that the ideals of freedom and the aspiration of self-government would ultimately triumph over those who wished to subordinate the individual to the state, I was confronted with the hard evidence of just how difficult this struggle will be.

In Berlin, a grey, grim monument of steel and stone stands as a reminder of those whose self-proclaimed goal is the domination of every nation on earth.

The tragedy of our time is that this goal has been so widely achieved. Throughout the Baltic States, Eastern Europe and Asia, now in Africa and Latin America, nation after nation has fallen prey to an ideology that seeks to stifle all that's good about the human spirit, even as it attempts to justify communist rule.

This extension of totalitarianism has not come about through popular movement or free elections. It's been accomplished instead by military force or by subversion practiced by a tiny revolutionary cadre whose only real ideal is the will to power.

It hasn't meant, as promised, a new classless society or the dictatorship of the proletariat. It has, instead, meant forced labor and mass imprisonment, famine and massacre, the police state and the knock on the door in the night.

And it has also meant the growth of the largest military empire in the history of the world. An empire whose territorial ambition has sparked a wasteful arms race and whose ideological obsession remains the single greatest peril to peace among the nations.

The ominous growth of this danger, the human suffering that it has caused, is clearly the most important news event of our generation. And it is, as I've said, the tragedy of our time.

In 1959, the Congress of the United States, spurred on by the ruthless and bloody attack in 1956 on the free Hungarian government first decided to commemorate the heroism and fortitude of those living in nations in which the right of self-determination has been denied.

Today, in this Captive Nations Proclamation, and at this first public signing of this proclamation, we keep faith with this tradition and with those to whom it is intended to give hope and moral substance.

Today, we as a nation, also remind ourselves of the preciousness of our freedom, renew our sacred resolve that someday all the people of the earth will enjoy the God-given rights of free men and women. (Applause.)

We renew especially our hope that those countries of eastern Europe, Asia, Africa and Latin America now under communist domination will someday regain their national sovereignty and, again, enjoy the dignity of their own national traditional. (Applause.)

Since that—since that first Captive Nation's Resolution passed by the Congress, we've seen equally distressing examples of the assault on the human spirit. The independent people of Afghanistan are giving their lives resisting aggression of the bloodiest kind. And, again, in Poland, the suppression of the rights of Polish workers, the imprisonment of the leaders of Solidarity. All of this, sustained and directed by Soviet military might, is another tragic chapter in the quest of the Polish people for freedom and national sovereignty.

We in the West must do more than merely decry attacks on human freedom. The nature of this struggle is ultimately one that will be decided, not by military might, but by spiritual resolve and confidence in the future of freedom especially in the face of the decaying and crumbling dreams of Marxism/Leninism. (Applause.)

Lenin advocated resorting to all sorts of strategems, artifices, maneuvers, illegal methods, evasions and subterfuges. We in the West have at our command weapons far more potent that defeat, deceit and subterfuge. We have the power of truth. Truth that can reach past the stone and steel walls of the police state and create campaigns for freedom and coalitions for peace in communist countries.

How long can one simple fact be ignored or overlooked: that only the totalitarian states mark their borders with walls and barbed wire to keep their people from fleeing the "worker's paradise."

Some months ago I received a letter from Solidarity leaders who were in the free world during the crackdown by the ruling military junta. These leaders pointed out that totalitarian regimes can be "eroded only from within by nonviolent, popular pressure. Our Polish experience shows how efficient such a drive for change can be. Our adversary is fully aware that our resistance cannot be sustained without a free flow of information and ideas."

These leaders went on to say, "We appeal to you for the same appreciation of the power of ideas and the effectiveness of broadcasting as their carrier. In the long run it may prove to be the least expensive and the most effective option at your disposal."

Today let me make it clear that we intend to move forward consistent with budgetary requirements with a program to modernize our primary means of international communication, our international radio system. (Applause.) In carrying out this vital element in our forward strategy for freedom we will be redeeming the pledge I made to the American people during the campaign, a pledge deeply felt at the time and deeply felt today. This plan of modernization for a relatively modest expenditure over a number of years will make it easier for millions of people living under communist rule to hear the truth about the struggle for the world going on today between the forces of totalitarianism and freedom.

The sad fact is that the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, and Radio Liberty have been neglected for many years. Their equipment is old and deteriorating, their programming resources strained. Little has been done to counter the jamming that has intensified in recent years.

The Soviets, I think you should know, spend three to four times more to jam foreign broadcasts than we spend to transmit them. And somebody—we can only speculate as to their identity—perpetrated a devastating bombing of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty's headquarters last year.

I want to extend my appreciation to the Congress for agreeing recently to reorganize the management of these international broadcasting channels, and I especially want to urge them today to approve the funds so desparately needed to bring to the people of Cuba through Radio Marti the truth about the struggle between freedom and totalitarianism. (Applause.)

We can fully appreciate the fear of those who do not want the truth to reach the people of the communist world, those who are willing to violate flagrantly the Helsinki Agreements or even to engage in terrorist violence to stifle the truth. For the events in Poland during the last two years show that when given air time and a little breathing space the truth becomes a powerful weapon, one which even the most repressive police states must fear.

We are confident that in Poland, Afghanistan, and in all the Captive Nations the forces of totalitarianism have won only a temporary fleeting victory. Against the appeal of democratic ideas, against the hunger and thirst of men and women who would be free, the threat of martial law, imprisonment, or any of the other artful forms of repression can never win lasting triumph.

In an interview that was published here before his imprisonment Lech Walesa spoke of "the wheat that can grow on the stones," of how brutal repression only seems to strengthen the hope and hunger of those who long for freedom. And he said, "Our souls contain exactly the contrary of what they wanted. They want us, the communist rulers, not to believe in God, and our churches are full. They wanted us to be materialistic and incapable of sacrifices. We are anti-materialistic and capable of sacrifice. They wanted us to be afraid of tanks and of the guns. And instead, we do not fear them at all." (Applause.) The love of liberty, the fire of freedom burns on in Poland just as it burns on among all the peoples of the Captive Nations.

To the leaders of Solidarity, to the people of Poland, to all those who are denied freedom, we send a message today. Your cause is not lost. You are not forgotten. Your quest for freedom lives on in your hearts and in our hearts. (Applause.) God willing, we will see a day when we shall speak together of the joys of freedom and of the wheat that grows on stones. (Applause.)

Now, I better——

Q. Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT: What?

Q. "God Bless America," would you sing it with us?

The PRESIDENT: You will have to start.

(The President joins the assembled in singing "God Bless America.")

The PRESIDENT: Thank you. (Applause.) Thank you very much.

Now, I am going to sign this before you all catch cold. (Laughter.)

(The President signs proclamation. Applause.)

Thank you all. Thank you very much. Now get in the shade.

[A Proclamation by the President of the United States of America]

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK, 1982

During the past year, we have witnessed another tragic demonstration of the failure of tyranny to compete with the principles of freedom. The imposition of martial law in Poland on December 13, 1981, served as a bitter reminder that the quest for freedom and self-determination can only be restrained by force. It clearly demonstrated the moral bankruptcy of a system which has been unable to earn the support of its population after more than 35 years in power.

The same repression imposed on the Polish people is evidenced in various ways in other captive nations dominated by foreign military power and an alien Marxist-Leninist ideology. The brutal suppression of sovereignty in Afghanistan and the bondage of the captive peoples of Eastern Europe continue. Among the oppressed we must also count the peoples of many nationalities within the Soviet Union itself; they are victims of long decades of repression.

Twenty-three years ago, by a joint resolution approved July 17, 1959, (73 Stat. 212), the Congress authorized and requested the President to proclaim the third week in July as Captive Nations Week.

This week offers Americans an opportunity to honor our Nation's founders whose wisdom and commitment to self-determination and liberty have guided this country for more than 200 years. Let us once again reaffirm our faith that the aspiration for freedom will ultimately prevail over the rule of force and coercion which denies human rights to so many other parts of the world today.

Now, therefore, I, Ronald Reagan, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate the week beginning July 18, 1982, as Captive Nations Week.

I invite the people of the United States to observe this week with appropriate ceremonies and activities and to reaffirm their dedication to the ideals which unite us and inspire others.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this 19th day of July, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-two, and of the Independance of the United States of America the two hundred and seventh.

RONALD REAGAN.[1]

BANKING COMMITTEE MONETARY POLICY REPORT AND CHAIRMAN VOLCKER'S PREDICTIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PARRIS) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, in a 3-hour hearing before the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee earlier this week, on Tuesday of this week, Chairman Volcker of the Federal Reserve Board indicated that the growth targets of the monetary aggregates will remain unchanged for the balance of 1982 and for 1983 and at the same time the Chairman in accordance with the Humphrey-Hawkins legislation provided the Banking Committee with a midyear monetary policy.

The Chairman stated in his testimony on that occasion in part:

The hard fact remains that we cannot escape our dilemmas by a decision to give up the fight on inflation—by declaring the battle won before it is. Such an approach would be transparently clear—not just to you and me—but to the investors, the businessmen and the workers who would, once again, find their suspicions confirmed that they had better prepare to live with inflation, and try to keep ahead of it. The reactions in financial markets and other sectors of the economy would, in the end, aggravate our problems, not eliminate them. It would strike me as the cruelest blow of all to the millions who have felt the pain of recession directly to suggest, in effect, it was all in vain.

I recognize months of recession and high interest rates have contributed to a sense of uncertainty. Businesses have postponed investment plans. Financial pressures have exposed lax practices and stretched balance sheet positions in some institutions—financial as well as non-financial. The earnings position of the thrift industry remains poor.

But none of those problems can be dealt with successfully by re-inflation or by a lack of individual discipline. It is precisely that environment that contributed so much to the current difficulties.

Now, I think all of us, Mr. Speaker, can generally agree with that statement by the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, but does it really say anything? Is that statement political rhetoric or bureaucratic rhetoric or is it truly a statement of operating principles by the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board?

The Chairman was appointed as Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board by President Carter. He is an experienced, knowledgeable and qualified gentleman. He exercises his judgment in the accomplishment of his responsibilities in a sincere manner; but now for the bad news.

When two people agree on everything, Mr. Speaker, one of them is not thinking.

I rise as one Member of this Congress who most assuredly does not agree on some of the positions of the Federal Reserve Board in regard to monetary policy. I take this time on the floor of the House today to reiterate for the benefit of my colleagues, some of the debate that took place in that committee earlier this week in the hearing that we had on Tuesday of this week.

I am increasingly astonished, Mr. Speaker, at the certainty with which the Federal Reserve Board predicts the Nation's economic future. I have the privilege of serving as chairman of the House Task Force on Economic Policy. Over the last year or 2 I have had the opportunity to discuss our economic situation with literally hundreds of economists around this Nation. Very few of them can agree on our economic forecast. Very few of them can agree on the Federal Reserve Board's continuing policies of tight money.

In fact, very few of them can agree on whether or not it is even possible to accurately measure the money supply, something that the Federal Reserve Board claims that it does every day.

Before 1800, Edmund Burke said, "Parsimony is not economy." That advice is almost 2 centuries old, but I submit that the Federal Reserve Board could benefit and the Nation might very well prosper if it took that advice to heart.

I realize that the Board takes considerable pride in their dedication to tight money goals; but frankly, Mr. Speaker, I have the sinking feeling that their efforts to control inflation solely through the use of monetary policy and thereby save the economy are on par with the PLO's efforts to save West Beirut.

When the battle is over, they may very well be able to claim a philosophical victory, but at what price? If the Nation's economy is reduced to a pile of rubble, the battle will have been won, but the war will be lost.

As recently as last week, Robert Ortner, one of the administration's top economists and the Commerce Department's chief economist, said that if the Federal Reserve sped up money growth, interest rates would come down and the economy could begin to grow again without reigniting inflation. He said:

With production down the way it is, it would not be damaging or inappropriate if the Federal Reserve Board sped up money growth and consciously brought down interest rates.

During the Ford administration, Chairman Volcker's predecessor, the distinguished gentleman, Dr. Arthur Burns, increased the money supply to stimulate the economy and end the then existing recession in the 1974–75 period. The results were positive and the inflation rate held steady for months. It has, therefore, I submit, been proven that there is at least a limited period of high economic activity, increasing monetary supply and stable inflation rates that is available to us to help an economic recovery in these trying times. Why in heaven's name do we not use it?

Where is Mr. Volcker's crystal ball? How can he be so certain that he, and only he, knows the answer to this Nation's economic problems? Where does he get the information that makes him so infallible, and why does he not share it with us mere mortals?

I do not suggest this, Mr. Speaker, in a vitriolic, unkind or personal way, but I submit to the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board that there is alternative judgment in these difficult questions.

I think we would like to know the answers to the questions I have just posed, even if they are rhetorical; because if the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Speaker, is wrong, a possibility that I realize he is understandably reluctant to accept, he will have done this Nation irreparable harm. Instead of being remembered as the George Washington of modern monetarist theory, he may and surely will find himself reviled as the Benedict Arnold of an economic disaster.

The monetary history of this Nation since the Federal Reserve Board's adoption of the principle of attempting to administer the hopelessly difficult task of measuring money has been nothing short of a disaster.

What has happened is that we have substituted rules and replaced them by random whims. The problem is that the United States has no long-term monetary policy at all; nothing that inspires confidence; nobody trusts the continuing value of money. The economy worldwide is precariously dependent on short-term debt.

We alternate between robbing lenders with inflation and robbing borrowers with deflation. There is no way of knowing which is coming next. So activities requiring long-term financial commitments are severely restricted, like real estate mortgage transactions.

At the same time, economic recovery is inhibited and financial markets are in total disarray.

Alan Reynolds, in a recent article inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by our colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP), states in part:

The year 1973 represented the high-water mark of monetarism. By then all of the old fashioned obstacles to scientific demand management had been toppled. The United States took the silver out of coins in 1964. We lifted the gold cover on Federal Reserve notes in 1965. We set the gold price free in March of 1968. We reneged on converting foreign dollars into gold on August 15, 1972, and officially embraced floating exchange rates in March of 1973.

The monetarists cheered. They had provided the intellectual rationale for the demolition of all institutional constraints on monetary policy. There was a promise to replace the old rules with the new rules. But it has not happened.

Samual Brittain says, "The defects of monetarism are that it concedes too much power to official intervention, underrates the influence of competition in providing money substitutes, and takes official statistics far too much at their face value."

Karl Brunner in 1968 coined the term "monetarism," but monetarism is a part of Keynesian economic theory, a tradition of demand management. The tools are slightly different, but the objective is still to manage the rate of growth of aggregate demand. Whether over short or longer periods of time, monetarism begins with the seductive premise that the rate of growth of spending or demand, sometimes called nominal growth of GNP, depends on the rate of growth of money, M, plus velocity, V. Converting the old quantity equation into annual percentage increases then, it is M plus or minus V equals GNP.

Now, if we could count and control M, and if we knew or could predict velocity, then we would reach the Keynesian heaven of being able to manage aggregate demand. The only trouble is that nobody, but nobody, can do any of those things, including the Federal Reserve Board.

The definition of what even is money in this Nation and in this economy has been changed four times since 1978. Basically, the goal of managed money is to control $3 trillion in annual spending through periodic adjustments in about $45 billion of bank reserves, and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is not an easy task.

While inflation has declined, interest rates have continued at their unacceptably high rates. Never before in the history of the greatest economy that the world has ever known have interest rates persisted near the 20-percent level under different administrations with totally different fiscal policies. Never has the economy suffered 2 years of back-to-back recessions. Never have we seen such volatility in interest rates since the current policy was begun by the Federal Reserve.

The issue, Mr. Speaker, is how do we break the logjam? Where is our economic recovery? What do we do and how do we provide investment capital that this Nation so greatly needs?

The answer is the problem of the general level of the money supply, and the fact is that it is unacceptably low; it is tight, and the regulations are excessively restrictive.

The logjam would be broken if the Federal Reserve Board loosened up the money supply for the next 12 months or so. If they did that, the economy could begin to grow without reigniting inflation, consistent with and in conjunction with a policy of fiscal restraint being adopted by this Congress.

I very strongly believe in the President's program, with its emphasis on reducing budgets and taxes and encouraging business investment, but capital spending is not going to turn around in the near future with the low operating rates of industrial production in America's factories and these current interest rates remaining at present levels. With tight money and high interest rates, the depressed economy is feeding on itself.

Let me make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am not suggesting that we eliminate all M-2 targets and appropriate restrictions on monetary policy. I do not agree, however, that current monetary policy is appropriate in these difficult economic times.

I simply believe that it is too tight and has been that way now for too long, all to the serious detriment of our economic activity, the welfare of the American citizens, and in the interests of our economic recovery.

Hopefully, interest rates will drop in the near term, and they are trending down. A long-term solution, however, will require increasing somewhat the monetary growth aggregates in conjunction with the Federal Government ending its fiscal spending binge. As long as the Federal Government consumes most of the Nation's savings and credit funds, capital will continue to be in short supply and expensive.

This, Mr. Speaker, is and will continue to be the greatest Nation on this planet. Never before have any societies enjoyed the benefits of individual political, religious, and economic freedom that we have, and we must, through appropriate fiscal and monetary policy, preserve this Nation for the benefit of our children and our children's children.

ST GERMAIN CONDEMNS WORLD BANK LOAN FURTHER DEPRESSING U.S. TEXTILE INDUSTRY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. ST GERMAIN) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I speak today in order to call to the attention of my colleagues the significance of a recent decision of the World Bank authorizing a textile industry loan in the Philippines. The loan is in the amount of $157.4 million and is to be used for the purposes of "textile sector restructuring," and was made to the Development Bank of the Philippines and the Board of Investments.

In their review of this project, and in their recommendation of its approval, members of the Reagan administration argued that exports of yarn, fabric, and garments from the Philippines were of such low volume as to be no problem to the United States, and that subsequent domestic demand for textile products—within the Philippines—would absorb any increase in production capacity reached over the next few years. Given this rationale, they recommended and voted approval of the loan.

Not only was poor and incorrect analysis used to justify making this loan, Mr. Speaker, but the loan was made at highly subsidized terms thereby further making our textile industry less competitive. If only our businesses, farmers, or consumers could get a loan on terms similar to that given to the Philippines, we would soon be out of this severe recession we are now in. Listen to these terms of the World Bank loan to the Philippines to subsidize their textile industry. The loan is for 20 years, with an initial grace period of 5 years and interest at 11.6 percent a year.

It would be beneficial, indeed, if our consumers and producers would obtain loans with these terms. Maybe then, for example, the bankruptcy rate for businesses, now the highest ever, would diminish.

There are however, Mr. Speaker, other important facts that ought to be considered before passing judgment on this decision, inasmuch as they pertain to the textile industry. Here, I would draw attention to some very important statistics to be borne in mind:

First, over the past 20 years, the overall growth rates in productivity in the U.S. fiber industry, the fabric industry, and the apparel industry, have exceeded the average growth in productivity for the economy. These industries are, therefore, very important contributors to the U.S. economic portfolio.

Second, increases in apparel imports, however, over the years have deprived not only the U.S. apparel industry, but also its suppliers in the U.S. fiber and fabric industries, of a significant share of domestic growth in the United States. Our fiber and fabric industries, which are competitive in world export markets, are often denied the opportunity to grow by serving the largest apparel exporters—mainly from the Far East market areas.

Third, these large and growing apparel exporting countries either pursue protectionist policies or have industrial or regional structures that link together fiber, fabric, and apparel production in order to increase their competitiveness in fiber and fabric. The United States does not enjoy this type of production environment, nor has it sought to establish it.

Fourth, by using linkage to foreign apparel producers selling into U.S. markets, foreign fiber and fabric makers are able to gain volume and resulting production efficiencies sufficient to increase their competitiveness at a rapid rate, while the competitiveness of U.S. producers—denied both domestic market growth and growth through sales to large apparel exporting countries—slowly continues to erode.

Mr. Speaker, these are the conditions that are driving this country headlong toward the adoption of protectionist legislation; and, while I am not speaking today as an advocate of this approach, it is becoming increasingly difficult for many of us to overlook this option for many of our industries. Textiles is but one of a multitude of examples to be considered.

The administration's decision was reached with full knowledge that our textile/apparel trade deficit is headed toward a record $6 billion for the year—a deficit that has increased by 44 percent during the January-May 1982 period alone over the same period in 1981.

The administration's decision was reached with full knowledge that unemployment in the textile industry stands at 12.5 percent as of last May. Employment, at 775,000 persons is down by 84,000 from last year. And finally, the administration's decision was reached with full knowledge that production has dropped by 15 percent, and imports continue their impact on declining production.

Mr. Speaker, our trade agreement with the Philippines is due to be renegotiated next month. We can only hope that our representatives will take serious note of other equally distressing trends perhaps best depicted by the fact that our imports in textiles from the Philippines grew from $212 million in 1980 to $260 million in 1981, while our exports of textiles to the Philippines dropped from $39 million in 1980 to $37 million in 1981. It is evident that the loan granted by the World Bank can only have one direct effect—to upgrade the spinning, weaving, and knitting capacity of the Philippine industry—eventually to the point where there will no longer exist any need for purchases of raw material from the United States.

I cannot understand how this administration can vote in favor of a loan which can have no effect domestically other than further depressing employment and production in one of our most depressed industries—the textile industry.

Mr. Speaker, legislative jurisdiction over the World Bank and its affiliates resides within the House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, of which I have the honor to be chairman. I want to note for all today, that the next appearance of administration officials requesting additional funding for the World Bank before our committee will feature some very hard and blunt questioning. I will demand answers as to both motivation and results drawn from such choices as are evidenced through this most recent administration loan action. Voting in favor of a World Bank loan to upgrade the textile industry in the Philippines, was a vote to further strangle the textile industry in the United States.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, this week we celebrate the 24th anniversary of National Captive Nations Week. It is a time in which we should all join in expressing our support for the people of 31 captive nations throughout the world. We should affirm our strong intentions to help these millions of men and women who are enslaved within these Communist-dominated nations.

The basic human rights that we as Americans enjoy are expressly denied to these people behind the Iron Curtain.

It is especially appropriate today to pause to remember these men and women in light of the suppression of the Solidarity movement in Poland. Hundreds and thousands of Poles are suffering under the imposition of martial law, and this week provides a real opportunity to rededicate ourselves to helping movements like Solidarity to become viable alternatives to Communist oppression.

I join with my other colleagues to renew our vital committment to freedom throughout the world and pray that one day, there will be no need for a Captive Nations Week.●

HEARING ON HUMAN RIGHTS IN GUATEMALA SET

(Mr. PATTERSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, like many Members of Congress, I have been troubled for a long time by the reports from Guatemala. I think that we have all hoped that the Rios Montt regime which took over in the military coup in March would protect the basic human rights of the Guatemalan people. Some of the early signals coming from the Rios Montt government were indeed hopeful. More recent developments, however, are worrisome.

The International Financial Institutions Act requires the U.S. Executive Director at each of the multilateral development banks to oppose loans to any country which is a gross and consistent violator of internationally recognized human rights. A loan is pending at the Inter-American Development bank which raises this issue with regard to Guatemala.

I received information yesterday from Deputy Assistant of State Stephen W. Bosworth on the status of human rights in Guatemala. The letter does not adequately answer questions about extra-legal killings and torture in Guatemala. His letter and my response to it follow this statement.

Because of the wide interest in U.S. policy in this area, I have scheduled a hearing of the subcommittee for Thursday, August 5, at 10 a.m. in room 2128 of the Rayburn Building to examine this issue. The letter follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C. July 15, 1982.

Hon. JERRY M. PATTERSON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on International Development, Institutions and Finance, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I, too, believe we had a very useful discussion on June 16, and am extremely pleased at your willingness to take another look at the pending Guatemalan loan application for a rural telecommunications system.

I cannot emphasize strongly enough the favorable contrast between the current human rights situation in Guatemala and the situation last December when your Subcommittee held a hearing on this project. Much remains to be done in the human rights area in the country. We remain watchful of developments, including the manner in which the recently imposed martial law is implemented, but we note that the new government has taken some major human rights steps. In view of this marked change, the Administration is confident that supporting this loan to the new Guatemalan Government is fully consistent with the provisions of Section 701 of the International Financial Institutions Act. I am enclosing background information on some of the human rights actions taken in Guatemala since the March 23 coup. Please feel free to share this information with other members of the Committee.

As you know, the rural telecommunications systems loan proposal has been pending action in the Board of Executive Directors of the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) since last December. We believe it is timely for this project to proceed. It is a worthwhile project, and, more importantly, approval would send a signal of U.S. support for the improvements the new Government has made.

We acknowledge that legitimate questions could be and were raised about the directness of the basic human needs impact as well as other aspects of this project. Nonetheless, we believe that with modifications along the lines discussed after the December 8, 1981 hearing, the project could have been improved and construed as eligible for an exception. However, since our recommendation for U.S. approval no longer hinges on such as exception, we see no need to pursue this aspect of the matter further.

Before any action is taken on this loan, we will be coordinating with Treasury regarding consultations required under Section 701. We hope to be in the position to indicate U.S. support for this loan in the IDB before the end of July. I am, of course, prepared to discuss the matter further with you if you wish after reviewing the enclosed background on the current situation in Guatemala.

Regarding another matter raised in our recent meeting, I would like to assure you that both we and Treasury are actively seeking support for prompt passage of the authorization legislation for the new replenishment of the African Development Fund. We are consulting with your staff on how best to pursue this objective. We look forward to prompt, favorable action on this bill, which would be an important signal of continuing strong U.S. support for the multilateral development banks.

Once again, I would like to express my appreciation for our frank discussion on June 16. We look forward to a continuing exchange of views on such matters.

Sincerely,

STEPHEN W. BOSWORTH,
Deputy Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACTIONS—GUATEMALA

PROMISES

In a March 24 diplomatic note the Junta pledged "to respect human rights and fundamental liberties." This promise was reaffirmed on April 5 when the junta announced its 14 point outline of government.

At a March 24 press conference Rio Montt announced his idea for a spiritual rebirth of the country that would require "changing the faces (in government)" and fostering a respect for law by disarming those who do not have responsibility for carrying weapons. A day later Rios Montt announced that an investigation of ex-government officials would be carried out.

Junta member Maldonado said at a press conference that police had orders to find persons "kidnapped" during the previous administration. He said the kidnappers would be brought to trial.

AMNESTY

The GOG completed a 30-day amnesty program for guerrillas and certain members of the security forces June 30. It provided a written guaranty that the amnesty would be honored and an offer to work with those taking advantage of the program.

Junta Member Maldonado Shaad told the press May 25 that the decree was not intended to protect members of the security forces who took the law into their own hands. Rather it was meant to exonerate those who fought subversion openly in combat, in the mountains. Those who acted on their own, even if they were in positions of authority, remain subject to the courts.

GOG modified the amnesty decree on May 31 to permit guerrillas "to turn themselves into Departmental governors and municipal mayors, as well as to the following institutions: Guatemalan Red Cross, University of San Carlos and its extensions, private universities, professional schools and churches of all cults," . . . in order that said institutions will immediately notify the closest military authority . . ." Prior to this guerrillas had to turn themselves in to military authorities only.

Rios Montt reportedly said that "all Guatemalans who are abroad, forced by personal circumstances under the previous regime may return to the country and begin work in favor of Guatemala." (Reuter, April 27)

RELATIONS WITH THE CHURCH

The Roman Catholic Episcopal Conference met with Rios Montt March 31. The president of the Conference reported to the press afterwards that the meeting was an "important opening of channels of communication with the junta. They offered us guarantees so that we would carry out our work in the areas of our expertise." Bishop Penados added "I believe the junta can establish a government of honesty and hard work."

According to Bishop Penados the junta said that the 60-70 priests who had to leave Guatemala because of threats to their lives are free to return to Guatemala provided they can obtain a letter from Cardinal Casareigo attesting to their good standing within the Church.

Former President of the Episcopal Conference, Bishop Gerardi, previously in self-imposed exile in Costa Rica has returned to Guatemala.

CORRUPTION

A growing list of former government officials are being brought before the courts to determine if there is sufficient grounds to bring indictments.

Orders were issued to prevent former officials associated with the corruption in the Lucas Administration from leaving the country. Some have been detained as they attempted to leave the country.

The government announced it has suspended 125,000 government payment orders in an effort to uncover alleged corruption by former government officials.

The National Peripheral Highway Project was also canceled and junta member Colonel Gordillo publicly stated that the contract will be carefully investigated and if found illegal those involved will be vigorously prosecuted.

Arrest of former Minister of Education Colonel Clementino Castillo Coronado was announced on May 26. Castillo is the first military officer of senior rank known to have been arrested by the junta.

Junta Member Maldonado Shaad announced on May 26 that an order has been issued for the arrest of another military officer, Colonel Jorge Mario Reyes Porras, former director of the Peten Department Development Organization.

ELECTIONS

On March 29 Rios Montt was quoted as saying that he was "working hard to hold completely honest elections as soon as possible."

The April 28 Statute of Government pledges the junta "to create a spirit and juridical/political environment that will guarantee the directing of the country to a legal constitutional system that will result in a democratic government based on popular elections." It outlines a specific list of officers, under both the former Lucas administration and the military junta now in place, who are not eligible for participation in any future popular election.

Following a April 16 meeting of the junta and political party leaders, former presidential candidate Anzueto said that political parties are going "to participate in drafting the new electoral law, and establishing the electoral systems, using past experiences and up to date and practical methods to minimize the possibilities of fraud and to make it more representative of the peoples's will."

Giving no details on the elections, Rios Montt stated on May 17 that constituent assembly elections would be held at the end of the year. (El Grafico, May 18)

HUMAN RIGHTS ORGANIZATIONS

Junta member Maldonado Shaad said in mid-April that Amnesty International or any other human rights organization was welcome to come to Guatemala.

Reportedly Rios Montt told a reporter on April 27 that human rights in Guatemala can be investigated by any international organization adding that "we are going to change the attitude of this government and are going to be concerned about the people." (AFP, Guatemala City, April 27)

The GOG accepted an invitation to attend the June 24-28 session in Geneva of the UN Working Group on Forced or Involuntary Disappearances.

Guatemala participated in the ILO conference in Geneva June 2-23. Two democratic labor leaders were on the delegation.

At the end of May the GOG invited the Inter-American Human Rights Commission to visit the country.

REFUGEES

100 refugee families which began fleeing Chimaltenango last December as a result of "massacres by armed unknowns" asked the junta to provide assistance, primarily food and water. They also indicated that they would be willing to return if the army guarantees their safety. The refugees claimed that "the number of massacred families has dropped since the new government came to power." (Prensa Libre, April 14)

A military source has stated that recent guerrilla attacks in Chimaltenango province have driven some 300 peasants to take refuge in a camp six miles outside Guatemala City. The army, Red Cross and National Emergency Committee are providing food, medical care to the camp.

On May 25 the Government signed an agreement with the FAO which provides food aid valued at $2,019,000 to feed 125,000 displaced persons in northwest Guatemala for four months. The program will be administered by CARITAS and the National Emergency Committee.

REDUCTION IN VIOLENCE

Urban violence has decreased significantly since the coup.

Rural violence, while significantly high, appears, when identifiable, to largely be the responsibility of the guerrillas.

Embassy reporting indicates in April, for the first time since it began keeping records, the percentage of killing by the left surpassed that of the right, "non-attribution", or the GOG. All GOG killings reportedly took place in combat.

The notorious Commando Seis, officially a 60-70 man investigation unit of the national police, but allegedly a hit squad, has been reorganized.

National police are now ordered to show badges and give names and numbers when stopping citizens for questioning.

An April 1 news item reported the arrest of two police guards of the National Police School in Esquintla by a unit of the Mobile Military Police. The two guards were accused of "kidnapping" a waitress from a bar in that town.

A complaint department has been established in the national police headquarters. As of mid-April a thousand people had sought information about missing persons.

Police "freed" San Carlos University Dean Alfonso Velasquez Perez who had been kidnapped February 18.

The national police is under investigation by its new commanders. Reportedly five police chiefs have been dismissed. An investigation of the Corps of Detectives may result in similar actions.

Reportedly private security forces are being disarmed in compliance with Rios Montt's March 24 directive. Up to 2,000 bodyguards assigned to former officials of the Lucas Administration have returned to uniformed service in the national police.

Junta member Maldonado Shadd indicated that an investigation had begun into the matter of 164 military commissioners (Sheriffs) who had been accused by campesinos of murder, rape and pillage.

An investigation has reportedly begun into the complaint of the citizens of a rural town that the deputy-chief of police committed numerous "crimes against human rights" such as unwarranted arrest, extortion and illegal entry into private homes.

The Government on April 23 removed the two most senior police officials in the Department of Suchitepequez and charged them with negligence in permitting two prisoners to be kidnapped and two others to be killed while being transported between prisons.

Newspapers reported May 18 that 58 policeman had been dismissed and formally charged with a variety of crimes.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Ministry of Interior permitted a student mock demonstration on April 2, a traditional annual lampooning of the government, which was banned last year.

The GOG obtained a peaceful resolution to the takeover of the Brazilian Embassy on May 12 in contrast the violence surrounding the takeover of the Spanish Embassy in January 1980.

On May 18 the appeals court ordered the release of three Guatemalans who had been imprisoned for the murder of Father Stanley Rother in July 1981. The release terminated what appeared to be a grave miscarriage of justice.

On June 15 Rios Montt reportedly stated this government was seeking unconditional talks with the guerrillas.

AREAS OF CONCERN

On July 4 President Rios Montt announced that Juan Jose Hurtado, a Guatemalan doctor reportedly kidnapped on June 24, had been detained by the Guatemalan Government for being a "communist". While regrettable, the GOG, in contrast to its predecessor, acknowledged, although belatedly, Hurtado's detention.

In an attempt to deal more effectively with the guerrilla threat the Guatemalan Government instituted on July 1 a series of martial law decrees that establishes courts of special jurisdiction to try persons found guilty of specific charges of subversion, cancels all licenses to bear arms, authorizes searches of houses and cars without court orders, establishes GOG control over television and radio broadcasting and authorizes summary justice under battlefield conditions as specified in the military code. The decrees are valid for thirty days.

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SUBCOMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT INSTITUTIONS AND FINANCE,
Washington, D.C., July 20, 1982.

STEPHEN W. BOSWORTH,
Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BOSWORTH: Thank you for your letter responding to my inquiry on the basis for changing U.S. voting policy toward Guatemala at the multilateral development banks. I also very much appreciated your commitment to the African Development Fund legislation.

I am disappointed, however, by the quality of the background information attached concerning Guatemala and deeply concerned that, based on such information, the Department appears to have made a highly questionable assessment about the current status of human rights in Guatemala. I would agree that some of the early signals coming from the Rios Montt government were hopeful. Much of the background information you provided draws on that earlier period. More recent developments, however, are more worrisome.

I am disappointed that the information cited in the attachment comes so often from the Guatemalan press or government and rarely from any independent source or U.S. investigation. There is little evidence of efforts to check the accuracy of the information or to independently gather other information. This becomes a particular problem when quotations in the press from deposed junta members Colonels Maldonado Schaad and Gordillo are cited as authorities on future plans of the regime.

Much of the information was not relevant to the sepcific questions raised by Section 701. The interest of the new government in punishing corruption and (before the recent State of Seige declaration) reforming electoral law, as you indicate, is positive, but it is not relevant to Section 701.

I am concerned, too, about what seems to be a selective use of quotations and information. For example, General Rios Montt is quoted (in the "Promises" section) making a statement supportive of human rights in March. He has been quoted more recently and more specifically, however, stating that "human rights is an international topic which they use to annoy a government or people which is against communism" (Prensa Libre, May 10) and condemning subversives "hiding behind human rights" (Guatemala City Domestic Service, July 2). Statements, however, are not my main concern.

As I indicated in my June 13 letter, I am interested in knowing "the background and evidence that you can share to substantiate Guatemala's new qualification under Section 701." I am interested in learning the extent to which torture, holding prisoners without charge and extra-legal execution by the government continue or do not continue to take place and the extent to which the government does or does not locate, try and punish those who committed such abuses under the previous regime.

I have spoken with other members of the Subcommittee on International Development Institutions and Finance concerning this issue. Because of the wide interest in U.S. policy in this area, I have scheduled a hearing of the Subcommittee for Thursday, August 5 at 10:00 a.m. to examine this issue. I will write separately to Secretary Schultz to ask that the State Department testify. I will also contact Secretary Regan to ask that any action on this loan be delayed pending our hearing.

I look forward to continuing to exchange views with you on this matter.

Sincerely,

JERRY M. PATTERSON,
Chairman.●

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), for today, on account of official business.

(c) The President shall issue such regulations as are necessary to carry out this section.

(d) If the President determines that the Government of Vietnam is returning to Vietnam those Vietnamese nationals whom that Government has sent against their will to other Communist countries, then the President may suspend the provisions of this section.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

HON. BARNEY FRANK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, earlier this year Sol C. Chaikin, president of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, made a very thoughtful and comprehensive speech on the need to rethink several areas of public policy to the conference of the Americans for Democratic Action. A number of commentators have called on those who are critical of the Reagan program. Not simply to reject the President's proposals, but, in fact, to offer constructive programs of their own. The speech which Chick Chaikin gave to the ADA is a first-rate example of how critics of the President ought to meet that challenge. Drawing on his experience as the leader of a major American trade union, as well as his wide-ranging knowledge about public policy problems, both domestically and internationally, Mr. Chaikin presented to the ADA both a thoughtful analysis of American society and a reasoned set of proposals as to how to deal with these problems. I ask that this very useful speech be reprinted here.

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

Two crucial tasks confront every liberal-minded American. The first is to re-establish the progressive coalition that elected Presidents Roosevelt, Truman, Kennedy, Johnson and Carter. Old friends—labor, minorities, urbanites, women, intellectuals, consumer and environmental groups—must reach out to one another and refind the strength that makes them the true political backbone of the country.

The second major task is to hammer out a program that addresses the difficult problems facing our nation. FDR's promise of decent housing, decent health care, decent education and decent living conditions for all Americans, the goals of full employment and low inflation set forth in the Humphrey-Hawkins bill still await fulfillment.

In this major address to the Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt Centennial Conference of the Americans for Democratic Action, Sol C. Chaikin, President of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, offers a program toward meeting both of these goals. This agenda for the '80s promises more than a rebirth of the economy. In President Chaikin's words, it "would mean a rebirth of the American Spirit."

—EDUCATION DEPARTMENT, ILGWU.

May I begin by thanking ADA for inviting me to address this distinguished assembly. To the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, to like minded organizations and individuals, to me personally, it is more than just a passing incident. I see this moment as a symbolic renaissance, a time for the rebirth of the liberal coalition.

The hour is well timed. This is the one hundredth anniversary of Roosevelt's birth. Surely, according to some religious or cultural tradition, every one hundred years a new prophet should appear to restate and to renew the faith. Though, obviously, I do not fulfill that role, I should like to think that the hour has come for us and that, somewhere out there, he or she waits for our call.

In 1947, when ADA was born, my predecessor, David Dubinsky, was one of the founding fathers. ADA was then a kind of government-in-exile, made up of old New Dealers, Rooseveltians, who felt like outsiders in the first days of Harry Truman. Indeed, the earliest effort of ADA was to find an alternate candidate to Truman.

In 1948, Truman won the nomination—contrary to the best desires of ADA. To the credit of the organization, once Truman was nominated, he won the backing of ADA—and he was elected.

In this victory, both Truman and ADA had unlikely assists from Henry Wallace and Strom Thurmond. Mathematically, Wallace and Thurmond should have insured the election of Republican Dewey. Wallace drained off support of a "leftist"—basically pro-Soviet—wing of the Democratic Party. Thurmond, the Dixiecrat candidate, drew off the support of a "rightist"—basically segregationist—wing of the Democratic Party. By the numbers, Truman had to lose with his own party torn three ways.

But he won because politically he was liberated from the incubus of the fellow travelers on the left and the segregationists on the right. He was able to run as a liberal in the great American tradition of championing human rights both internationally and domestically, both politically as embodied in our first Bill of Rights and economically as embodied in Roosevelt's Second Bill of Rights when he proclaimed the right to a job, a decent income, a home, education, health care.

In the years since Truman, the liberal coalition has lost some of its cohesion. It really never fell totally apart: witness the elections of Kennedy, Johnson, Carter and the near-miss of Humphrey. But the coalition did lose some of its glue: the dedication to human rights, economic and political, here and around the globe.

The reasons are not hard to find. Our success produced some schisms. The relative affluence we have enjoyed until recently made our common economic dedication—full employment—less urgent. New issues pressed to the fore: civil right, women's rights, gay rights, student rights, children's rights, environment, nuclear energy and disarmament. In many cases, movements became single-issue minded, subject to all the internal factionalism of the passionately political. No issue, of course, was more divisive than Vietnam, tearing us apart ideologically, by generation, by a division between most intellectuals and most of labor, and finally by a campaign in which ADA backed Eugene McCarthy and others of us favored Hubert Humphrey.

INDUCING RECESSION

In that election of 1968, Richard Milhous Nixon was narrowly elected. But he interpreted his thin margin as a mighty mandate to reverse the direction of American policy. Seizing upon an inflation rate of between four and five percent in 1968 (an annual rate that we would today find most acceptable), Nixon proposed a policy of combatting inflation by inducing recession. He decided that it is proper national policy to manufacture unemployment.

Because of the ill repute into which Nixon subsequently fell, it is tempting to say that the perverse politics of deflating by a depression is the aberration of an evil genius. The truth is that the Nixon policy was the logical and necessary expression of a wholly unacceptable philosophy that has dominated our national attitude for more than a decade.

That doctrine holds that inflation is caused by people having too much money. Not all people, but some. America's working and middle classes, those who work for wages and salaries, have too much. America's poor, who depend on welfare and food stamps and rent supplements have too much. The only people who do not have too much are the richest, who do not have enough to invest to provide jobs for the rest of us.

The solution is elementary. Hold down wages and salaries, hold down expenditures for the poor, enlarge the income of those who have more than they need.

The policy, hinted at by Eisenhower, stated more boldly by Nixon, is under President Reagan the decisive dogma of the Administration. It is called "supply-side" economics.

In practice, it is three policies wrapped into one:

The first policy is to restrain the economy, to allow unemployment to rise and then to continue at painfully high rates. The second policy is to write a tax code that will enrich the richest at the expense of everyone else. The third policy is to try to balance the budget by cutting into the social programs of those who need federal aid. All three programs add up to a massive redistribution of income from the bottom through the middle to the top—a redistribution not accomplished by the invisible hand of the market but by the very visible hand of the government.

The mischievous mix is a formula for social explosion. We have a growing population living in a shrinking economy. Inevitably, social tensions must mount as each of us turns against the other in the struggle to maintain our group's share of the pie. This Hobbesian state of civil war will be sharpened as our limited income is redistributed to the top, igniting the poorest and most volaltile elements in the country to explode.

At such a time—as in the time of the Great Depression and World War II—the various popular movements that make up the liberal coalition should find a natural cause to coalesce and to form the core of a national rededication to a common course of action. To begin with, as so often in the past, we will find our unity less in our friendship for one another and more in a common fear and foe.

But in politics, unlike in algebra, a double negative does not make a positive. We need a program that is something more than a rejection of what confronts us.

A popular proposal—for openers—is to cut and stretch out the military budgets and to transfer the funds to social programs. The notion is appealing. It has an ethical appeal, a rejection of the obscene policy of spending more to kill people while spending less to keep people alive. It has an economic appeal, for money poured into armaments eats up resources without providing consumer goods and is, therefore, inflationary. It has a humanitarian appeal, because if we are ever to set our missiles on their deadly mission we would end up with a cosmic holocaust. It has a pragmatic appeal, especially after Admiral Rickover's scathing attack on waste in the military.

All this must prompt us to insist that the defense budget be scrutinized with all the industry that we apply to other programs so that military expenditures do not become just a welfare program for defense contractors.

We must support every move to hold down or reduce the level of armaments through talks and agreements with the Soviet Union, whether the negotiations to do so are called SALT, START or just plain HALT.

While such efforts are both necessary and desirable, it would be a great illusion on the part of American liberalism to assume that reduced expenditures on the military would solve our economic problems or that a unilateral halt to arms spending would enhance opportunities for greater peace and freedom in the future.

We are now committed to spending about $200 billion a year for defense. That represents about 7 percent of our Gross National Product of $3 trillion. About half the military expenditures are for personnel. Funds for hardware represent about 4 percent of GNP.

That 4 percent is no mean sum. But it is less than the cost of a 9 percent unemployment rate; it is a fraction of the cost of artificially inflated interest rates; it is less than the cost of tax expenditures, that deceptive euphemism for tax loopholes. The arms budget dwindles alongside the costs of the destructive economic policies of the last decade.

Let us consider the arithmetic. If we did what the Humphrey-Hawkins Act legislated us to do, our economy would be running at full capacity instead of the present 70 percent of capacity. Another trillion dollars a year would be added to our GNP. The military budget would be about 5 percent of the GNP. At present tax rates, another trillion in the economy would yield an additional $200 billion a year, enough to balance the budget and to provide an added $100 billion of social programs.

Maintaining a strong defense posture is economically possible for America. It is also politically necessary!

If we disarm, the Soviet Union is not likely to follow our noble example. Its prime fear is not only America but its own empire—inherited from the Czars and greatly expanded by the present occupants of the Kremlin. Russian excesses in Afghanistan and Poland are mere hints of Russia's fears that someday all its minorities, in and around the Soviet Union, will sooner or later demand their freedom. Russian arms, in the first place, are aimed at their own enslaved people and those in their eastern satellites!

Russia has an economic as well as a political compulsion to maintain extensive military power. It cannot feed itself. It will soon become dependent on Third World countries for materials. It seeks economic hegemony in distant lands and military control over vital sea lanes.

What we must hope is that the Soviet Union will find that the cost of its military machine is prohibitive and that the extraordinary expenditures are causing more economic and political problems than they are solving. At such time, real progress in mutual arms reduction may be possible.

But until then, it is unrealistic and undesirable for the United States to deny itself adequate military strength and it is unnecessary for us to do so if we determine to make full utilization of our economic potential.

THE SOLUTION IS GROWTH

Our ability to meet our domestic needs and to fulfill our international obligations—to put it more bluntly, to afford both guns and butter—depends upon economic growth.

Priority Number One in a program for the '80's is economic growth. And to grow we must redistribute the national income by reversing the present direction of maldistribution. That redistribution is demanded for both equity and efficiency.

Equity insists that the present gap between top and bottom is intolerable. Too few have too much; too many have too little. Our one nation indivisible is turning into two nations, badly divided, between the privileged and the rest of us—the poor, the near poor, and the about to be poor.

Present maldistribution is unworkable as well as unfair. It is inefficient.

Ours is a market economy. The American market consists of the 85 percent of the families dependent on wages and salaries for their income. If that market is shrunk, as we have been systematically shrinking it for at least a decade, then the entire economy must shrink.

Our first priority is to strengthen our market economy by strengthening our market, namely, the income of the families that live on wages and salaries.

In redistributing income, there are crucial priorities. At the top of the agenda are the working poor.

I refer to those in the labor force who are employed full time, work a full year, but whose after-tax take-home buying power is so low that they find themselves either below the poverty line or barely above it. Among them are to be found five million workers who depend on the Federal Minimum Wage of $3.35 per hour to provide for their earnings.

These working poor can be found in fairly well-defined sections of our society: in labor-intensive manufacture, in the service trades, in retailing, in clerical jobs. They are the non-affluent sectors in our allegedly affluent economy. They are the secondary layer in our two-tier economy.

They are not people who are jobless; they have jobs. They are not without skills; indeed, in some cases they have more skills than their sisters and brothers in the primary sector. They are the hapless victims of their occupational circumstance.

In this lower tier of the economy, there is a disproportionately large number of women and minorities. Indeed, the gap between the wages of women and men is primarily due to this occupational segregation of the labor force. The same is true for the lower pay of minorities.

As we address ourselves to the redistribution or income, we must not only have an eye on achieving greater equity as between the super-rich and the rest of us but also as between the primary and secondary layers of our two-tier society.

A redistribution of income must be accompanied by a reexamination of America's place in the world economy. Here we have two concerns: the import of goods and the export of capital.

We live in a time when the economy has become internationalized. Major nations are increasingly involved in buying from and selling to other nations. And precisely because economic energies are no longer confined to national boundaries, the U.S. cannot be an island unto itself—an island of free trade in an ocean of protectionism.

In the last decade, labor-intensive manufacture has lost many hundreds of thousands of jobs that were eroded in waves of imports from countries where wages are counted in pennies, not dollars. In many cases, these imports are the products of American manufacturers using foreign labor to produce cheaply—not to give a bargain to the American consumer, but to enlarge the profit margins of the manufacturer, or the retailer, or the importer—or all of them.

The people who were hit hardest and first by these tidal waves of imports are the workers in labor-intensive manufacture. They are the working poor now threatened with imported unemployment.

But the import flu, like any other virulent contagion, has not been confined to labor-intensive manufacture. It has spread to electronics, TV, steel, auto, computers. The disease that was once the occupational hazard of light manufacture has hit all American manufacture.

The import of goods is only one half the problem; the other half is the export of American capital.

In the last decades, one of America's greatest exports has been the export of production. Multinational corporations have taken what David Ricardo would have called our natural advantages—namely, capital and technology—and have located these factors of production in other lands, using overseas facilities as a platform from which to launch exports to the U.S.

This flow of commodity import and capital export is responsible for the deindustrialization of America.

In allowing goods to flow in and capital to flow out, the United States is unique among the industrial nations of the world. We are the victims of laissez faire policies when laissez faire is long dead—if it ever existed.

The time has come when liberals who see through the nonsense of laissez faire domestically also reject the myths about the desirability or even the possibility of such conduct internationally. Free trade is a myth; fair trade is a must!

We must as a nation evolve a rationale policy of fair trade.

The deindustrialization of America, however, is not due solely to our laissez faire attitudes on trade and capital export; manufacture in the United States has been on the decline also because of our similar attitude on domestic investment.

The American steel industry is obsolete; virtually no new plant has gone up in the last forty years. Renewal of that vital industry is necessary not only to meet international competition, but also to serve our domestic needs and to do so in a way that uses state of the art technology.

To encourage steel producers and other manufacturers of vital products to invest in new facilities, our government has written tax laws to provide new riches to some of the richest in our land.

But, instead of investing this newfound wealth in modernization, our mega-corporations have opted to play the merger game. U.S. Steel buys Marathon Oil. Others buy Conoco. Each day they buy one another in a speculative spree that does not add one new tool for modernization, does not add one job, does not turn out one additional product.

We know, as we should have known, that to redistribute income to the top with the expectation that this new capital in the hands of the capitalists will mean more production, more jobs, more modernization is a vain hope. We can not entrust our capital resources to the whims of laissez faire.

What we need are national goals, such as modernization of the steel and auto industry, such as development of supplemental sources of energy, such as new towns and cities, such as a national system of health care, such as purification of our waters and detoxification of our soil and access to capital at modest rates of interest for small business.

We must add to our investment in human capital. Young people should be encouraged and aided financially in their quest for a college education. Workers should be invited to seek higher skills, training and retraining.

We cannot leave the decision to do these things to the big investors. Too often they will choose to speculate rather than invest. They will opt for the fast buck, for the capital gain, for taking care of the insiders in the merger game.

The major decisions on how our capital and human resources are allocated must be made by those entrusted with the public interest.

Our tax laws should encourage targeted investment and should discourage the use of our precious capital for gambling. If someone prefers to speculate, then the winnings ought to be taxed at least as heavily as earned income and, preferably, more heavily. Rewards should go to those who put their money where the national interest dictates.

To set targeted goals—whether through tax policy or through the use of the process envisioned in the Humphrey-Hawkins Act—can do more than spur growth, more than modernize, more than lift productivity. Targeted goals can also combat inflation.

The four most inflationary factors have been fuel, food, housing and health care.

It should be a national target to expand our sources of fuel, both in diversity and quantity.

It should be a national target to unleash, rather than restrain, our agricultural output.

It should be a national target to provide housing, building in new places and tearing down the rot in old places.

It should be a national target to provide adequate health care for all and to devote a greater share of our resources to promote continued good health.

More fuel, more food, more housing, and more health are all ways to increase supply to hold down prices. This is the kind of supply-side economics that we should be promoting.

AN AGENDA FOR THE 1980'S

We must always remember that the mark of a civilized society is what we do for those of us who have the least, not what we do for those who have too much!

What I have tried to do is to suggest an Agenda for the '80's.

It calls for growth; it proposes a redistribution of income with special attention to the neediest; it suggests the need for realistic economic policies in our international economy; it urges a public presence in the allocation of capital resources to stimulate targeted growth to meet national needs and to battle inflation.

The realization of such a program would do move than revive our economy. It would open new opportunities to women and minorities; it would offer an attractive future to the young; it would restore our self-confidence as a nation.

Around such a standard, the many elements that once composed the liberal coalition should once more reassemble to write great new chapters in our history. It would be our living memorial to Roosevelt and to our other heroes in our liberal pantheon.

We are an abundant land—fabulously so. We do not lack resources. We do not lack talent. But we do lack a vision for the future of our nation.

In the absence of such a vision, we are lost—and the young are doubly lost because they grew up in the recent decades when our war against the Great Depression was an item for the history books.

Together we can create such a vision. To me, the rebirth of our economy, with plans reaching from now into the next century, would mean a rebirth of the American Spirit.●

GUARANTEED STUDENT LOAN PROGRAM—THOUGH NOT SUBSIDIZED—NEEDED FOR MIDDLE INCOME STUDENTS, TOO

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, this is the time of year when students are finalizing plans for higher education or vocational training programs for the fall. For many, the decisions they face are further complicated by the confusion and uncertainty surrounding the availability of financial assistance.

Along with many other valuable programs, student aid has suffered its share of cutbacks for fiscal 1982. And, in the months ahead, Congress will be considering requests for further reductions for fiscal 1983.

There is no doubt that Congress must reduce the rate of Federal spending and move quickly toward a balanced budget. But as the rate of increase in the Federal budget is scaled back, determining priorities becomes increasingly important. This involves putting money into worthwhile programs while taking it away from others that have proved unnecessary or unworkable.

One of my highest priorities is education, and I am concerned that adequate funding be provided for student loans, including graduate student loans. Higher education is one of the strongest foundations on which our country rests and its continued support is a solid investment in our future.

Although the guaranteed student loan—GSL—program has been in existence for many years, it began expanding rapidly in 1978 when the loans were made available to all students regardless of income. Federal expenditures for interest subsidies rose from $331 million in 1977 to close to $3 billion projected for 1982. The program now serves nearly 4 million students.

Two major problems emerged as the program developed:

Many students whose families could afford to fund their educations took advantage of the low-interest Government-subsidized loans while using their own money for higher yielding investments.

Many students failed to repay the loans causing a severe drain on the program's funding pool.

In 1981, these problems were addressed by the Reagan administration. A "needs" test was instituted for students who wished to borrow funds at a subsidized interest rate of 9 percent, and a strong program was initiated to collect overdue loans.

However, as part of this proposal the administration wanted to eliminate student loan funds entirely for students who did not meet the "needs" test. I objected to this proposal because it would have completely eliminated many middle-income students whose parents simply do not have on hand the extremely large sums of money necessary today for educational costs.

Consequently, I sponsored a proposal to allow independent students or parents who would otherwise be ineligible for student loans because they do not meet the "needs" test to borrow up to $2,500 annually at market interest rates. This is intended to enable all students to obtain GSL's for higher education, although not at the subsidized rate. This idea was adopted by Congress, although the unsubsidized rate was pegged at 14 percent. Unfortunately, not all States have enacted the legislation necessary to make these loans available. Further changes in the law are needed this year to insure that this program will work as intended.

As a member of the House Appropriations Committee, I also supported a measure this spring to add $1.3 billion in supplemental funds to the fiscal 1982 GSL appropriation. This would include funds for graduate as well as undergraduate student loans. A smaller request by the administration for $978 million in supplemental funds, which would have completely excluded graduate student loans, was rejected by the committee. Again, the presumption that funds are readily available for students simply because they have reached the graduate level, in my judgment, is not warranted.

The $1.3 billion in supplemental funding must be approved by Congress and signed by the President to take effect.

I also have cosponsored House Resolution 422, expressing the sense of Congress that graduate and professional students should remain eligible for GSL's and that funds for campus-based student assistance should not be further reduced. This resolution has 91 cosponsors and currently is pending in the House Education and Labor Committee.

It should be remembered that a student loan program in which all borrowing is repaid has no costs except administrative overhead and interest subsidies. With vigorous collection efforts to insure that loans are, in fact, repaid and with interest subsidies made available only to needy students, the GSL program should stabilize and real costs should actually decrease substantially in the future.

Those students interested in additional information on student assistance for 1982 can obtain a booklet entitled: "A Guide to Federal, State and Private Financial Aid to College Students," by calling my Northbrook service office at 272-0101.

The booklet explains the five basic Federal student aid programs and their eligibility requirements. It is a valuable resource tool for students planning their educational futures.●

RADIO WAR WITH CUBA

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am including in today's RECORD an excellent editorial which appeard in today's New York Times concerning the Reagan administration's ridiculous proposal to create a propaganda radio station for Cuba—Radio Marti.

The administration has yet to provide one credible reason to create this station. As the Times' editorial notes: "Starting a radio war on Cuba promises nothing more useful than static."

I urge my colleagues to vote against H.R. 5427, which authorizes $17.7 million to establish Radio Marti, and I commend this important editorial to their attention:

RADIO WAR WITH CUBA

One can imagine how indignant Ronald Reagan would be if a Democratic Administration spent money it didn't have to create a superfluous propaganda station, all to placate an ideological claque. That pretty well describes his Administration's determination to establish Radio Marti, to broadcast to Cuba. The Navy says it is already building four 250-foot antennas in Key West, even before Congress has voted a dime for this objectionable and extravagant project.

About the only argument for the station is that Fidel Castro is threatening a radio counterattack if Radio Marti is built. Cuba could send signals that would interfere with broadcasts of 200 AM stations in 32 states. No one would want to appear to yield to such Castro bluster.

But that aside, what affirmative reasons are there to build the station? Does the White House really believe that Cubans need special propaganda to expose the lapses of Communism? In truth, what has most unsettled Mr. Castro's tyranny are the stories told by more than 100,000 visiting exiles of their success in the United States. Perversely, in order to look tough on Cuba, the Reagan Administration has made traveling to Havana harder, not easier.

The evident reason for starting Radio Marti is to appease Congressional right-wingers and provide employment for loyalists like F. Clifford White, recently named to head the station. Mr. White managed Barry Goldwater's 1964 run for the Presidency and James Buckley's Conservative Party Senate victory in New York in 1970.

Building antennas before Congress even votes the $10-million "start-up" costs may not be legal, and those masts may be usable for defense, as the State Department argues. But starting a radio war on Cuba promises nothing more useful than static.●

CREDIT FOR TRYING?

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the recent developments in Poland must be judged with care and with recognition of the fact that policy decisions by the Polish regime are dictated by Moscow.

Therefore, I commend to the Members the lead editorial in this morning's (July 23) Washington Post. I believe it to be right on target:

CREDIT FOR TRYING?

Should the West give Poland credit for trying to ease martial law? Literally, that is the question posed by Gen. Jaruzelski's latest moves. He has freed another batch of political prisoners, eased certain curbs on travel and communications, held out the possibility of receiving Pope John Paul II next year, and vaguely offered to suspend martial law altogether if tensions subside. In return, he asks the West to lift the sanctions, on credits, debt rescheduling and so forth, that it imposed when he declared martial law last December.

Serious people, and not only Europeans itching to break NATO's December ranks and go back to business as usual, think that President Reagan should respond. Their theory is that Gen. Jaruzelski's policy of gradual relaxation and reform is the only feasible one available to him and that Mr. Reagan could encourage the process by matching strides. True, NATO had asked in December, and it asked again in May, for the release of all detainees, for the end of martial law and for the resumption of a state dialogue with Solidarity and the Catholic Church. However, to stick with these ambitious goals (it is argued) hobbles efforts for a more realistic pace of change, allows Warsaw to shift the onus for the country's economic duress to the United States, and forces it to rely more heavily on Moscow.

We do not dismiss every aspect of this theory of the case. We note, however, that so far the Reagan-inspired theory on which NATO is operating is showing results. The evidence is not simply that the Soviet Union is being forced to divert resources to keep the Polish economy from going belly up. The evidence is that the Jaruzelski regime has been moving by stages toward the NATO goals. It is always possible, of course, to overplay a good hand. But just when the regime has eased up a bit is no time for a premature payoff that might remove its incentive to keep moving.

Lech Walesa and some 600 others remain incarcerated. It is only some of the rigors of martial law, not the structure, that have been eased. The responsible popular forces of Solidarity and the church are far from receiving the roles that they deserve and that Poland desperately needs.●

THE INTERNATIONAL DRUG TRADE

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Foreign Affairs Newsletter for July 1982 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE INTERNATIONAL DRUG TRADE

The use of illegal drugs in the United States ranks among our most severe social problems. Dangerous drugs claim the lives of hundreds of people each year, cause psychological problems for thousands of others, and are a chief source of violent crime. The retail value of illegal drugs used in the United States is estimated to approach $100 billion annually.

It is truly an international problem. Most of the dangerous drugs consumed in this country come from outside our borders. Heroin is produced from poppies grown in Southeast Asia (Burma, Laos, and Thailand), in Mexico, and in Southwest Asia (Iran, Pakistan, and Afghanistan). Cocaine is produced from coca plants grown in Peru and Bolivia and is shipped to the United States through Ecuador and Colombia. Although some marijuana is produced in the United States, much of it comes from Colombia and Jamaica.

At the national level, there are many programs, both private and public, designed to combat the use of illegal drugs. For instance, there are programs of education, law enforcement, and rehabilitation. These efforts at home are supported by international efforts to limit the availability of drugs, but it is important not to underestimate the extreme difficulty of stopping international drug traffic.

As strange as it may seem to an American, there is no widespread consensus on the need to stop international drug traffic. Some countries consider it a uniquely American problem. They do not attempt to control it themselves, and they do not see why they should help us control it. Also, the regions where the raw materials for drugs are produced are so rural and isolated that effective policing of them is not possible. The entire American market for opium, for example, could be supplied from the produce of a few square miles of land tucked away in rugged, remote mountains. Cutting off dangerous drugs at our borders is yet another problem. In fact, it is a herculean task.

More than 65 million automobiles and trucks, 300,000 airplanes, and 150,000 ships come into this nation each year. It is extremely costly to stop and search even a fraction of those vehicles.

The goal is to lower the rewards and raise the risks of participation in the international drug trade. The enormous profits to be gained from trafficking in drugs, and the rather small risks of capture, conviction, and incarceration, currently make the gamble worthwhile. The figures are really quite remarkable. The grower in Bolivia may receive $1,000 to $10,000 for enough coca leaves to make one kilogram of cocaine (a kilogram is about 2.2 pounds), but when the final product sells on the streets of American cities its value will be $800,000. One kilogram of heroin goes for 1.2 million to $1.6 million, yet the Pakistani farmer who cultivates the poppies receives only $350 to $1,000. A pound of marijuana may give the Colombian grower three dollars, but the American dealer will charge as much as $900 on the street.

The United States has taken a variety of steps to assist other countries in the campaign to suppress international drug traffic. The Bureau of International Narcotics Matters, part of the Department of State, spends $40 million each year for bilateral and multilateral programs. These funds provide training to law enforcement officers, help with the purchase of equipment, aid in the development of economic alternatives for growers, and support various programs of prevention and treatment. American-supported initiatives of crop eradication and substitution are underway in Peru and Bolivia. Mexican and American law enforcement officials have worked together to stanch the flow of illegal drugs across our southern border. United States has provided several countries with aircraft for spraying crops and boats for patroling coastal waters. American assistance helps distribute literature against the production and use of dangerous drugs. These are important initial steps, but even in light of the recent congressional hearings have concluded that our narcotics programs are drifting and need more attention if they are substantially to reduce the flow of illegal drugs into this country.

The outlook for limitings the supply of dangerous drugs in the United States is not favorable. We have not been able to cut the supply of heroin coming from Southwest Asia. Although Pakistan is a target of much American aid, American officials have not given priority to narcotics control there. The supply of heroin is once again increasing. Equally poor prospects for control exist in the cocaine and marijuana markets. The popularity of cocaine is rising, and programs to eradicate coca plants in South America have not produced lasting results. The success of such programs depends in part on additional American assistance. The supply of marijuana is increasing, too, and predictions are that domestic production will become more important in the market. Only a major crackdown at home and abroad could curtail the traffic in marijuana.

The many difficulties we have encountered should not deter our efforts to stop international durg traffic, but they should make us realize that there is no quick and complete solution to the problem. The best we can expect to achieve is a noticeable reduction in the quantity of dangerous drugs entering the United States.

Tougher steps can and should be taken. For example, the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 gives the President the power to suspend economic and military assistance to countries which do not move to halt the production and transportation of drugs. In our negotiations with drug-producing countries, the President could mention the fact that he might use his power. Also, we should not overlook the law's requirement that the United States oppose any loan by a multilateral devlopment bank, such as the World Bank, to countries failing to implement measures to restrict the production and distribution of durgs.●

PEACE IN NORTHERN IRELAND

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which calls for peace in Northern Ireland and the establishment of a unified Ireland.

There is no justifiable reason why violence and strife should continue in Ireland on either side. Innocent people—both Protestants and Catholics, civilians and military personnel—are being subjected to the cruellest torture of all: uncertainty. In Northern Ireland, indeed throughout the whole of the British Isles, the population does not know when, where, or whom violence will strike. The certain factor, is however, that it will strike.

A unified Ireland is a goal that is sound, popular, and necessary if violence is to be eliminated. My legislation calls for the elimination of U.S. military assistance to Great Britain for use in Northern Ireland, excepting the very necessary NATO assistance that we provide for world peace.

The United States has a positive role to play in the peace process in Northern Ireland, and by providing military assistance for use in that region only exacerbates the situation.

Mr. Speaker, in inviting my colleagues to support this proposal, I insert the entire text of my proposed legislation at this point in the RECORD:

H.J. RES. 548

Joint resolution calling for peace in Northern Ireland and the establishment of a United Ireland

Whereas the continuing strife in Northern Ireland is a cause of deep concern to Americans of all faiths and political persuasions; and

Whereas the Nation of Ireland has been partitioned against the wishes of the majority of the Irish people; and

Whereas the Governments of the United Kingdom and of Northern Ireland have failed to end the bloodshed and have failed to establish measures to meet the legitimate grievances of the minority in Northern Ireland; and

Whereas our Nation's relationship with the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain has been supportive; and

Whereas reports have indicated that the United Kingdom of Great Britain has been purchasing military supplies and equipment from the United States for use in Northern Ireland; and

Whereas after hundreds of years of bitter confrontation, hopes for a lasting peace in Northern Ireland remain dim: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States of America urge the President of the United States to direct the representative of the United States to the United Nations to call upon that body to request full respect for the civil rights of all the people of Northern Ireland, the termination of all political, social, economic, and religious discrimination, the settlement of the question of the unification of Ireland and that the people of Northern Ireland have a free opportunity to express their will for union and that this be attained by an election of the people of all Ireland, north and south, under the auspices of a United Nations Commission for Ireland, to be designed by the General Assembly pursuant to articles 11 and 35 of the charter, which shall establish the terms and condition of such election; and be it further

Resolved, That the United States of America shall discontinue all military aid and training programs with the United Kingdom of Great Britain which are related to the suppression of the minority in Northern Ireland and which are not directly related to North Atlantic Treaty Organization commitments and that the United States of America shall embargo the exportation of all weapons and ammunition to the United Kingdom of Great Britain which are related to the suppression of the minority in Northern Ireland and which are not exclusively reserved for North Atlantic Treaty Organization usage.●

TRIBUTE TO CAPT. DONALD M. TAUB

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to pay tribute to a man who is retiring after having served his Nation and community for a quarter of a century. Capt. Donald M. Taub is leaving the U.S. Coast Guard after 26 years of service. On July 28 his friends will gather at the Navy Officers' Club in Long Beach, Calif., to honor his dedicated service to his country.

Captain Taub has enjoyed experience in many different posts while an officer in the Coast Guard. He attended the U.S. Coast Guard Academy where, in 1956, he received a B.S. degree in engineering. After graduating, he served as a deck officer and as an engineer aboard several Coast Guard vessels in the North Atlantic. He then was appointed commanding officer of Cape Athol Loran Station in Greenland, where he served from 1959 to 1960.

Captain Taub then held positions in San Francisco and New York, as a marine inspector, and as a naval architect. He spent a year in the Coast Guard's marine industry training program, and served as engineer officer aboard a Coast Guard vessel which saw service in Vietnam.

In 1973, Captain Taub was assigned at La Seyne, France, as project officer for the inspection of the first U.S.-flag LNG-LPG liquefied gas carriers. He transferred to Rotterdam in 1975, where he was appointed senior inspector—material to the first Marine inspection office outside of U.S. territory.

In August 1976, Captain Taub served the dual role of commanding officer, Port Safety Station, Long Beach and as captain of the port of the Los Angeles/Long Beach zone. In this capacity he also served as the Federal predesignated on scene coordinator for all coastal pollution incidents, one of which included the explosion of the tankship Sansinena in Los Angeles Harbor. In 1978, he was reassigned as Chief, Marine Safety Division, 11th Coast Guard District Headquarters in Long Beach, the post he has continued to hold to the present day. In this position he has been responsible for the marine inspection of vessels and personnel; the safety of port facilities, cargo, and vessel operations; and the marine environmental protection programs in the southeren California area, also serving as chairman of the coastal water pollution regional response team, which consists of Federal and State agencies.

Captain Taub has been a member of numerous professional organizations, including the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers; Society of Port Engineers; American Welding Society; and the American Society of Mechanical Engineers. He is a past vice president of the Los Angeles area chapter of the National Defense Transportation Association, and is active in the maritime committees of our local chambers of commerce.

This officer's contributions to the safety and security of our Nation and community have been invaluable. On behalf of the Los Angeles/San Pedro community, I want to say thank you to Capt. Donald Taub for all you have done for us. My wife Lee joins me in wishing Don, his wife Jean, and their three children, Kate, Susan, and Robert, all the best in the years ahead.●

KENT COUNTY WINS NEW COUNTY ACHIEVEMENT AWARD

HON. HAROLD S. SAWYER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend my heartiest congratulations to the Kent County Department of Social Services upon receipt of the New County Achievement Award. This highly distinguished and notably deserved award was presented by the National Counties Association at the association's 47th annual convention, held last week.

Kent County can loudly boast of its remarkable training and placement program, as it has placed more than 2,000 public assistance recipients in jobs in the Grand Rapids area. This, in turn, has created nearly $7.5 million in savings, alone.

This is a can do program in which everyone benefits—the people themselves, the taxpayer, and the employer. Kent County is a strong believer in its public assistance recipients; they are employable, and they can find work; they just need a little help in doing it, and the Kent County Department of Social Services provides the needed assistance in getting these people back to work.

I became very interested in the program after learning about it from Evert Vermeer. Realizing the potential success, I worked hard in obtaining its initial funding and making my colleagues aware of its worthiness and value. Kent County was then chosen as one of the five demonstration sites, throughout the Nation, to take part in an experimental placement program. They have obviously passed with flying colors.

Recognition should also be given to the Grand Rapids and Wyoming public schools and the South Kent community education program, as these instructors provide substantial support in their time and efforts to make this placement program a success.

I strongly encourage my colleagues to take a look at our program. With unemployment levels at record highs, it is time to utilize the placement programs that work and get our people out of the welfare lines. The Kent County Department of Social Services provides such a program—we are proud of it, and I hope we can share our success with other communities across the Nation.●

SHORTAGE OF SCIENCE AND MATH TEACHERS—WE MUST ADDRESS THE CRISIS NOW

HON. DAVE McCURDY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Speaker, our national need for scientific and technical manpower and expertise is growing rapidly. Yet we are faced with a critical shortage of science and math teachers to train our future scientists, engineers, and technicians. Education experts agree that we need to establish programs to attract and retain teachers, including salary boosts, summer retraining programs, and increased industry investment in education. Last week I introduced H.R. 6774 and H.R. 6775, which are designed to increase the current pool of qualified science and math teachers in our public schools and insure an adequate supply of science and math teachers for the future.

A recent article by Gregory M. Lamb pinpoints the science and math education problem and discusses what we can do to solve it. Mr. Lamb pays particular attention to increasing industry's role and investment in education. I would like to direct my colleagues' attention to this enlightening article.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, July 12, 1982]

WHO WILL TEACH THE NEXT GENERATION OF HIGH-TECH SCIENTISTS?

(By Gregory M. Lamb)

The fuel needed to power America's high-technology industries is already in short supply—and the critical situation is worsening.

The raw material that drives these fast-evolving companies—an educated work force ready to become tomorrow's engineers, systems analysts, programmers, technicians—is not being produced in adequate quantity or quality by the nation's high schools, sources within both the education and business communities say.

Headlines telling of declining public school enrollments and teacher layoffs have not told the entire story. Although the need for qualified teachers in many subject areas has plummeted, the nation's public schools now face a serious shortage of teachers in the sciences. The reason: an explosion of interest by students in technical fields such as engineering and computers and an exodus of qualified teachers to better-paying jobs in industry.

"Students aren't stupid; they read the newspaper. They know where the jobs are," says Dr. Elizabeth Useem, associate professor of sociology at the University of Massachusetts in Boston. The "Star Wars" generation is growing up; engineering is now the most popular major for males entering college, she says.

The US Bureau of Labor Statistics predicts a 93- to 112-percent increase in computer services jobs in this decade, with the demand for systems analysts increasing up to 80 percent and for computer programmers, 60 percent.

But at a time that both job-oriented teenagers and high-technology companies are anticipating continued demand for scientific and technical manpower, local public schools have a reduced capacity to respond to that demand:

New York, the nation's second-most populous state, has only thirty-two 1982 college graduates planning to teach junior or senior high school math. The State University of New York (SUNY) at Albany, with over 15,000 students, hasn't graduated a physics teacher for six years.

In New Hampshire, only one college graduate this year is planning a career teaching mathematics, according to a state department of education spokesman.

In the Pacific states (California, Oregon, Washington), 84 percent of newly hired science and math teachers lack the requisite state education department courses for teacher certification. The National Science Teachers Association says.

Twenty-five states have a "critical" shortage of high-school physics teachers, according to a recent national study conducted by Iowa State University; 20 states critically need math and science teachers.

Dr. Useem has just completed the second of two studies examining high school math and science programs in the nation's two leading high-tech regions: northern California's Santa Clara Valley ("Silicon Valley") and the "Golden Horseshoe" along Route 128 west of Boston. If secondary school curricula reflecting today's technological revolution could be found anywhere, she reasoned, it should be in these regions.

In her first study, completed last August, she found major deficiencies in California's schools. Only 15 percent of male high school students and 7 percent of females took three or more years of science, about half as many as the national average and far below rates in Japan, the Soviet Union, and West Germany.

There were also the overall problems of shortened school days and larger classes resulting from funding cutbacks at the schools. Although willing to donate funds, personnel, and equipment to colleges and univesities, nearby high-tech industries showed little sympathy for the money squeeze at the high-school level.

Ms. Useem's just-released Massachusetts study. "Education in a High Technology World: The Case of Route 128," pinpointed another serious problem: potential teacher shortages. In a survey of math and science teachers in eight high schools along the 128 belt she found that only two-fifths of these instructors plan to remain in teaching.

And few new teachers are coming in. "You walk into one of these schools," she said, "and there's hardly anyone [in math or science] under the age of 40. One science faculty had no one under the age of 40. And there are no student teachers."

Until recently, high-tech industries have seemed little concerned aobut the problem.

"Industry has been reticent to participate; they felt it wasn't their problem, that schools could take care of themselves," says Jan McDonald of the Department of Teacher Education at SUNY-Albany.

In late May, Dr. McDonald's department held a seminar on the state of high-school science and math for industry leaders in the Albany area. "Many left with their mouths gaping," she says. The concerns, she adds, suddenly became personal: "Who's going to teach my kids or grandchildren?"

"We're only beginning to get [high-tech industry] people concerned," agrees B. J. Rudman, human-resources consultant to the Massachusetts High Technology Council, a highly visible corporate-interest group representing 124 companies, with 115,000 workers. His own opinion, he says, is that "if we [the industry] don't jump into this, the problem won't be solved. I don't know if we'll see a big government push to solve this issue."

Corporations are spending somewhere between $40 billion and $100 billion each year on corporate training, compared to total university operating budgets of $20 billion to $30 billion, says Dr. Arnold K. Weinstein, an analyst at Arthur D. Little, Universities won't be able to invest in much-needed new laboratories and technical facilities. "That's why we're seeing companies like Wang, IBM, and Xerox investing in education," says Dr. Weinstein.

But designing a larger industry role is not an easy task, Mr. Rudman cautions. "Companies have a hard time trying to figure out how to address the problem," he says, pointing out that Massachusetts alone has hundreds of local school districts, and that there's little coordinated planning among them. One prominent business leader in Dr. Useem's California study observed: "The problems are so big, so bureaucratic and complicated that you don't know where to begin."

In contrast, industry effort is well under way at the college level. In February, for example, a meeting of leaders from engineering schools and high-tech firms agreed on a "2 percent solution." Companies set a goal of spending 2 percent of their research and development funds, $14 million to $15 million a year, to aid the schools.

But help for high schools has been sporadic, at best, although a so-called "computer bill" was the subject of recent hearings in the U.S. House of Representatives. It would provide greater tax write-offs—up to 30 percent of the company's taxable income in the first year—for corporations donating equipment to elementary and secondary schools.

Although that bill has already gained the backing of some education groups, Dr. Useem and Mr. Rudman agree there is a more essential need: programs to attract and keep qualified teachers. Starting teaching salaries in the $11,000-to-$13,000 range, Dr. Useem says, cannot attract graduates who can draw as much as $10,000 more in private industry. And veteran teachers need some "zip" put into their work lives, she says, through programs like summer internships in industry.

In additior., companies could supply scholarships for those planning classroom careers, says Mr. Rudman, as well as share their knowledge and skills through workshops for teachers. Individual companies also could lend key personnel to schools and form one-to-one partnerships with individual high schools, adds David Giguere, a spokesman for the New England Board of Higher Education. Security Pacific Bank in California, the General Electric Company in New York City, and the Bell System in Bridgeport and New Haven, Conn., are doing this now, he says.

"The companies are already paying the price," Dr. Useem contends. "Many already have large training programs, almost like universities. They're having to do a lot of remedial math, remedial writing."●

AMERASIAN CHILDREN—MEETING OUR RESPONSIBILITIES

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. Speaker, a few years ago, an episode of the classic television comedy series "MASH" opened the eyes of Americans to the plight of the Amerasians—half American, half Asian children fathered by U.S. servicemen in Asian countries. As the offspring of non-Asian fathers, Amerasians are considered social outcasts in their Asian homelands as a result of their racial impurity.

In the episode of "MASH," an Amerasian child is left with the "MASH" unit. The entire unit, becoming more and more attached to the child, attempts to win for this born loser a free life in America. Exhausting every possibility—including the Red Cross, the Army, and the American Embassy—they soon realize the futility of their task. Other nations, including the English, the French, and the Dutch, have taken responsibility for the offspring of their servicemen while in Asia. Only the United States has turned its back on these children. "MASH's" favorite daughter became a victim of this policy and was left at a monastery which was her only source of hope.

Now, almost 10 years after Vietnam and over 25 years after the Korean war, the United States still has its back turned to Amerasians. We must no longer choose to forget our own sons and daughters in Asia. We must pass legislation to allow Amerasian children to come more easily to our country.

The Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1982, H.R. 6514, would permit Amerasian children under the age of 21 with sponsorship or under adoption to freely step foot upon our shores.

I strongly support this legislation, but it will come too late for one very special Amerasian girl named Kang Ok Boon who will turn 21 on August 15. She is called Rosemary by her American foster family. For much of her life, she endured physical beatings and emotional pain while self-convinced she was an inferior being as a result of her American father. Last year, I introduced a private bill on Rosemary's behalf, H.R. 684.

Currently, Kang Ok Boon is in the United States on a medical visa while she undergoes heart surgery. Hopefully, this private legislation will be passed soon so that Rosemary can remain in the United States with her new American family and become an American citizen.

The following articles look at the Amerasian problem and the plight of Rosemary on a very direct and personal basis. I am sure you will find the articles informative and persuasive—for the Amerasians' sake and for Rosemary's.

AMERASIANS—A STINT IN KOREA OPENED SOUTH HILL FAMILY'S EYES

(By Gordon Koestler)

Chief Warrant Officer Robert J. Cornyn, a South Hill resident, has logged 19 years in the Army. He's been satisfied with his military career and life with Uncle Sam's Army, but there's one aspect of U.S. foreign policy with which he disagrees.

The U.S. does not recognize the existence of Amerasian children—half American, half Asian—even though, as Cornyn puts it, the kids are "a direct result of U.S. foreign policy."

Amerasian—children, mostly found in Korea, Vietnam, Thailand and Laos, are usually the product of an Asian woman and an American serviceman. Amerasians exist in the Philippines and Japan as well, but those countries cultures are more open and willing to accept them as equals—not so in the other countries, especially Korea and Vietnam.

Cornyn has frontline knowledge of the Amerasian plight. He and his wife, Linda, have adopted five Amerasian children and are working on a couple more—that's in addition to their own three children.

While visiting Korea some years ago, Cornyn became aware of the problem when he was invited by a friend to visit a mission run by Maryknoll Father Alfred Keane. What he saw both appalled and touched him.

There were the forgotten children, the result of the chance mixing of cultures. There were children who were beaten by their peers because they did not fit Korean culture, children who were sick because no one would care for them, children who caught in the gray between the black and white of American foreign policy.

Cornyn explains that the general exclusionist philosophy of Korean life does not provide for the existence of Amerasian children. And since the U.S. government, which has been shipping U.S. servicemen in and out of Korea for more than 30 years, refuses to claim or even allow for their care. Amerasians are truly children without homes.

Cornyn and his family got involved in an attempt to provide those homes and change his country's disavowal of the children's existence.

Besides adopting the children and working with others as both foster parents and sponsors, Cornyn has worked on behalf of pending U.S. legislation to change the way the government looks at Amerasians.

There are bills in both houses of Congress which, if passed, would change U.S. laws to allow for Amerasians to come to America as any other immigrant would and not relegate them to nonentities.

The House of Representatives is conducting hearings on its bill, and lobbyists in the Senate are currently lining up co-sponsors for that version of the legislation.

Cornyn said the Reagan Administration, all seven Washington representatives and Sen. Henry Jackson support the legislation. Sen. Slade Gorton currently does not, evidentally thinking the Amerasian question should be dealt with as part of a comprehensive immigration law, Cornyn said.

He added that concerned constituents could write the senator and ask him to support the proposed change.

With all the kids coming and going in and the luggage strewn about, the Cornyns admit their five-bedroom house looks more like an airport sometimes. And keeping up with the children, aged 16 years to 18 months can be a struggle.

"To say it's not taxing is totally insane," said Linda Cornyn. "Sometimes it just takes a big yell to get it all out."

Unfortunately for the Amerasians still in Korea and other unabiding countries, "a big yell" won't solve their problem. But they do have the benefit of people like the Cornyns on their side.

HALF AND HALF, AND A CITIZEN OF?

(By Robert J. Cornyn)

Her American name is Rosemary. And like most mixed-blood children growing up in Korea, she has a bitter story to tell.

She is an Amerasian (half American and half Asian), a word coined by the late author Pearl S. Buck, who recognized the suffering and plight mixed-blood children face in Asia.

When Rosemary was young she was beaten frequently because she had her father's American face. The beatings left her bruised and in pain. But pain and bruises fade after time. Emotional pain does not.

The saddest part of this true story is the fact that in Rosemary's mind she actually believed that she deserved the beatings.

She was raised to believe that she was inferior because of her mixed-blood heritage. Approximately 40,000 half-American children have been left in Korea, Thailand and Vietnam during the past decade to face the same sad fate. Increased public awareness and proposed congressional legislation represent new hope that these children will soon be able to claim their American heritage.

Today there are thousands of Amerasian children and young adults in Southeast Asia. Our half-American children suffer most in those nations whose culture has been influenced by certain familial beliefs tied to the Buddhist and Confucian religions such as Korea, Thailand and Vietnam.

One's first reaction is to criticize these countries for the inhumane manner in which our children are treated. But this is a mistake. Only through empathy and mutual understanding will a fair and meaningful solution to the problem ever be found.

In Korea the problem is probably at its ugliest because of the constant flow of servicemen in and out of the country and the harsh realities of Korean life.

Korean culture spans more than 5,000 years and has been greatly influenced by Confucianism, which is not just a religion. It is a philosophy with a strong code of moral ethics and a built-in hierarchy.

Confucianism teaches the "correctness" of human relationships and promotes the organization of the family unit. It also teaches that family relationships and bloodlines are much more important than any sense of community belonging.

Within the Korean family, it is the father who holds the key to his child's future success. All social position and legal relationships descend from the father.

The Amerasian, however, has no "father" in a land where the father determines who he or she is.

Perhaps the greatest single barrier to the Amerasian has been the Korean attitude toward racial purity.

Koreans are a Mongoloid race whose members immigrated from China thousands of years ago. They are generally taller and more robust than other Orientals and are proud of their racial purity.

The close family relationships and adherence to pure bloodlines taught and practiced by Koreans have reinforced their dedication to family so that what they practice is, in effect, a racist doctrine when it comes to considering Amerasians.

Americans often have a difficult understanding the concept, having been weaned on the myth of "the Great Melting Pot." To us, the term "Amerasian" might mean the blending of two great cultures. But to a Korean, the term is an insult and a mockery of their racial purity.

American presence in the "land of the morning calm" has enabled Korea to rebuild both her economy and her military prowess. Today, Korea is frequently referred to as "the Great Success Story of the East."

But while America has played a major role in helping her achieve this success, we have also given her the tragedy of the Amerasian child.

Typically, the Amerasian is born of a woman who has taken temporary residence with an American (primarily servicemen). In some cases the mother and father live together for a year or two, but often the father leaves Korea even before his child is born.

Sometimes a stateside father will write and even send money for support. But the contact soon dwindles and the mother is left with her child—destitute and disowned by her family members for the "disgrace" she has brought upon them.

Although adoption would be the best solution for the child, the mother keeps him—often because he is the only object of love in her life.

As the child grows up and enters school, he is faced with hostility and harassment from his classmates and an attitude of indifference from his teachers.

Many Amerasians drop out of school because of the pressure. Many are told over and over that they cannot learn anything because they are half-breed and are, therefore, inferior. Many young Amerasians begin to believe this falsehood and give up on their lives without giving themselves a chance.

Of the few Amerasians who do complete formal schooling, only a handful are emotionally prepared to become productive members of society. And since the Amerasian has no "father," he has no one to help him obtain a job, as spouse or a "social position." Paternal influence in these matters is a Korean tradition, and because of it the Amerasian finds an obstacle any time legal identification is required.

In Thailand Amerasians have not experienced as much hostility because most of them are still relatively young, and the Thai state religion teaches a degree of tolerance. In Vietnam, however, Amerasians are regarded as the "dust of life."

In Korea they are often referred to as "wild seed" or "person in between who belongs to no one." The Amerasian exists in a twilight zone on the peripheries of the Korean and American culture—never to be part of either.

The Rev. Alfred V. Keane, Maryknoll missionary has been working hard during the past several years to help the Amerasian children of Korea obtain their basic human rights, foundling St. Vincent's home for Amerasians near Seoul, Korea.

St. Vincent's is a home for Amerasians Keane found living in the streets and slums. To some, St. Vincent's is a home full of love and understanding. For the first time in their lives, the children are treated with respect and compassion. But more importantly, they are waiting to go to America and be adopted.

Keane has arranged well over 900 adoptions in the United States and has tried to convince servicemen of their responsibilities. In addition Keane has also championed legislation in the U.S. Congress to help the Amerasian obtain his American heritage.

In January, 1981, Rep. Stewart McKinney of Connecticut introduced a bill—House Resolution 808—at the request of Father Keane. The bill, if passed, would change U.S. immigration law to provide some relief to the Amerasians of Korea, Laos, Thailand and Vietnam.

In October, 1981, Sen. Jeremiah Denton of Alabama introduced a similar bill—Senate 1698, also at the request of Keane.

Denton's bill expands the number of nations involved and includes relief for Amerasians in Taiwan, Okinawa and the Philippines.

Both bills are designed to allow these children to take advantage of the "first" and "second" immigration priorities: unmarried sons and daughters of U.S. citizens. (Amerasians are currently classified "seventh" priority: "all others." Very few persons ever immigrate under "seventh" priority.)

The only factor preventing Amerasians from claiming their birthright today is that they are illegitimate for immigration purposes and are not considered sons and daughters of U.S. citizens.

Passage of HR 808 and S 1698 would erase the label of "illegitimacy" and would enable Amerasians to claim the American heritage denied them for so many years.

The legislation would not change the number of persons allowed to immigrate into the United States. Rather, it will give priority to these half-American children who cannot survive in their native country.

Both bills represent hope and the chance for a decent way of life for thousands of half-American children stranded in a society unwilling to accept them.

The Amerasian has faced severe hardships during the past several years, and their suffering will only become worse unless positive steps are taken soon. Nothing is more tragic than a wasted existence. We all deserve a chance to improve our lot in life.

With care and understanding by the American public and with positive action now to change U.S. immigration law, America can rewrite the last page of the diary chronicling her actions in Asia and can close the cover with honor, decency and compassion.

Rosemary is still waiting for the day when she may be allowed to come to the land of her father. She is bitter, but she also understands that some things take time.

Time is running out for Rosemary, however. In addition to her American facial features, she has also inherited a severe heart condition.

Treatment is not available in Korea for her, for in Korea it is necessary to post the money in advance, especially if the prospective patient is poor. It would also be unusual to waste such specialized medical treatment on a mixed-blood child.

Rosemary's only hope is to come to America, the land of her birthright, where surgery and the hope for a decent life can be hers.●

A TRIBUTE TO THE KALAMAZOO JUNIOR SYMPHONY

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, over the past 13 years, in various levels of government, it has been my great honor to represent the people of Kalamazoo, Mich. Those who have had the pleasure to live in, or visit, Kalamazoo, know that it is a very special community that harbors a deep sense of civic pride.

This week, those of us from Kalamazoo have a little more about which to be proud. Some of the younger members of the community were the recipients of a great and prestigious honor: the Kalamazoo Junior Symphony took first place in the youth orchestra division of the 11th annual Youth and Music Festival in Vienna, Austria. The symphony, I might add, was in competition with other youth orchestras from all around the globe.

I rise today simply to congratulate the members of the symphony, their director, Dr. Robert Ritsema, and the many people of the Kalamazoo area for their determined support and encouragement of the arts.●

NATURALIZATION OF EDDIE NATATON AND YAI SUPAWIT BURANAKUL

HON. DANIEL B. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. DANIEL B. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I would like today to announce the naturalization of 10-year-old Eddie Nataton Buranakul and 11-year-old Yai Supawit Buranakul, the children of Dr. Bhirom and Sue Buranakul. The family is originally from Thailand, but now they make their home in Danville, Ill.

It gives me great pleasure to welcome Eddie and Yai in becoming a part of our great Republic which protects the freedoms and liberties of all individuals.

As Eddie and Yai take their vows, it is my wish that they understand that there were those who gave their last full measure of courage so that we could all live in peace and harmony. This is the land of the free and the home of the brave and since I know Eddie and Yai personally, I am sure they will make us all proud of them as citizens of the United States.

Again, Mr. Speaker, let me congratulate Eddie and Yai on this very important day in their lives.●

FIVE-YEAR OCS LEASE PLAN

HON. JOHN B. BREAUX

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Washington Post editorial of today regarding the recently announced Interior Department revisions to the 5-year OCS plan deserves favorable comment.

The Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, which had has a longstanding interest in the issue of offshore oil and gas production, has made many attempts to streamline the process for the exploration and production of our offshore hydrocarbon resources. In the last Congress, our Select OCS Committee published a report advocating many of the revisions that have been incorporated in the Department's new 5-year leasing plan.

This plan has come under criticism from some quarters as inconsistent with the balance Congress has tried to establish between expeditious resource development and the concerns of coastal State and local governments about the environmental and socioeconomic impacts of such development. I believe that the Post editorial correctly reports that this new proposal does not in anyway lessen the safeguards that Congress has enacted and serves the "useful purpose of establishing a reliable inventory of the sites where the industry's technical work points to promising prospects." I believe it is incumbent upon all of us in the Congress to carefully study this bold new plan, and I urge the Members to look behind the rhetoric, as the Post has done, and support this balanced effort to find increased domestic sources of energy.

The Washington Post article follows:

GOING OFFSHORE WITH MR. WATT

The Interior Department's plan for offshore oil exploration is not necessarily a bad one, despite Secretary James G. Watt's excessive enthusiasm for it. Mr. Watt keeps lathering it up in rhetoric that he borrows from the oil industry, and that alone is enough to make most other people suspicious. But there's good reason to accelerate offshore drilling. As for the impact on the environment, the protective laws are sharp and strong. As Mr. Watt has already discovered, if he does not uphold them, the courts will do it for him—vigorously.

In the past, the government has accepted oil companies' proposals for drilling sites only in designated areas. Mr. Watt is now inviting the companies to propose sites almost anywhere in the coastal waters. In those cases where the department chooses to go ahead with the proposal, it will then begin the usual process of preparing an environmental impact statement and notifying state governments. All of those safeguards remain in force. The idea of entertaining proposals anywhere has incensed some of the coastal states. But it serves the useful purpose of establishing a reliable inventory of the sites where the industry's technical work points to promising prospects.

Offshore oil is one of those splended issues that invites everyone to work up a fine fit of righteous wrath, and Secretary Watt's choice of words always encourages that reaction. But it's important to remember that the future of offshore production is a good deal less than the assured bonanza, merely waiting to be tapped, that the secretary's exhortations might lead an incautious listener to suppose.

Currently, about one-eighth of this country's domestic oil comes from the offshore wells, nearly all of them in the Gulf of Mexico. For the past several years, that flow has been slowly falling. The eastern Gulf, which oil geologists once rated as extremely hopeful, has produced almost nothing. There's been a good deal of drilling along the length of the Atlantic coastline, with little to show for it. There has been one important find in the Pacific, at Santa Barbara. But the Gulf of Alaska, advertised several years ago as endlessly rich in prospects, has been an enormously expensive disappointment so far. It is precisely this diminished hope for large discoveries offshore than makes the case now for widening the search.●

INTEREST AND DIVIDEND WITHHOLDING UNNECESSARY

HON. NORMAN E. D'AMOURS

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. D'AMOURS. Mr. Speaker, early this morning the Senate rejected by a very close rollcall vote of 47 to 50 an amendment to remove from the Senate's proposed tax increase bill a provision imposing a new 10-percent withholding tax on interest and dividends.

Since this important issue now moves to the House of Representatives I want to urge my colleagues to cosponsor legislation I have introduced with 41 of our colleagues, House Concurrent Resolution 255, opposing any new interest and dividend withholding tax. Members wishing to cosponsor House Concurrent Resolution 255 should call Mike Radway or Jeff Lawrence at 5-5456.

The Senate withholding proposal should be rejected because it is inequitable, it is not necessary, it creates burdensome new paperwork requirements, it creates mainly a "one shot" gain for the Treasury that cannot be repeated in future years, and it probably cannot be implemented in the timeframe contemplated by the Senate.

I would like to share with my colleagues statements issued by the American Bankers Association, the Independent Bankers Association of America, and the Investment Company Institute explaining in some detail why the Senate withholding proposal will not work, is not necessary, will impede economic recovery, and will be a major burden for taxpayers, financial institutions, businesses, and the Government.

The statements follow:

AMERICAN BANKERS ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., July 14, 1982.

DEAR SENATOR: The Senate Finance Committee approved the Tax Equity and Fiscal Reponsibility Tax Act of 1982 (H.R. 4961) on Monday, July 12th. The full Senate may consider the bill next week. The bankers of the nation support efforts to move toward a more responsible Federal fiscal policy, including reductions in expenditures and necessary increases in taxes. Although other items in the bill increase the taxes banks pay and the operational costs they incur, the American Bankers Association accepts a special responsibility to bring to your attention one aspect of this measure that may have unanticipated adverse effects on the economy as a whole and on individual savers and investors.

The proposal to impose withholding tax on interest and dividends is a disincentive to saving and investment that comes at a high cost to the public. The impact of withholding will reduce savers' and investors' earnings otherwise attained through reinvestment and compounding by an estimated $3 billion. Not only will savers and investors be deprived of this income, the Treasury will be deprived of up to $1 billion in taxes payable on those earnings.

According to the United States Treasury, taxpayers are reporting 85 percent of interest and dividend income subject to reporting, when this compliance figure is compared with the approximately 75 percent of the individual income tax returns that generate tax refunds—over $53 billion for 1981—it indicates that most of the anticipated revenue gain from withholding results from a one-time cash flow surge in 1983 from accelerated collection of taxes. Most of this money will have to be refunded in fiscal year 1984. The Treasury Department's explanation of the initial withholding proposal in February confirms that three-fourths of the increased revenue for fiscal year 1983 is a "change in timing". It is, therefore, only a temporary increase in the cash flow from the taxpayers to the Treasury; not a real increase in revenue. This should not be accomplished at the expense of the overwhelming majority of individuals who save and invest and pay their taxes.

If the purpose of withholding tax on interest and dividends is to increase compliance, the ABA believes that this purpose can be better accomplished, with far less cost and inconvenience to the public, through the broadened information reporting required by the taxpayer compliance provisions contained in H.R. 4961. Such an approach avoids overwithholding and the reduction in yield which would result from withholding on accounts where interest is compounded frequently. It also avoids extending the intrusive presence of government regulations and forms into the daily lives of millions of savers and investors. Why should elderly individuals living on fixed incomes have to fill out exemption forms in order not to have those incomes diminished by a tenth? The ABA believes that it is premature to substitute a mandatory withholding system for a working information reporting system before we have seriously tried to improve our information system. The ABA pledges its cooperation with the IRS and the Treasury in developing an improved, more effective, and more efficient reporting system.

In addition to the impact of withholding on individuals, the proposed system of exemptions and exceptions creates a system of such complexity that neither the IRS, many of the financial institutions that pay interest, nor many of the corporations that pay dividends will be able to implement the system by January 1, 1983. The implementation of such a system requires not only legislation, but regulations and interpretations of those regulations that the Treasury Department likely will be unable to issue with sufficient lead time.

In addition to problems of complexity, financial institutions will be faced with substantial costs in designing and putting into place withholding systems to deal with the vast array of investments and financial services offered to the public. When one also considers the many personal interactions between individuals and their banks, the need to develop procedures and train employees to answer customers' questions and the need to communicate with customers about how the new system will affect them, it becomes clear that implementing a withholding system involves a great deal more than merely reprogramming a computer. Furthermore, it is a widespread misperception that a system of withholding can now be implemented with relatively little effort because of the increased use of the computer.

This proposal has been rejected repeatedly by the Congress whenever it has been proposed in the past. The ABA believes that the reasons for rejecting this proposal in the past remain sound. No new evidence has been brought forward to turn a proposal regarded in the past as a bad idea into a good idea.

Sincerely,

WILLIS W. ALEXANDER.

INDEPENDENT BANKERS
ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
Washington, D.C., July 16, 1982.

DEAR SENATOR: It is our understanding that the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Tax Act of 1982 (H.R. 4961) will be considered by the full Senate early next week.

The small banks of this nation are sensitive to the need to bring the Federal deficit under better control and support Administration and Congressional action to address this problem. Many of our bank members, in turn, were troubled by the huge revenue losses contained in last year's tax bill, and publicly and privately questioned whether such losses were consistent with our future economic stability. The third year of the across-the-board tax cut was particularly troublesome to many of our bankers who, on a day by day basis, see the havoc that the burgeoning deficit and resulting high interest rates are causing their customers and their communities.

We are highly sympathetic to Senate Finance Committee and Administration efforts to achieve better tax compliance to increase revenue. However, we feel that the proposals in the pending tax bill which would convert depository institutions into tax collectors for the government through the scheme of withholding of interest and dividends at source are a shotgun blast approach to the compliance problem when a rifle shot would do the trick. We also feel that the approach contained in H.R. 4961 could be counterproductive in terms of reducing incentives to save by reducing the saver and investor earnings otherwise attained through reinvestment and compounding. In turn, Treasury would be deprived of the substantial taxes payable on such earnings.

We are also convinced that the proposal will lead to an expensive, overwhelming paperwork morass of a frightening magnitude. It is almost as if the Government has thrown up its hands and is saying: we cannot match dividend and interest payment reports with the appropriate tax returns so let the private sector do it for us. Many of our small banks are, of course, far less equipped to undertake this task than is the Government.

We appreciate the fact that the President called us in on Monday, July 12 to discuss this matter. We appreciate his concerns and those of his Secretary of Treasury. We have offered to work with the White House and the Treasury looking toward better compliance without opening the Pandora's box of withholding at source which will affect hundreds of millions of interest payments that banks make to their depositors.

We also would like to commend Senator Bradley and Senator Long for exploring in Committee that withholding at source should be limited to dividend payments at this time. In our meeting with the President, the securities industry made it clear that they would be happy to accept withholding at source for dividends in exchange for a reduction of the long-term capital gains period from one year to six months. The cooperation of the securities industry should also be secured in cracking down on those who don't report capital gains to the Treasury. Secretary Regan has indicated that only 56% of all capital gains are reported to the Treasury. Treasury, in turn, estimates that taxpayers are reporting 85% of interest and dividend income subject to reporting.

We will be pleased to work with the Administration and the Congress looking towards enhancing the compliance system. But this problem can be addressed without putting in place an onerous and possibly counterproductive system of withholding at source for interest payments.

Sincerely,

ROBERT L. MCCORMICK, Jr.,
President.

INVESTMENT COMPANY INSTITUTE,
Washington, D.C., July 15, 1982.

DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of 12 million mutual fund shareholders, the Investment Company Institute opposes the interest and withholding provisions of the Senate Finance Committee Tax Bill. The Institute joins other organizations, representing a variety of financial institutions and their millions of shareholders and depositors, in requesting that you not support the revival of the discredited idea of forcing financial institutions to withhold 10 percent of the dividends and interest due American investors and savers. Repeated consideration over the years has shown this proposal to be inequitable, costly, and inefficient.

Like previous withholding schemes on interest and dividends, the current proposal is inequitable because it will involve overwithholding in many cases. Despite plans to issue so-called exemption certificates, many taxpayers, particularly elderly persons of relatively modest means, will end up having to reclaim from the government, as long as a year after the fact, monies which never should have been withheld in the first place. In addition to the substantial hardships created for persons dependent on dividends and interest to meet current living expenses, there will be a loss of earnings to those taxpayers who would have reinvested the dividends and interest withheld from them. In 1981, this factor alone would have cost 12 million mutual fund investors over $110 million in dividends.

Withholding on interest and dividends will be costly because it will impose an enormous administrative burden on all financial institutions. It has been estimated that implementation of the withholding provisions will require the issuance and processing of over 400 million exemption certificates. Withholding from some accounts but not others (as well as monitoring for switches in category) will involve the installation of a complicated and expensive system which will be only partly susceptible to automated processing by computer. It has been estimated that in the mutual fund industry the additional costs of administration will be between $1.50 and $2.00 per account annually, in addition to very substantial installation costs. This could add as much as $36 million on an annual basis to the expenses of operating mutual funds—costs which will inevitably be borne by mutual fund shareholders.

Finally, the withholding scheme is inefficient in view of the revenues produced, the lost earnings to shareholders and depositors on monies withheld from them, the administrative costs of collection and the processing of exemptions and claims for refunds. It simply is not a cost efficient way of raising revenue.

In the past several years, great strides have been made by the Internal Revenue Service in administering the existing system of matching the information that lists the recipients of interest and dividends with the tax returns filed by these persons. All segments of the financial services industry have always been willing to discuss improvements in the present system designed to make tax evasion even more difficult. For example, the Institute earlier this year testified in support of a bill to withhold interest and dividends from accounts which fail to supply the IRS with taxpayer ID numbers. The adoption of such a proposal would be much less costly and more efficient because it would focus precisely on the problem of tax evasion and provide a specific remedy for dealing with it. Unlike the withholding provisions of the Finance Committee Bill, it would not subject all American investors and depositors to a blunderbuss approach to snare a relative handful of tax delinquents.

In short, we view the proposal to withhold on dividends and interest as harmful to millions of American investors and savers, as a regressive step in the administration of the tax laws, and as one which will further complicate our already overly complex tax system. It represents a radical departure from efforts of the Congress and the Administration to reduce the burden of government on all Americans.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID SILVER.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, this third week in July brings the 24th observance of Captive Nations Week. Since 1959, when President Eisenhower signed Public Law 86-90 establishing Captive Nations Week, we have taken this occasion to focus attention upon the captive people of totalitarian nations, and to emphasize our commitment to those voices in Soviet-dominated nations, which their governments attempt to silence.

The voices of freedom are not easily silenced, however, as the Soviet Union repeatedly is reminded, most recently by the courageous Afghan rebels and Polish solidaritists who refuse to fall as silent victims to Soviet tyranny.

We must take this occasion to reaffirm our dedication to the spread and preservation of human rights and to the people who refuse to accept tyrannical rule. While we seek to increase prospects for world peace by way of trade and cultural exchange with the Soviet Union, we cannot ignore their millions of political captives. We must not forget those who have been forced to flee their homelands in search of freedom; we must not forget those like, Yuri Balovienkov, who is being denied the right to see his wife and child in the United States, because an oppressive government will not allow him to leave.

Our 24th observance of Captive Nations Week coincides with the assembly of the Polish Communist Party. Let us hope that in a country starving for freedom our display of affinity will provide sustenance.

American citizens have been blessed with the joys of personal freedom for over 200 years. However, for over 1 billion people on Earth freedom remains an elusive goal. For them freedom is but a dream, a distant vision. Our purpose remains to give it material substance so that more and more people will know the joys of freedom.●

THE ACADEMIANS

HON. JERRY M. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the House today and request the attention of my colleagues to honor a distinguished group of citizens from Orange County, Calif. Several retired educators, college presidents, and chancellors have formed an organization, the Academians, for the purpose of promoting the value of higher education.

The Academians has a membership of over 150 former educators, who, under the leadership of Dr. Martin M. Weitz, are committed to the pursuits of higher education. The Academians have contributed countless hours of their professional experience in efforts to demonstrate how higher education enriches life.

Each year, the Academians sponsor guest lectures and seminars on education which draw tremendous audiences. This year, their May 13 program featured guest speaker Dr. J. Robert Evans, dean of undergraduate studies for the National University of San Diego and Orange County. In his address to educators, Dr. Evans spoke about the rapid changes in the field of education since World War II and examined important adjustments in demography which will affect educational objectives in the future. He also emphasized that "dollars spent on education are not lost, but must be looked upon as an investment * * * one with a vitally important return in terms of our Nation's future."

Time and time again, in the House of Representatives, we have debated questions concerning our national role in education. In his speech, Dr. Evans reminded us of the importance of our mission here in promoting higher education and training which will reverse the trends of unemployment and foster productivity so necessary at this time.

Today, only 17 percent of our adult population is college educated. Today, we must devote our resources to higher education. Please join me in commending the Academians for their tireless spirit in improving the quality and accessibility of education to insure a more meaningful and prosperous tomorrow.●

THE FUTURE FEDERAL ROLE IN CHILD NUTRITION POLICY

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to join the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS) in introducing a House concurrent resolution relating to the national school lunch and child nutrition programs.

This resolution expresses the sense of the Congress that:

First, current national efforts to reduce malnutrition should continue;

Second, a uniform national guarantee of nutrition assistance should continue through Federal leadership and the maintenance of support for Federal nutrition programs; and Third, the responsibility of Federal child nutrition programs should not be turned back to the States.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot lend my support to the concept of turning back to the States all responsibility for achieving child nutrition goals. This approach fails to acknowlege either an adequate future Federal commitment to or an appropriate Federal role in achieving these child nutrition objectives. Clearly, it does not address the nutrition needs of youngsters from low-income families.

Few will quarrel with the statement that a child's basic nutrition needs do not vary from State to State. The administration's plan, however, does not recognize the fact that a child residing in a State with a low tax base is less likely to receive a nutritionally adequate diet than is the child whose family resides in a State with an adequate or more favorable tax base.

In short, we have a continuing obligation to insure that the nutrition needs of our truly needy youngsters—wherever they may reside—are adequately met. This is and must remain a national priority and goal. Similarly, to the end that basic nutrition needs are satisfied, I firmly believe that we have an on-going obligation to insure that child feeding programs receiving Federal assistance maintain the objective of providing certain recommended dietary allowances (RDA) of nutrients for children, as established by the National Academy of Sciences.

On the other hand, I do not believe that we can or will continue to "do business as usual" in the area of child feeding. We can and must continue to scrutinize all phases of our child nutrition programs as well as the interrelationships among these activities. Limited resources should not be wasted by duplicating benefits. Fraud, abuse, and mismangement cannot be tolerated. Overly complex and often contradictory federally imposed regulatory requirements must be eliminated. A continuing Federal role or presence does not preclude affording the States and local program administrators with a greater degree of flexibility in designing and effectively implementing child nutrition programs tailored to better meet their special needs.

From my perspective, in the months ahead, our challenge will be one of working to establish a balanced partnership among the Federal, State, and local levels in achieving longstanding child nutrition goals that are universally agreed upon.

The resolution that I am joining my colleagues in the House in introducing today, should signal to the administration that many of us in the Congress deeply believe that we have a permanent national commitment to meeting the nutrition, educational, and health needs of our Nation's children. This is a commitment that we will not abandon.●

PATRIOTIC AMERICAN FEELS HIS SERVICE TO HIS COUNTRY HAS BEEN FORGOTTEN

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, since the election of 1980, this Government has adopted a series of policies aimed at controlling spending. Only last summer this Congress voted to save money by restricting the eligibility for unemployment benefits among American service men who choose not to reenlist. This is shortsightedness of the worst kind. Further—this policy has the tawdy overtones of shanghaiing citizens—at least coercing reenlistment rather than encouraging it. We are not saving anything at all; we are losing something more precious than dollars, the pride and dedication of a patriot.

We simply cannot ignore the very real, and very painful consequences of these policies upon our own citizens, citizens in this case who have chosen to serve their country. If allowed to continue, these kinds of injustices, brought about by the budget slashing madness of this administration, will result in a loss of faith in our great country by our most patriotic Americans.

I would like to submit for the record, Mr. Speaker, the following letter: a classic example of a strong, patriotic American who feels his service to his country has been forgotten and that he has been abused by his own Government.

I am married and have one child. At the present time I am unemployed and have been actively seeking work since being discharged from the U.S. Navy on March 31, 1982.

I served in the U.S. Navy for six years, and attained the rank of E-5. My major reason for leaving the navy was the long family separation. I received an honorable discharge.

My problem is this, I am having a difficult time finding employment with the economy in such bad shape. Therefore I have filed for unemployment benefits.

Due to a law passed last summer by our Congress and President, I cannot receive any benefits. Because I have a good re-enlistment code and could have signed a new contract, if I had wanted to, I am being penalized!!

Sir, I feel that it is pretty disgusting when a man serves his country for six years, three of which were sea duty, and then chooses not to sign a new contract, his government abandons him when he needs some help. I even forced the Navy to change some incorrect information on my discharge physical so that if our country were in trouble and needed men right away, I could re-enlist.

I have been to many countries and there is none greater than the United States and I'll be the first one in line to defend her. But my pride is slipping away as I watch her turn her back on the men and women who serve her.

I gave six years of my life to serve in the military and I felt that was enough for now. Sure, I can go back in and be accepted with open arms, but I would feel like I was being forced into it. I honestly feel that this was part of the reason that the law was passed. I've seen several people who have gone back into the service because they were not able to financially hold out until a civilian job came up. I think this a rotten way to keep people in the military!! I won't be pressured!!

Sir, as you can guess, I am rather angry with the system. If I don't find work soon I'll be forced to apply for food stamps and welfare. Never before have I had to ask for assistance from any government agency, but before I'm pressured into something, I'll soak the system for all I can get. It truly hurts me to feel this way.

Mr. Speaker, it hurts me also to have to report to my colleagues the disillusionment of a patriot, the disenchantment of a citizen. We must not continue to pursue these unjust policies.●

COMMEMORATION OF CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to add my voice in tribute to the people of the Captive Nations. These 1 billion people under totalitarian domination remind those of us who live in the free world that the price of liberty is great, and that the blessings of a free and independent life cannot be taken for granted.

The principle of self-determination of nations is one that has consistently been supported by the United States in its foreign policy. It is more important than ever that our foreign policy continue to reflect that principle, because throughout the years in which the Soviet forces in particular have imposed their will on subjugated countries, the love of the captive people for liberty has not dimmed. They deserve our support, and the support of all freedom-loving peoples.

May the day dawn soon when freedom will have buried its own undertakers!●

FAILURE OF YOUNG MEN TO REGISTER FOR THE DRAFT

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill that addresses a serious and growing problem in our criminal justice system—the failure of young men to register for the draft. According to recent estimates from the General Accounting Office, over a half million young men have failed to register for the draft. This alarming level of noncompliance has significant consequences for our entire Federal law enforcement.

Regardless of how one feels about draft registration, it is obvious that the Department of Justice cannot prosecute and our Federal prisons cannot hold all those persons who have failed to register for the draft. Equally obvious is the fact that the current penalty for nonregistration is totally proportionate with the severity of the offense. Under current law, the penalty for nonregistration is 5 years and a $10,000 fine.

The basic purpose of the bill I am offering to this body is to modernize the draft registration statute and to reduce to a rational level the penalties for nonregistration. The basic format and policy results found in this bill are largely taken from the proposed criminal code as approved by the House Judiciary Committee last Congress. See 96th Congress, H.R. 6915, proposed sections 1314 and 1315, House Report 96-1396 at 100 and 101. A copy of the pertinent portion of the committee report is appended as attachment A. I hope that my colleagues will see the wisdom of redefining this offense and in setting realistic penalties.

I wish also to take this opportunity to inform the House of my intention to pursue the topic of draft registration in a hearing before my Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice on July 28, 1982, at 10 a.m. in room 2226 RHOB.

APPENDIX A

SECTION 1314—AVOIDING MILITARY OR ALTERNATIVE SERVICE

This section carries forward part of 50 U.S.C. App. 462, which proscribes certain conduct that violates the selective service laws, including failure to register, report for, and submit to, induction; failure to report for a physical examination; and failure to report a change of address or to carry one's selective service card. Current law, however, is awkwardly drafted and fails to distinguish between conduct violating less significant regulations and conduct that seriously jeopardizes the integrity of the selective service system.

Subsection (a) makes it an offense for someone who has a duty to register or report for military service, be inducted into military service, or perform alternative service, to fail to perform such duty with the intent to avoid military or alternative service. The requirement that the actor engage in conduct with a specific intent carries forward current law. United States v. Jacques, 463 F.2d 653 (1st Cir. 1972); United States v. Boardman, 419 F.2d 110 (1st Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 991 (1970), Silverman v. United States, 220 F.2d 36 (8th Cir. 1955).

Subsection (b) makes the offense a class D felony during war or a national defense emergency (a term defined in section 1320 (relating to definitions for subchapter) of the proposed code) and a class E felony if the offense is under pargraph (2), (3) or (4) of subsection (a) at any other time. Subsection (b)(2) also provides that an offense under paragraph (a)(1) is a class E felony if the conduct constituting the offense occurs during a time when persons are being inducted into the military. Subsection (b)(3) provides that an offense which occurs under circumstances other than those listed in subsection (b)(1) or (2) is a class C misdemeanor. Thus, the effect of subsection (b)(3) is to grade as a class C misdemeanor the failure to register for military service when there is no lawful authority to induct persons into the military service. This grading reflects the view that nonregistration, when induction is not authorized, is of a less serious nature than the other offenses defined by this section. The present law penalty is the equivalent of a class D felony.

The Committee decided to classify the offense on the basis of whether or not the United States was at war, viewing a wartime violation of this section as presenting a greater risk to national security. The use of the terms "war" and "national defense emergency" means that the section will reach Congressionally declared wars and situations involving substantial armed conflict prior to a Congressional declaration of war (but in combination with the provisions of the National Emergencies Act, such coverage would last no more than six months).

Subsection (c) provides a defense for persons who have registered for military service and who have been found qualified for alternative service, but who refuse to perform such service because of bona fide religious belief. This defense is applicable only where the prosecution is for a failure or refusal to report for or perform alternative service. By specifically setting forth this defense, the Committee does not mean to affect any judicially created defenses to prosecutions for failing or refusing to register for military service, to report for or submit to an examination to determine fitness for military or alternative service, or to report for and submit to induction. See section 721 (relating to nature and effect of defense) of the proposed code. The Supreme Court has held that first amendment guarantees provide a defense if the requisite circumstances exist. Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437 (1971); Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333 (1970); United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965).

Subsection (d) provides for extraterritorial jurisdiction where the actor is a United States national (as that term is defind in 8 U.S.C. 1101). This provision is based upon the nationality principle of international law. There is also Federal jurisdiction over the offense if it is committed within the general or special jurisdiction of the United States. See section 111(b) (relating to Federal jurisdiction) of the proposed code.

Section 1315—Fraud with respect to military or alternative service

Subsection (a) makes it an offense for someone to use fraud with intent to: (1) avoid or delay the performance of alternative service; or (2) impair a proper determination of the existence or nature of a person's military or alternative service obligation. This carries forward those provisions of 50 U.S.C. App. 462 which proscribe the use of false statements or other deceptive practices to "knowingly hinder or interfere with" military or alternative service. This section also carries forward part of 18 U.S.C. 2388, which requires that the defendant's act "willfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service". The Committee narrows the scope of these two current law provisions by eliminating conduct that may be protected by the first amendment (e.g., "counsels" in 50 U.S.C. 462(a)). The Committee concluded that these changes obviated the need to require a specific intent to hinder, interfere with, or obstruct the military service. The term "fraud" is defined in section 101 (relating to general definitions) of the proposed code.

Subsection (b) grades the offense as a class D felony if the offense is committed during a time of war or national defense emergency and a class E felony in any other case. See discussion of section 1314 (relating to avoiding military or alternative service) supra.

Subsection (c) sets forth a defense if the fraud concerned a fact that was not material. This materiality requirement is derived from current law. United States v. Kamber, 458 F.2d 918 (7th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 407 U.S. 910 (1972).

Subsection (d) provides for extraterritorial Federal jurisdiction where the actor is a United States national (as defined in 8 U.S.C. 1101). This provision is based upon the nationality principle of international law. Pursuant to section 111(b) (relating to Federal jurisdiction) of the proposed code, there is Federal jurisdiction over an offense under this section if the offense is committed within the general or special jurisdiction of the United States.●

CAPITAL OWNERSHIP DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the chairman of the House Committee on Small Business, introduced for him and myself H.R. 6823, a bill to amend the capital ownership development program of the Small Business Administration.

It is the product of years of frustration on the part of Members of Congress and disadvantaged businesses—frustration with failure of the Small Business Administration to do its duty to implement properly Public Law 95-507.

As past chairman of the Small Business Oversight Subcommittee and as original sponsor of Public Law 95-507, I am disappointed with SBA's disregard of Congress intent. The stated purpose of that law, among others, was to "foster business ownership by business owners who are both socially and economically disadvantaged" and "to promote the competitive viability of such firms * * *." It is now clear that the Small Business Administration has no intention of recognizing this purpose, and would rather destroy administratively this program. Without legislative action, there will be a disastrous loss of thousands of jobs, loss of tax revenue and increasing pressure on social programs. Legislation is sorely needed to insure that SBA management pursues a course of business development, rather than paying lipservice to the needs of small disadvantaged firms. The bill does two things: One, it specifies criteria that must be used to determine a firm's competitive viability; and two, it prevents SBA from counting gross receipts or employment attributable to the performance of 8(a) contracts when computing the size of the firm.

Because SBA has failed to develop the necessary economic criteria for determining viability, SBA has allowed the program to be subject to criticism for failing to recognize when a firm should be graduated or terminated. In addition, SBA has failed to issue regulations which would stop the unfair practice of counting gross receipts and employment associated with 8(a) contracts for purposes of determining whether a firm is "small." A firm should not be terminated from the 8(a) program for being "large" if, when computing the gross receipts or employment attributable to contracts outside the 8(a) program, the firm is still below the regulatory thresholds.

I would urge all Members to support this legislation, to prevent the failure of hundreds of businesses which are close to economic viability.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the strong support that still flourishes in our country for the spirit of Captive Nations Week is evidenced by many of the diverse local observances that are held to mark this anniversary. I should like to bring the attention of the Members to the following expressions of support for Captive Nations Week—resolutions issued by the South Florida Captive Nations Committee; a proclamation by Hon. Edward J. King, Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and a proclamation by Hon. Marion Barry, Jr., Mayor of the District of Columbia:

SOUTH FLORIDA
CAPTIVE NATIONS COMMITTEE,
Miami, Fla., July 8, 1982.

Invitation: To the Annual Observance of Captive Nations Day to be held by the South Florida Captive Nations Committee on Saturday July 24, 1982 from 12 Noon until 2:30 P.M.

Where: The Observance will begin at 12 Noon on the steps of the Dade County Court House, West Flagler and N.W. 1st. Avenue. We would like at least eight from each different nationality representatives in native costume to be present here. After a short program we shall proceed with a motorcade along West Flagler Street to N.W. 22nd Avenue, there turning right and proceeding to the Polish American Club. In the motorcade not more than two cars can take part from each nationality.

We cordially invite members of organizations who are in sympathy with those who live in captivity and who can imagine the suffering of people living under the brutal oppression of dictators to join us during this Annual Observance. The program will be held in the Polish American Club at 1250 N.W. 22nd Avenue. All freedom loving people are welcome.

We are pleased to advise our fellow members and friends of our Committee that the political leaders of our City, County, State and Country have been invited to this Observance. The Mayor's and Governor's Office promised to proclaim July 24, 1982 as Captive Nations Day. This year we will remember thirty Captive Nations living behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains.

We respectfully ask the clergy of our State of Florida to remember the Captive Nations in their pastoral prayers on July 25, 1982. We also urge the news media, the newspapers, radio and television newscasters to remember the plight of the Captive Nations during this Observance.

Our prayer is for all Captive Nations to find the road to Peace, Freedom, Democracy and Independence.

In the name of the Committee:

Rev. John Paul Nagy,
General Chairman.
ANDREJ GROMADSKI,
Co-Chairman.

PROCLAMATION—COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

Whereas the week of July 18-24, 1982, is observed nationally as "Captive Nations Week" dedicated to nations under Communist domination; and

Whereas the imperialistic policies of Russian Communists have led to the enslavement of the peoples of Ukraine, Armenia, Poland, Byelorussia, Cossackia, Georgia, Idel-Ural, North Caucasia, Turkestan, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Azerbaijan, Albania, Romania, Czecho-Slovakia, Bulgaria, North Korea, Hungary, East Germany, Tibet, North Vietnam, Cuba, Cambodia, South Vietnam, Laos, and Afghanistan; and

Whereas the establishment of national and independent States by all captive nations and the decolonization of the Soviet Union Empire would contribute significantly to a just and lasting peace in the world and the freedom of all nations; and

Whereas the 1982 "Captive Nations Week" serves as an appropriate forum to manifest public support for freedom and independence of all captive peoples everywhere;

Now, therefore, I, Edward J. King, Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, do hereby proclaim the week of July 18-24, 1982, as "Captive Nations Week" and urge all citizens of the Commonwealth to take cognizance of this event and to participate fittingly in its observance.

PROCLAMATION—DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Whereas the imperialistic politics of several leading countries have led to the subjugation and enslavement of many peoples; and

Whereas the desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in these conquered nations constitues a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of the leaders of these countries to initiate a major war; and

Whereas the freedom loving people of the captive nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom and human rights and to the people of the United States as the leaders in bringing about their freedom and independence; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week in July each year as "Captive Nations Week" and inviting the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate prayer, ceremonies and activities; expressing their sympathy with the support for the just aspirations of the captive nations:

Now, therefore, I, the Mayor of the District of Columbia, do hereby proclaim the week of July 18-24, 1982, as "Captive Nations Week" in Washington, D.C., and call upon all of our residents to join with me in observing this week by offering prayers and dedicating our efforts for the peaceful liberation of oppressed and subjugated peoples all over the world.●

● Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, today we recognize Ida Nudel's continued struggle for freedom from Soviet oppression. Her 11-year plight clearly demonstrates the Soviet Union's continued denial of the most basic rights and liberties to its citizens.

Ida Nudel's crime was expressing her desire to emigrate to Israel by hanging a poster from her balcony. For this she suffered 4 years of humiliation, harassment, and hatred in a Siberian exile camp.

Although she has recently been released from exile, Ida Nudel is now trapped in a bureaucratic vice. Because the Soviet Government refuses to issue her a residence permit, Ida Nudel cannot obtain an exit visa to Israel nor can she receive needed medical assistance for her failing health.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot let the world forget the plight of Ida Nudel and other Soviet Jews. We must continue to do everything in our power to end the Soviet mistreatment of its Jewish population. I strongly urge the Soviet Government to end its harassment of Ida Nudel immediately and to allow her to emigrate to Israel. We must make the Soviet Union realize that freedom is not just characteristic of American society, but an inherent human right.●

SOCIAL SECURITY PROBLEMS

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, as the Congress awaits the recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform with regard to finding the answers to solve social security's problems, a constituent of mine, Attorney William E. Payton, of Greenville, Ky., has written a thoughtful letter, expressing his recommendations as to changes and adjustments that could benefit the social security system. I believe Mr. Payton's letter is one which should be shared with my colleagues and I wish to do so at this time. The letter follows:

MAY 27, 1982.

Re Social Security.
Hon. CARROLL HUBBARD, Jr.,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

SIR: I wish to give you my thoughts as to how perhaps the Social Security program may be benefited by appropriate changes and adjustments.

First, these ideas are not original and I would strongly recommend that you pass this information on to the committee or those members in Congress studying how to best tinker with the system; most of these comments are gleaned from the September, 1981, issue of Consumer Reports.

1. From the inception, the payroll tax and right to receive benefits at retirement was supposed to be isolated from politics and changing ideas of each new administration and the Social Security system should retain this principle.

2. We are simply in a short term problem in that prices rose faster than wages thereby creating a temporary problem in that less Social Security monies were collected than paid out under the consumer price index adjustments; if prices and wages return to their normal pattern, this short term problem will be alleviated.

3. In the not too distant future, the "depression era" babies will be retiring and this should ease the problem somewhat.

4. With respect to the long term problem, that is the baby boom or World War II babies retiring thereafter, and the low birth rate now, in all fairness government employees and any other employees not covered by the Social Security system should be brought into the system and this should be done immediately to increase the base for payments into the system.

5. Life expectancy has increased since Social Security was created in the 1930's and in all fairness, the retirement age should gradually be increased up from 65.

6. If necessary, general tax revenue funds should be used on a temporary basis to cover shortfalls in the system accounts.

I do not believe the solutions proposed above are radical or too difficult to implement; something should be done immediately rather than simply waiting until after the general election in November and continuing the rhetoric about saving Social Security.

I simply think that all of you should take the initiative and do something rather than simply put the problem off.

I do not ask for you to reply but I simply would ask that you pass this on to the appropriate members working on this problem.

Yours very truly,

WILLIAM E. PAYTON.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 21, 1982

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, once a year, we dedicate a week to bringing world attention to captive nations—nations dominated by the true imperialist power of the modern world, the Soviet Union. Since World War II, the U.S.S.R. has come to dominate 31 nations. The citizens of these nations live without the basic liberties which civilized people have a right to expect—freedom of speech, press, religion, assembly, and culture.

Under the iron reign of the Soviet Union, there is no room for individuals of diversity, originality, or expression. Instead, those who manifest these traits are punished, exiled, imprisoned, and sometimes killed. We have only to look to the Baltic States—where priests are murdered, dissidents imprisoned, and native cultures suppressed—to understand the brutality of Soviet rule. We need search no farther than Poland to find an example of the denial of the will of an entire people by a heartless, Soviet-dominated regime. And we need only listen to the cries of the natives of Afghanistan to understand that, without our steadfast vigilance, many more countries will be added to the ranks of captive nations, new victims of Soviet aggression.

So let us remember the plight of captive people today, of individuals denied the basic dignity which only freedom can afford. And let us work and pray for the day when the people of the world can share one invaluable gift—their liberty.●

THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION PERSONNEL REFORM ACT OF 1982

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the chairman of the House Committee on Small Business introduced for him and myself H.R. 6824, entitled "The Small Business Administration Personnel Reform Act of 1982."

Through numerous hearings it is apparent that SBA continues to suffer from personnel management abuses and ineptitude. In light of the severely limited resources available to SBA, legislation is needed to insure that those resources are expended without regard to politics. As it is now, too many slots in SBA are political appointments, and SBA has illegally placed them beyond scrutiny since there are no performance standards for schedule C employees. Also, noncareer senior executive service employees are not part of the merit appraisal system.

There are other defects in SBA's personnel structure which discourages adequate program delivery to small businesses. More than one-third of SBA's total work force is outside of the district offices, even though this is where the actual direct service to small firms is provided. SBA simply is too top heavy.

To correct these and other problems, this bill:

First, reduces from 50 to 7 the number of political appointees, effective June 1, 1984;

Second, requires that at least 70 percent of the SBA work force be assigned to district offices by the beginning of fiscal year 1986, and at least 80 percent by fiscal year 1987;

Third, provides for specific due process protections for managers that are reassigned;

Fourth, makes it illegal for an employee to exercise his duties on the basis of political motivations;

Fifth, allows the merit systems protection board to intercede upon a finding that there is a "pattern or practice" of illegal personnel activity;

Sixth, specifies certain requirements for employee rotations, reassignments, or disciplinary actions based on the violation of specified personnel laws and regulations; and

Seventh, requires that the Inspector General investigate and report to Congress violations of specified personnel laws or regulations.

I would urge all members to cosponsor this legislation to insure that SBA is able to provide the kind of service that the small business community deserves.●

SUGAR

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, during the past several months many Members have expressed concern about the role of sugar in the domestic and international economy. I thought that perhaps some light could be shed by someone who actually grows sugarcane and knows quite a great deal about the subject. Mr. John Tiedtke grows sugarcane in Palm Beach County, Fla., and I would like to insert his correspondence for the RECORD.

THE DOMESTIC SUGAR INDUSTRY

The question of whether the United States Government should give some protection to the domestic sugar industry during periods of distressed world prices is really a question of whether the United States should maintain this industry or permit it to go out of business.

It is surprising that much of the media has singled out the legislation protecting the domestic sugar industry for criticism instead of the other farm crops, when this industry is the one which can be protected without the problems which arise in the operation of the other parts of the farm bill. The advantages of the sugar program are:

1. The industry can be maintained at no cost to the Federal Government.

2. Sugar is extremely cheap in comparison with other foods, particularly in relation to its value.

3. Unlike the rest of the crops in the farm program, sugar is produced in Florida. It makes a major contribution to the economy and the employment of the state.

4. The world price of sugar is subject to much violent fluctuations than that of other crops, making it impossible for farmers to depend on it for their sales, or the consumers to depend on it for their source of supply.

I would like to explain those statements.

Since 1938 the United States Congress has encouraged farmers to invest in the sugar industry with the legislation that protects them against periodic gluts on the world market. As a result, the American sugar industry has invested billions of dollars in good faith to supply this need.

Florida has 300,000 acres of land producing over 1,000,000 tons of sugar annually worth, at 20¢ per pound, $400,000,000.00. This is an important contribution to our economy and employs thousands of workers. Furthermore, for the nation, it reduces imports and therefore reduces our unfavorable balance of trade. In normal times the domestic sugar industry reduces the trade deficit by approximately two billion dollars.

The continuation of the sugar program by the United States Government is a matter of life and death for the industry, because unlike most crops, there will periodically be such a surplus of world sugar that it will knock the world price substantially below any country's cost of growing it. Eighty-five percent of the world production is sold in a way that gives the growers a fair price. The remaining fifteen percent which has no home is dumped on the world market at whatever price it will bring, which has varied in the last ten years from under nine cents to sixty-five cents per pound. This is because the world market is such a small part of the world production that a small variation in the world supply will cause a great percentage change in the amount of surplus, and therefore, cause a drastic effect on the price.

There have been statements given to the press that the sugar program is costing the consumer a certain amount of money. No one can make such a statement without knowing what the price of sugar will be in the future. If the writer of the article could predict the future price of sugar or any other commodity or the stock market he would have the financial world at his feet. Judging from the past it is very unlikely that the price of world sugar will remain below the cost of production very long. The most reasonable prediction today is that growers throughout the world will reduce their acreage and cause another world shortage. If this happens and we have no domestic source of supply it is pure fantasy to think that we could acquire eleven milion tons from the world market every year with any degree of assurance of either the price or the supply. Do prudent businessmen place their reliance in obtaining a necessary raw material on suppliers who are temporarily selling their product at a price which is below their cost or production?

The "developed" countries know this and protect their sugar industries by maintaining a floor price, which in most cases is higher than ours. This is because sugar is so cheap in relations to its value that these countries consider it foolhardy to risk losing their supply in order to save a few cents a pound during periods of distressed prices.

Unlike the programs for the other crops in the farm bill, which have cost the United States government billions of dollars, the sugar program should cost the U.S. Government nothing. It just requires the consumers to pay the cost of production during periods of world surplus. Is there any good reason why consumers should be entitled to buy it below cost? Furthermore, in the long run, the program will not cost the consumers anything, because what they might gain one year from temporary, very low world prices, is not as important as the loss of their supply and very high prices during periods of world shortage.

It is no our purpose to critize the protection of the other crops in the farm bill. Agriculture is quite unlike industrial production, in that a factory can be shut down when the product is in surplus. However, by the time a farmer sees this situation developing he has already planted his crop and has no choice but to continue to spend money on it. With most basic crops, unless production is limited, the only protection available is a government loan or purchase program. Perhaps it is not a bad idea to limit the production of all crops that want protection in the farm bill.

If the writers of these articles attacking the sugar program were really interested in lowering the cost of food, they would turn their attention to the items which cost several dollars a pound and are a significant part of the family grocery bills, rather than this item which costs only a few cents, yet is invaluable in transforming foods, which would otherwise be dull and tasteless, into attractive dishes. Think of all the baked goods and soft drinks and the cup of coffee which require only a touch of sugar to become palatable. The cost of the sugar in these items is negligible. Most people would pay ten times the normal price of sugar if they had to, to get it.

The current propaganda claims that the foreign countries which sell us sugar will be injured if we institute quotas. For forty years the Sugar Act controlled the supply of sugar in this country with quotas. This cost the United States Government nothing and required no government purchases. It was a great benefit to the countries which sold us sugar because it enabled them to receive our domestic price instead of the world price. The only trouble today is that our government waited so long to act that there are temporary dislocations.

It is important to note that the exporting countries sell us no less sugar under quotas than they do under a tariff system. Either system must restrict imports to the point where our domestic price reaches the desired level. It takes exactly the same number of tons to do this under the tariff system as it does under quotas. The only difference is that with quotas the exporting countries would receive our price instead of the world price. Why would this hurt them?

It is the refiners who really object to quotas and are back of this unfavorable publicity because quotas make it more difficult for them to play the American farmer against world competition. I will not go into this any further at this time as it is off the subject. But a study of who is behind this propaganda would bring out interesting information.

The newspapers recently reported the case of a refiner on the eastern seaboard who could not unload a boatload of sugar, and who predicted that he would be unable to continue operating because of his inability to buy raws. That particular ship was from a non-quota country that anyone in the sugar business should have known for weeks would not be allowed to unload if we imposed quotas. The refiner was gambling that he could unload the sugar before quotas were put into effect.

Furthermore, Florida has shipped sugar to this refiner before and he admitted that he knew he could buy all the raws he wanted from us now.

AGRICULTURAL PROBLEMS AND CHALLENGES

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 23, 1982

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, for those of us who are unabashed supporters of increased U.S. exports, reports of growing agricultural trade surpluses are welcome indeed. We are all well aware that the dollars we earn from agricultural exports help to offset our energy imports and thus contribute substantially to maintaining a healthy balance of payments. As foreign markets have expanded, American farmers have continued to meet the demand by coaxing greater yields from existing acreage and by bringing additional land into production. Unfortunately, both of these practices have increased the strain on our soil and water resources, with potentially disastrous long-term effects for our agricultural productivity.

The 36th Congressional District of New York, which I represent, has an active farming sector with nearly 2,500 farms covering over 300,000 acres. Although we are blessed with a relatively gentle topography, soil erosion continues to be a problem on over 23,000 of those acres, while the productivity in other areas is reduced by poor drainage. These and other conservation problems have been vigorously addressed by local soil and water conservation districts, which have worked closely with Soil Conservation Service professionals to provide technical assistance and encourage farm owners to develop conservation plans. In practice, this program has proven to be enormously successful, with leadership and initiative coming from participating farmers themselves and thus reflecting local needs.

In the 36th District, 1981 was a good year for agricultural conservation. Approximately 70 conservation plans were developed to protect nearly 10,000 acres and conservation measures put into effect included contouring, conservation tillage, and water management practices. More recently, construction commenced on a major watershed improvement project which, completed, will increase the productivity of over 6,500 acres of Oak Orchard muck. Local conservation leaders have expressed dismay that this progress is threatened by deep budget cuts in conservation programs and by new administration priorities. Specifically, they have urged that soil conservation programs targeted to the most critical erosion problems consider not just the rate of topsoil loss but also the depth of the underlying topsoil base. Loss of an inch of topsoil is far more harmful when the underlying topsoil layer is thinner. When examined in this context, many of our local erosion problems are just as critical as topsoil losses in midwestern areas which, while they may have greater loss in absolute terms, begin with a much deeper topsoil base.

The challenge to reexamine our Nation's long-term soil conservation policies is especially ironic now, when low farm prices are forcing many farmers to cut back on conservation practices in order to survive short-term economic stresses. The current oversupply of agricultural commodities should make this an ideal time to retrench and reduce the pressure on soil resources, but prices and interest rates will not permit farmers to limit their production. Instead, they must cut new corners and extract even more from their land. As the following article reprinted from the Wilson Quarterly makes perfectly clear, we all have a big stake in resolving this contradiction. We cannot go on forever exploiting the wealth of our natural resource base without taking steps to better protect it. It is in our-long term interest to help and encourage farmers to address conservation problems before our farmland resources are permanently depleted.

The article follows:

FARMING THE LIMITS: LAND, WATER, AND ENERGY

(By Tom Fulton and Peter Braestrup)

The biggest single new fact about America's agriculture is that U.S. farm exports are expected to reach a record 170 million tons this year, despite the fact that the world is mired in an economic slowdown.

"At the rate exports are increasing," notes Lauren Soth, columnist and former editor of the Des Moines Register and Tribune, "the danger of overexploitation of the land . . . is becoming imminent. Yet exports have been the lifeblood of American agriculture and are vital to farm prosperity."

Therein lies the dilemma.

The old surpluses are gone. One-third of the nation's 400 million acres pf prime cropland is devoted to export production. We now export 60 percent of our wheat, more than half of our soybeans, and nearly one-third of our corn. The U.S. Secretary of Agriculture, John Block, himself an Illinois corn and soybean farmer, observes, "Expansion is a key to a market-oriented agricultural policy."

For the Reagan administration, as for its predecessors, there is another reason to push farm exports: their dollar value, some $41 billion in 1980, constituted a major offset to the $80 billion the United States paid for imported oil. The net U.S. farm-trade surplus in 1980 was $24 billion; the United States spent $17 billion for imported coffee, rubber, cocoa, bananas, tea, spices, and other farm products.

Such pressures have begun to stir debate among academic specialists and within farm groups and the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) bureaucracy. To most Americans, the discussion may seem remote; it rarely gets into the mass media. Food is something that comes ready-packaged at the supermarket and seems to cost more every time one reaches the checkout counter.

But new farm issues, aside from the perennial congressional debates over subsidies to some types of farming, are emerging. Some minor matters get a lot of media attention, such as scattered foreign ownership of U.S. farmland, the loss of farms to suburban sprawl, and the importance of "corporate agribusiness" in California vegetable production and Delaware broiler output. But the major new national issues revolve mostly around the future use and sufficiency of land, water, and energy—and, to varying degrees, their seriousness stems from the pressure to produce more food for export.

BETWEEN MANKIND AND OBLIVION—TOPSOIL

Let us begin with the land itself.

During the long years of crop surpluses and federally subsidized retirement of up to 60 million acres of cropland, the erosion of topsoil was ignored. More USDA "conservation" subsidies went to farmers for liming and other production-enhancing techniques than for expensive terracing, contour farming, and the like. The new postwar technology permitted farmers to use cheap chemical fertilizer, not manure, to omit soil-building clover and grass from crop rotations, and to keep planting corn and soybean row crops year after year. The sudden surge of export demand in the 1970s merely reinforced the trend.

The results were dramatic.

After 40 years of federal effort and $30 billion in outlays to promote conservation, the USDA estimated in 1977 that soil erosion was a major problem on more than 20 percent of the nation's cropland. Annual erosion rates exceeded 10 tons of topsoil per acre (twice the tolerable level) on 32 percent of the land in crops such as soybeans in the Southeast and on 19 percent of the acreage in crops such as corn and wheat in the Midwest. An annual soil loss of 10 tons per acre equals the loss of one inch of topsoil every 15 years.

In Iowa, the thickness of the rick black topsoil, which the first settlers plowed during the mid-1800s, has diminished in some places from two feet to one. If such depletion continues unabated, according to the federal government's estimates, the Midwest's yields of corn will probably decline as much as 30 percent by the year 2030.

Why are so many U.S. farmers "mining" the soil? The farmer, it is important to remember, is in business to grow and sell a crop at the least possible short-term cost. Given the pressures of inflation and high land prices, as well as keen competition for the land, he has no incentive to do otherwise. It is easier, faster, and cheaper on the rolling land in Iowa, for example, to practice straight-row cultivation of corn and soybeans than to follow the contours of the hillsides, even though the resultant erosion is five times greater. Plowing fields in the fall eases the farmer's workload during the busy spring planting season, although it increases erosion by 10 percent.

Government price supports and the demand for U.S. corn and soybeans overseas now give the farmer every incentive to plant row crops on marginal (hilly) land, to rent more of such land, and to maximize short-term benefits. In effect, the farmer has relied on fertilizer to compensate for the loss of topsoil; fertilizer use doubled between 1960 and 1975, and yield per acre has increased as well.

Cutting back overall production of corn, soybeans, and wheat and cultivating less intensively would raise farm prices because less food would be produced. A major attempt to curb soil erosion, and thus avert long-term penalties to society as a whole, implies either cost to the farmer or some added cost to the taxpayer or consumer. One proposed "massive" plan of conservation measures to "minimize the national sediment load" would eliminate 90 percent of cropland erosion but would cost $13.4 billion.

Other proposals are far more modest, but almost no plan suggested thus far fails to inflect pain on someone One new approach that is gaining favor among farmers is "no-till" or "minimum tillage" cultivation, in which the ground is left unplowed and largely undistrubed, the weeds and grass are killed off by herbicides, and the next crop is seeded into the trashy residue of the previous one. This technique reduces erosion by as much as 80 percent on hilly land. It requires fewer tractor trips (hence less tractor fuel), helps retain ground moisture, and takes less of the farmer's time. But the expanded use of herbicides alarms environmentalists. The effective use of these chemcial weedkillers requires sophistication and care; the threat of herbicidal runoff into water supplies frightens many local citizens.

Other conservation techniques, such as instituting crop rotation (corn, then oats, then clover, then corn again), interseeding alfalfa with corn, and stip-cropping (sod and corn), are all well known, but mandating their use would impose a short-term financial burden on the farmer, especially the small farmer. In effect, he must interrupt or curtail production of more lucrative crops like corn. Proposals have been made by some USDA administrators to link other benefits that farmers receive from the government, such as crop allotments or low-cost loans, to their compliance with accepted conservation measures. This stern approach, known as cross-compliance, has not geen greeted with cheers by Congress or by export-minded farmers.

THE WATER TABLE IS VANISHING

From the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas to the West Coast, it is water—not land—that is the big issue. In the most arid regions, agricultural development has meant irrigation—in the beginning through private efforts, and then through the 1902 Reclamation Act, which brought federal and state subsidies for cheap water projects to make the desert bloom.

All told, irrigated acreage has doubled to 56 million acres since 1950. It now accounts for more than one-fourth of the nation's crops and nearly one-seventh of the nation's total prime cropland. In the East, irrigation is used to permit double-cropping—rice and soybeans, for example, in the Mississippi Delta. But its big impact has been in the West, where the thirst for water is enormous. Arizona's citrus farmers and California's celery and lettuce growers simply could not exist without subsidized irrigation.

The federal government currently spends some $5 billion a year on the managing and planning of water projects, mostly under the auspices of the U.S. Department of the Interior. Without federal subsidies, little irrigation would take place. Indeed, water projects have been pushed well beyond what pure economic feasibility would permit. The water subsidy for California's Wetlands project, for example, runs to $1,540 per acre, roughly equal to the cost of the land itself.

Taxpayers have dug into their pockets twice for these irrigation projects: first, for the direct subsidy, and second, for the crop price-support programs that were required, in part, because of the surpluses produced on these subsidized lands. Consumers, on the other hand, have benefited (in the short run, at least) from lower food prices.

Most of the more feasible water projects have already been built; the exploitation of the Colorado, the Rio Grande, and other rivers is almost complete. Farmers have begun to tap ground water. In California, ground water has provided 40 percent of the total amount of water used since 1953. In Arizona ground water has provided almost half since that same year. With the current heavy pumping, the water level is falling, and the draw-down continues. Farmers are simply drilling deeper to get their water—and at extra expense. Water itself remains cheap; it's priced below its true cost and utility.

However, a water shortage seems to be near. On the high plains, stretching from Nebraska to eastern New Mexico and from Colorado to the Texas Panhandle, irrigation has come from water in the eight-state Ogallala aquifer, an underground lake. In some places, its water is currently being depleted 14 times faster than it is being replaced. Net aquifer depletion in Texas runs from one to five feet per year. Given the rising cost of fuel for pumping, irrigation in some areas may prove uneconomical well before the water runs out. But the fact remains that the Ogallala aquifer is being emptied considerably more quickly than it is being recharged.

All told, perhaps one-fourth of America's irrigated croplands use underground water faster than it is being renewed. Moving water by pipeline or canal from the Mississippi to northern Texas or New Mexico would cost more than $400 per acre foot, more than 10 times what farmers say they can afford for irrigation water.

Almost every region west of the Mississippi, according to the U.S. National Water Assessment, has an insufficient amount of water from all sources for future agricultural production, based on present levels of use. The federal government estimates that Western farmers' demand for water will have risen only 6 percent from 1975 to the year 2000; but the demand for water by all other users—industry, municipalities, miners—will increase by 81 percent. And the prospects for bringing in enough extra water to satisfy the needs of developers of oil shale and processors of Western strip-mined coal are dim.

ENERGY USE IS INCREASING

As everybody knows, U.S. agriculture is energy-intensive. Total tractor horsepower has more than doubled since 1951. More field work, the field-picking and shelling of corn, the use of bigger and bigger combines, and the general trend toward labor-saving machines have all required more fuel. Less obviously, U.S. farmers also use sizable amounts of fuel for operating irrigation pumps, drying corn and other harvested crops, heating animal pens and breeding cages, and transporting crops to market. Most important, petrochemicals are used in fertilizers and insecticides.

Thus, for corn, the energy outlay per acre in gasoline equivalents is as follows: fertilizer (mostly nitrogen), 40 gallons; natural gas for drying the corn, 20 gallons; tractor fuel for tillage and cultivation, 10 gallons; herbicides and insecticides, 5 gallons. In sum, it takes about 75 gallons of gasoline equivalents to produce and harvest one acre of corn.

One current research effort is devoted to reducing the use of chemical fertilizers, especially nitrogen. Growing legumes (clover, alfalfa, vetch) adds nitrogen to the soil "organically." A test using these legumes in a crop rotation produced as much protein and cost less in terms of chemical fertilizer than did the usual "corn-on-corn" monoculture that many farmers currently practice. But for a cash-grain farmer, the economics are poor. He cannot sell the legumes for as much money as he could get for the corn. The dwindling number of mixed livestock-grain farmers, on the other hand, can use clover and alfalfa in rotation and thereby save on chemical nitrogen—livestock can eat the legumes as hay or pasture and provide manure that is returned to the soil as fertilizer.

For most farmers, nitrogen fertilizer will remain a major energy item. While fuel prices rose 207 percent from 1973 to 1980, the price of nitrogen-rich anhydrous ammonia fertilizer went up 161 percent. More efficient use of such fertilizer is likely as its cost continues to rise. But the elimination of nitrogen fertilizer would mean a significant drop in U.S. agricultural output.

As for fuel, farmers, like everyone else in America, will adjust. For some in the West, reduced water supplies and the higher cost of fuel for pumping will cause a shift to the production of more valuable crops on irrigated land, from alfalfa to corn, for example. To reduce fuel costs in the Midwest, there will be greater incentives to go to minimum tillage for corn or soybeans, thus reducing both tractor time and soil erosion. Other farmers will use solar heat to warm hog houses and milking parlors; still others will rely on windmills for part of their electricity. Livestock farmers may use methane derived from hog or cow manure, as practical methods of producing and bottling the gas evolve.

Nourished by federal loan guarantees and tax breaks, the infant gasohol industry is designed to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil. A mixture of 90 percent gasoline and 10 percent ethyl allcohol (ethanol), gasohol was pushed strongly by President Carter's administration. In 1980, total output of ethanol increased 300 percent, to 150 million gallons.

The federal government has projected a rapid buildup in production capacity that will make it possible to produce enough alcohol from all sources—10 billion gallons—to "stretch" U.S. gasoline supplies 10 percent by 1990.

FOOD FOR FUEL?

In the case of ethanol, one possible long-term problem lies in the fact that corn is now the cheapest, most practical feedstock. (Indeed, Carter's critics saw his 1980 promotion of gasohol largely as a sop to Midwestern corn farmers angered by his partial embargo on U.S. grain exports to the Soviet Union.) One bushel of corn makes two and a half gallons of ethanol. At current production levels, the effect on the overall demand for corn is insignificant.

A fast buildup, however, would have a major impact. According to Purdue economist Wallace Tyner, production of four billion gallons of ethanol in 1984 could lead to a 30 percent increase in corn prices. Many farmers would then switch to growing corn for the new ethanol market rather than soybeans or other lower-priced crops. Higher U.S. corn prices could hurt exports of the grain; incentives to cultivate additional erosion-prone marginal land might increase. So would the cost of feeding hogs, cattle, and chickens—and so would consumer meat prices. And some critics claim that current methods of making ethanol (including growing and processing the corn) consume more total energy than they produce.

There has been much rhetoric, particularly among environmentalists and Farm Belt politicians, about threats to the future of the family farm. Merely defining the family farm or the small farmer has caused some difficulty. The decline in the total number of farms and the increase in the average farm's acreage usually start the discussions. But these numbers conceal as much as they reveal.

BIGGER MAY NOT BE BETTER

One can start at the top. One-fifth (477,000 in 1974) of all farms are what the USDA calls "primary" farms: in 1974 they earned more than $40,000 in gross sales of what they grew. That year, they accounted for more than 78 percent of all U.S. farm output. Their operators are overwhelmingly farmers and their kinfolk, not agribusiness corporations. Almost half of these farms are crop farms (grain, cotton, sugar, tobacco). Within this primary group is an elite: 64,000 farms with more than $200,000 in sales that account for 40 percent of farm output.

The primary farms are the big engines of U.S. production. Their owner get more than 75 percent of their revenue from crops and livestock. They own 70 percent of the nation's farmland and rent much of the rest. They are in the best cash position to buy more, and their predominance is growing.

Four-fifths of all farms in America are in the under-$40,000 gross sales category. What now keeps most of these family farms going is off-farm income—factory wages, salaries, dividends, retirement benefits. From 1960 to 1974, nonfarm income per farm increased, on the average, about 7 percent per year. The trend has given farm families a financial security not found in agriculture, which is volatile in both yield and price, and thus has averted the further depopulation of the countryside.

Indeed, one-third of America's farms sell less than $2,500 worth of farm products a year, but in 1978 their owners' average family income slightly exceeded the national median of $17,640. These may be small farmers, but contrary to the claims of subsidy-seeking farm lobbyists, no longer are small farmers necessarily needy, low-income folk.

How big is the most efficient farm? A long-accepted notion was that the capital-intensive new technology, particularly mechanized equipment, made bigness synonymous with efficiency and lower consumer food prices. Every farm is different; raising wheat in Kansas is not the same as raising cotton in Texas. Yet with bigness, it was said, came lower production costs to the farmer per bushel of wheat per bale of cotton, and per pound of beef on the hoof.

But at some point, more efficiency and more acreage cease to march together. A 1979 USDA technical study indicated that most—90 percent—of the economies of scale could be captured on family farms of relatively small acreage. But achieving the last 10 percent required that farms more than double in size.

For example, an Iowa corn and soybean farmer in 1979 could reach the 90 percent efficiency level with only 300 acres, selling $60,000 worth of crops. To attain 100 percent efficiency, the same farmer would have to work 640 acres, selling $145,000 worth of crops. (As it happened, such primary farms in Iowa averaged 401 acres and $123,000 in gross sales.) The most powerful incentive to buy or rent more land may simply be the desire among farmers to increase family net income, not to become more efficient.

The government helps this along. Federal subsidies to producers of corn, wheat, and other commodities are based on the national-average costs of producing each crop. The larger, more efficient farmers specializing in corn or wheat have lower-than-average costs; hence the subsidies tend to provide them with a windfall gain. In 1978, 1 percent of the farmers, those with large farms, got 29 percent of all the federal commodity program's payments. Since subsidies are paid on a per-bushel basis, these farmers, in turn, can put extra cash into buying more land. Thus, indirectly, federal crop payments have an unequal effect; like the tax laws, they tend to favor the bigger farmer.

Land, water, energy—these elements shape the long-range problems facing American agriculture. But, like the long-range energy problems evident to specialists but ignored by politicians during the 1950s, they have received little serious attention in Congress, the media, or the White House. Any major remedies involve financial burdens on farmers, consumers, or taxpayers. Hence, they also promise political pain to elected officials. It is much easier to inveigh against high meat prices or corporate agribusiness or federal meddling.

Thus, few of the real issues cropped up in the congressional debate over the 1981 farm bill, which will guide federal policy through 1985. In essence, the Congress is simply tinkering with the farmer's safety net—the crop-subsidy legislation created during the Great Depression of the 1930s. Both Republicans and Democrats view the new export surge as a boon, keeping up grain prices and reducing farmers' need for subsidies.

However, as columnist Lauren Soth observes, America cannot possibly feed the world or continue to serve as a ready-reserve granary, as it has for the Russians. Its best land is already under cultivation; the pressure to "mine" more land and more water is already high. Fairly soon, the United States will have to decide whether to restrict exports and pay farmers to conserve land or to risk the long-range loss of the productivity of America's soil. U.S. agriculture is, in effect, experiencing a bonanza that, unexamined, could ruin us all.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, July 26, 1982

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, we thank You for the promises that You have given us and the eternal hope that gives us peace. Grant that in the hearts of all Your people there will be a measure of thanksgiving for the blessings of life and for the opportunities of service. We pray that Your Spirit will comfort those who know sadness or adversity and give strength to every heart and soul. May Your presence never leave us and may we continue to walk through life confident of Your perfect love that will never let us go. In Your holy name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

SUNDRY MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 6530. An act to establish the Mount St. Helens National Volcanic Area, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 6530) entitled "An act to establish the Mount St. Helens National Volcanic Area, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. McCLURE, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. JACKSON, and Mr. BUMPERS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 114. Concurrent resolution to congratulate the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and all persons involved in the success of the test flight phase of the Space Shuttle program.

LEAD RESOLUTION

(Mr. BEDELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, last week I introduced a resolution addressing a serious danger facing our Nation's public health. On February 22, 1982, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency proposed a rule to consider increasing the amount of lead additives that may be put in motor gasoline. This proposal contradicts the testimony of American scientists, including the National Academy of Sciences, who have strongly urged our continuation of all efforts to decrease the amount of lead entering our environment.

My resolution expresses opposition to any changes in the lead phase-down schedule which would increase the amount of lead allowed in gasoline, and points to the availability of alcohol fuels as viable octane-enhancing alternatives to lead.

I also urge my colleagues to cosign a letter I am circulating that will be sent to EPA Administrator Anne Gorsuch, expressing our opposition to EPA's proposed changes. I circulated this letter several weeks ago, and have received the strong support of many of our colleagues involved in energy issues before Congress.

The seriousness of this matter merits a strong response from Congress. I urge your support in reducing the level of lead in our environment.

THE BUDGET

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the House is beginning the very critical task of implementing the fiscal 1983 budget. It is the final and most important phase of the budget process.

I think the House can be divided into two factions on implementation. The first, of which I am a member, intends to see our budget implemented pure and simple.

The other faction stands in total defiance of the budget we adopted and intends to sabotage it.

Their strategy is no secret. They intend to exploit the process so it can be used to their advantage in the November elections. It is an old song and dance that has been played over and over again for nearly 2 years on such issues as social security and medicare, taxes and housing.

To those who belong to this faction, the budget process and our Nation's economic recovery are expendable, if it means a partisan political advantage this fall.

It is tragic that we have come to this, but I am glad it is finally coming out into the open.

I hope there are enough Members of this House who have the courage to stand by their convictions in the face of adversity. I just cannot believe that the American people will turn out anyone who puts the courage of his conviction above the exploitation of our Nation's economic health for the sake of partisan political gain.

POTATO RESEARCH AND PROMOTION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1982

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 2160), to amend the Potato Research and Promotion Act, with Senate amendments thereto and disagree with the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

STRENGTHENING THE FARM ECONOMY

SEC. 5. (a) It is the sense of Congress that the President should work with the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System in implementing policies that will, as soon as practicable, reduce the rate of interest farmers must pay to obtain credit for necessary production items.

(b) It is further the sense of Congress, with full recognition that inflation rates that affect farm production costs are declining and that efforts have already been made by the Administration to improve conditions in the farm economy, that the President and the Secretary of Agriculture should use the broad authorities vested in them by Congress to take expeditious action to strengthen commodity prices received by farmers and provide credit assistance to farmers, with particular attention to be given to the following possible courses of action:

(1) an increased effort to encourage farmers to participate in the recently announced voluntary reduced acreage programs for the 1982 crops of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, and rice that are designed to avoid the adverse economic effects of excessive production of these commodities;

(2) the early consideration and announcement of the terms and conditions of the commodity programs for the 1983 crops;

(3) as a complement to any reduced acreage program, the implementation of a voluntary paid land diversion program in 1983 for producers of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, and rice, if necessary;

(4) recognizing that loan rates and target prices for the 1982 crops have been announced, the establishment of price support loan rates for the 1983 crops of wheat, feed grains, and rice at levels higher than those announced for the 1982 crops, so as to provide more adequate price protection to farmers;

(5) the active pursuit of an aggressive export development program directed toward opening new markets for United States agricultural commodities using all the authorities available to them, including the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act and the Agricultural Trade Act of 1978, recognizing the efforts already made by the Administration to expand United States export sales of agricultural products by means of—

(A) a 12 per centum increase in the budget for foreign market deveopment programs of the Foreign Agricultural Service;

(B) a $2,500,000,000 budget for the export credit guarantee program;

(C) meetings between the Secretary of Agriculture and foreign government officials of equivalent rank (i) to affirm the United States position as a reliable supplier, and (ii) to encourage officials in major markets to reduce their use of export subsidies and other unfair trade practices that reduce the United States share of trade with third country markets and to reduce import restrictions; and

(D) proposed increases in the programs under title I of Public Law 480:

(6) with full recognition that officials of the Department of Agriculture have indicated that the total forced liquidations of farm operations in 1982 (as a result of delinquencies in repayment of Farmers Home Administration farm loans) will not exceed 1 per centum of all farmers holding Farmers Home Administration farm loans nor substantially exceed the previous year's level—

(A) provision for deferrals on repayment and foregoing foreclosures whenever practicable, of Farmers Home Administration farm loans for borrowers who can show that (i) they are not now able to meet their debt obligations without unduly impairing their ability to meet essential farm needs (including family subsistence) due to circumstances beyond their control (based on the individual circumstances of the borrower) and (ii) they will have the ability to repay their loans once the deferral period is over (with any such deferral to be for such period of time as the Secretary deems necessary based on the borrower's individual circumstances); and

(B) permitting such farm borrowers to obtain reamortization or rescheduling of their loans to provide equitable repayment terms (including an interest charge at the original rate established for the loan) consistent with their farm and financial condition; and

(7) the use of the Secretary's discretionary authority to implement the economic emergency loan program when existing farm operating loan program funds have been exhausted.

(c) It is further the sense of Congress that the President, in nominating persons for positions on the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System that will become open in 1982, should ensure that agricultural interests are provided fair representation on the Board.

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to amend the Potato Research and Promotion Act and to express the sense of Congress regarding the strengthening of the farm economy.".

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HANSEN of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask has this been cleared with the minority leadership?

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN of Idaho. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Yes; it has. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WAMPLER) is in agreement with the action we take today.

Mr. HANSEN of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THIRTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF NATIONAL CORPORATION FOR HOUSING PARTNERSHIPS AND NATIONAL HOUSING PARTNERSHIP—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Monday, July 26, 1982.)

THE 1981 ANNUAL REPORT OF U.S. ARMS CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT AGENCY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Monday, July 26, 1982.)

PHILIP C. HABIB—AN ABLE DIPLOMAT

(Mr. DERWINSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, given the delicacy of the Middle East situation, no other diplomat could play the unique and effective role being played by Special Envoy Philip C. Habib.

Any politically motivated or sensationalistic criticism of Mr. Habib is contrary to the national interests of the United States and could jeopardize the opportunity for peace in Lebanon and the Middle East which exists.

Mr. Habib is a retired diplomat and did not volunteer to fill his current post. He was called back and asked to serve. As a retiree augmenting his income as a consultant to the Bechtel Group, Inc., in a naturally legitimate manner, no one could have surmised he would be so heavily involved in the current negotiations.

To imply any conflict of interest is either cheap politics or sensationalism at its worst.

Given our goals, which are to restore a viable Lebanon and provide Israel with the security it has not had earlier from terrorist attacks, thus diffusing tensions in the Middle East, the diplomatic challenge Mr. Habib is pursuing is the greatest facing anyone in the world at this time. He should be allowed to meet this great challenge unfettered by unwise and unfounded attacks on his Bechtel association.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken Tuesday, July 27, 1982.

DELAYING EFFECT OF CERTAIN CHANGES IN THE FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 6663), to delay the effective date of proposed amendments to rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 6663

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding the provisions of section 2072 of title 28, United States Code, the amendments to rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as proposed by the Supreme Court of the United States and transmitted to the Congress by the Chief Justice on April 28, 1982, shall take effect on October 1, 1983, unless previously approved, disapproved, or modified by Act of Congress.

SEC. 2. This Act shall be effective as of August 1, 1982, but shall not apply to the service of process that takes place between August 1, 1982, and the date of enactment of this Act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MCCLORY) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS).

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, on April 28, 1982, the Supreme Court sent to Congress a group of proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and the Rules and Forms Governing Habeas Corpus Proceedings. These proposed amendments were promulgated pursuant to provisions known as the Rules Enabling Acts. The acts authorize the Court to propose amendments to existing rules of "practice and procedure" by transmitting them to Congress no later than May 1 after the start of a regular session. The amendments take effect 90 days after transmission, unless Congress acts to the contrary. The purpose of the 90-day delay is to provide Congress with an opportunity to review the proposals.

The Court's proposed amendments to the civil rules make changes in rules 4 (c) and (d)(7), which deal with who may serve process and the manner in which service must be made. Rule 4(c) presently authorizes service of process by a U.S. marshal or a deputy marshal, by a specially appointed process server, or by someone authorized to serve process by the law of the State in which the court sits. Rule 4(d)(7) permits service of process upon certain defendants by mail in accordance with the law of the State in which the court sits.

The proposed amendments to rule 4(c) are intended by the Court to reduce the role of marshals in serving process in private civil actions. Report of the Judicial Conference Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure, in House Document 97-173 at 14. Thus, the proposed amendments to rule 4(c) permit service of a summons and complaint by any nonparty who is 18 years of age or older. Marshals are authorized to serve a summons and complaint only in specified circumstances: First, on behalf of a party authorized to proceed in forma pauperis; second, where a statute requires the marshals to serve process; and third, where a court, to assure that service is properly effected, orders a marshal to serve the process.

The proposed amendment to rule 4(d) permits service of a summons and complaint by mail, and requires, where mail service is used, that the mail be certified. The amendment also eliminates the option presently in the rule to follow State law in regard to mail service.

The purpose of H.R. 6663 is to postpone the effective date of these amendments so that we can take a close look at them. The use of certified mail for the service of process does not appear to be the most effective and reliable system of mail service and may lead to a significant number of challenges to judgments entered by default. Moreover, while I am not aware of any objection raised about the goal of reducing the role of marshals in the service of civil process, it is likely that the proposed amendments, as drafted, will not have that result. Finally, other proposed amendments to rule 4 create ambiguities that can only be resolved by litigation.

A congressional review of the proposed amendments, which H.R. 6663 will permit, will enable us to draft legislation that will insure reaching a goal of reducing the marshals' role in serving process, that will develop an effective and reliable system for service by mail, and that will clarify any ambiguities.

The proposed amendments' reliance upon certified mail as the sole method of mail service appears to be misplaced. Certified mail is not a dependable method of providing adequate notice: Mail carriers may not make the necessary inquiries to assure that mail is delivered to the proper person; there may be difficulty in reading signatures on the receipts; or the postal authorities may not be able to determine whether mail has been "unclaimed" or "refused," the latter providing the basis for a default judgment under the new subsection.

My own State of California has used a different system of mail service for over 10 years with much success. The California system permits service by ordinary mail with a notice and acknowledgement of receipt form attached (Cal. Civ. Proc. Section 415.30 (West 1973).) If the defendant returns the acknowledgement form, as most do the case continues on schedule. If the acknowledgement is not returned, personal service is required. Because proposed subsection (d) eliminates the option to follow local law, the Federal courts in California would no longer be able to use this most effective method of service.

With regard to the goal of reducing the role of marshals in serving process, the amendments to subsection (c) do not appear to succeed in reaching that goal. The proposed amendments require marshals to serve process where commanded to do so by statute. One statute, 28 U.S.C. 569(b), requires marshals to serve all process of a court of the United States. In order to achieve the desired result, it appears to be necessary to alter the language of the proposed amendment or to amend the language of 28 U.S.C. 569(b). The Department of Justice has recommended amending section 569(b), and the Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice has scheduled hearings for September 9, 1982, on H.R. 3580, a bill to amend section 569(b).

Finally, the proposed amendment creating new subsection (j) requires further consideration as well. The new subsection commands a judge to dismiss without prejudice an action against a defendant who has not been served within 120 days of the filing of the complaint. A problem occurs when a statute of limitation expires after filing but before service is made. The new subsection requires dismissal, but without prejudice. However, if there is such a dismissal but the action does not survive for purposes of the statute of limitation, then there has been a dismissal with prejudice. Neither the text of the new subsection nor the advisory committee note lends guidance on this point.

The new subsection is also unclear as to whether service has been "made" when service is timely but defective through no fault of the party. These and other ambiguities in the subsection should be resolved.

H.R. 6663 postpones the effective date of the proposed changes in rule 4 until October 1, 1983. This additional time will permit us to insure that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure utilize the most efficient and reliable system of mail service, that they actually reduce the role of U.S. marshals in servi ,g process, and that they are as free as possible of ambiguities requiring costly litigation to clarify.

I urge my colleagues to vote for the bill.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, H.R. 6663, simply delays the effective date of proposed amendments to rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. I agree with the gentleman from California that we need to delay the effective date to give us time to perfect the proposed amendments.

H.R. 6663 concerns only rule 4; it does not affect the proposed changes to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or the habeas corpus rules contained in the Supreme Court's order of April 28, 1982. If H.R. 6663 is enacted, those changes will still take effect on August 1, 1982.

Mr. Speaker, while these proposals come to us from the Supreme Court, the Court did not draft them. An advisory committee of the Judicial Conference drafted them. When the first draft of the changes in rule 4 met substantial opposition, the advisory committee redrafted the changes and submitted the second draft to the Judicial Conference, which in turn, sent it to the Supreme Court for approval. We received the submission directly from the Supreme Court. Thus, the specific proposed amendments to rule 4 that are before us have never been exposed to public comment.

Practitioners, judges, and process servers have nevertheless raised objections to the changes. Some of those objections appear to have some foundation and ought to be considered. Service of process is such an important part of civil litigation, that we ought not condone any changes without careful consideration of them.

The Committee on the Judiciary has received no complaints about the underlying purpose of the changes, to diminish the role of U.S. marshals in serving process. It has, however, received complaints that the proposed changes will not serve that purpose. The exception in proposed rule 4(c)(2)(b), which provides that marshals must serve process when authorized to do so by statute, swallows up the general rule against service by marshals because 23 U.S.C. 569(b) requires the marshals to serve all process coming from courts of the United States. In addition, it has been complained that the exclusive method of mail service prescribed—certified mail, restricted delivery—is not the most effective way to achieve notice of claims, and that removing the option to follow effective local laws in serving certain defendants is unwise and unnecessary. Finally, it has been suggested that new provisions for limiting the time within which papers must be served are unclear and may have unanticipated and unfair consequences, especially as regards statutes of limitation. The ambiguity in the language of the proposed rule, it is pointed out, is not resolved in the advisory committee notes.

These complaints are serious and require us to exercise our responsibility to oversee the rulemaking process. H.R. 6663 will provide us the time to consider the complaints and draft whatever legislation may be necessary to insure that the proposed amendments actually reduce the role of marshals in serving process, provide for the most reliable and effective form of mail service, and are as free of ambiguities as possible.●

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to commend the gentleman from California, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights, for his very clear explanation of this measure and to join in expressing support of H.R. 6663. I wish also to acknowledge that since a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee will schedule hearings on this subject, that it is entirely appropriate that we should enact this bill in order that we can have an opportunity for hearings on proposed amendments, which otherwise would take effect on August 1.

The changes in the rules of civil procedure which were recommended to us by the Chief Justice contain a number of changes, quite a number, as a matter of fact, and it is just with respect to this one recommendation that we are suggesting that the Congress take a look at it and that we defer action at this time. It is necessary that we do take action, because otherwise the rules do become effective automatically.

I do think that the change with regard to the service of process justifies exploration by the Judiciary Committee in public hearings.

The amendments, which take effect on August 1, unless Congress acts, establish a uniform procedure for service of process by registered mail in Federal civil cases. As the gentleman from California has indicated, there is a different type of process serving in the State of California, and may I say likewise in the State of Illinois, a simplified procedure which I judge would be replaced by this uniform practice which is embodied in rule 4 if it becomes effective.

The change marks a departure from the current practice permitting use of State procedures in the various Federal districts.

In addition, rule 4 currently permits service of process by those authorized to serve under State law and this is deleted by the Supreme Court's amendment.

The Department of Justice, the Postal Service, and the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts all should be heard from, as well as other interested parties. We have a responsibility under the rulemaking process to scrutinize proposed changes when a controversy arises such as this. We simply cannot act within the effective date in all cases and, consequently, it seems to me we should defer action here.

I do not believe that every amendment promulgated by the Supreme Court should be delayed; but in cases such as this, Congress should permit a full and open examination of the issues. There is no urgency about the enactment of rule 4. Therefore, I think it is extremely important that we take action on this measure.

I am, therefore, very much in support of the measure.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BROWN of California). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 6663, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL INSECTICIDE, FUNGICIDE, AND RODENTICIDE ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1982

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5203) to amend the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 5203, with Mr. MILLER of California in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. HAGEDORN) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA).

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill, H.R. 5203.

The bill contains a number of amendments to the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act and is the result of extended consideration of the issues covered by the proposed legislation during a period of approximately a year by the committee and the Subcommittee on Department Operations, Research, and Foreign Agriculture, under the able direction of Mr. GEORGE BROWN of California. In total the subcommittee held 6 days of hearings—both in Washington and in the field—and the subcommittee and full committee devoted 7 days to business sessions for markup of the legislation. In addition, individual members have had considerable discussion among themselves and with the many interested parties concerning the various issues covered by the bill.

The bill that results from these deliberations covers a wide variety of issues and takes account of the various views presented in a fair and balanced manner, while at the same time maintaining the statute's basic protection of the public health and the environment.

First, H.R. 5203, as reported by the committee, extends the authorization for appropriations under FIFRA through September 30, 1984. The funding authorization for the next fiscal year is in the amount of $56.4 million and 6 percent in excess of that amount for the fiscal year 1984. The limit on appropriations for fiscal year 1983 would maintain funding for salaries and expenses and abatement, control and compliance at fiscal year 1982 levels, but should be sufficient to operate the program on a sound basis. The authorization of appropriations for the current fiscal year merely confirms the extension of the act that occurred through the appropriation process since the authorization for this period was delayed by consideration of the issues covered by this bill. The bill also extends the term of the scientific advisory panel through 1987 and strengthens its composition and resolves a number of problems arising in the administration of the act.

REGISTRATION PROCEDURES

Among the major amendments to the act are changes made in the procedures used by EPA in registering pesticides. Under the act no person may distribute or sell any pesticide which is not registered with the administrator. As a condition of approval for registration, the Administrator must make a number of determinations including a determination that the pesticide will perform its intended function without an unreasonable adverse effect to health or the environment. Applicants for pesticide registrations must submit data or make reference to data previously submitted to EPA to substantiate claims regarding the pesticide.

The amendments changes the rules regarding the sharing of data submitted to EPA in support of a pesticide registration. They would provide a 15-year period of exclusive use for: First, data submitted to support an application for the registration of a pesticide containing a new active ingredient initially registered after September 30, 1978, second, data submitted after September 30, 1978 to register new uses of a previously registered pesticide, and third, data submitted after the date of enactment of H.R. 5203 for an experimental use permit. Under current law, in the case of data submitted to support an application for a new registration, exclusive use protection is provided for a period of 10 years followed by a 5-year period during which a subsequent applicant must pay compensation for use of the data. The amendment would lead to a phaseout of requirements for data compensation by 1993. The extension of exclusive use protection was added to enhance the economic incentive for firms to conduct costly long-run pesticide research and development programs.

H.R. 5203 also provides a substantially modified procedure governing the joint development of additional data to support existing registrations of pesticides.

The procedures for developing additional data under existing law have been unsatisfactory and subject to litigation. The importance of revising the system is underscored by the agency's intention to impose requests for replacement studies on dozens of older, yet widely used pesticides. The bill provides that when the Administrator requests additional data to support the existing registrations of a pesticide, all companies holding a registration on the product are given 180 days to join together in a task force convened specifically for the purpose of satisfying the agency's data requirements. A simple formula is established by which members of a task force can share in the cost of developing the data taking into account both the relative size of each individual company's share of the market and the up-front risks entailed in developing data which may or may not assure continued access to the marketplace.

Data developed by a task force is afforded 15 years of shared exclusivity from the date of submission although other registrants may buy into the task force after its completion by paying an equal share of the cost of producing the data in proportion to the number of companies participating in the task force.

In order to facilitate the administration and implementation of the new registration process, H.R. 5203 directs the Administrator to compile, with the cooperation of the industry, an index of studies previously submitted to satisfy given data requirements. A purpose of the index among others, is to provide the industry with a complete inventory of studies, including their status with respect to compensation and/or exclusivity. From this inventory, subsequent applicants who desire to cite other registrants' data, rather than develop their own, will have a complete and regularly updated guide showing the availability of studies which they may cite in order to satisfy a given data requirement.

Because of the time needed to develop and implement the data index, the majority of the features of the new registration system will not become effective upon passage of this act. In general, the old system is kept in place during an 18-month interim period.

DISCLOSURE OF HEALTH AND SAFETY DATA

Another change in the act relates to the provisions in section 10 of FIFRA concerning disclosure of health and safety test data submitted by an applicant for registration of a pesticide.

The amendments to section 10 embodied in H.R. 5203 attempt to equitably resolve disputes that have arisen in the implementation of the 1978 amendments to FIFRA. Data submitters have represented that the 1978 amendments do not provide adequate protection to prevent the disclosure of research data to competitors which could in turn, result in the use of such data by competitors for commercial purposes. Interest groups concerned with the safety of pesticides have represented that they need access to health and safety data to assess pesticide risks, and EPA has stated that such access is desirable if the agency's decisions are to command public confidence. The amendments attempt to accommodate these interests.

The amendment is designed to provide complete access to copies of health, safety, and environment data by those members of the public who are not associated with the pesticide industry, and assure their ability to communicate and make public information in such studies concerning health, safety, and environmental effects, while at the same time protecting the proprietary interest of the owner or submitter of studies in preventing competitors from having access to the data or making unauthorized use of the data.

There would be a greater degree of protection provided innovative methods and technology. Such protection is strictly limited. It would cover only an item of information that describes scientific method or technology—or a method of combining known technology—which is: Innovative; not otherwise available to the public; used for the purpose of obtaining product chemistry, environmental chemistry, residue chemistry, or metabolism data; substantially different from known methods or technologies; and capable of providing, if disclosed, a significant advantage to competitors of the submitter of the data. In no event can an item of data be considered an innovative method or technology for longer than 5 years after the date of submission.

This type of data would be made available only to independent scientists, scientists in Federal or State agencies, and scientists acting on behalf of nonprofit health, environmental, or labor organizations to permit them to conduct a peer review or replicate the study. They would be authorized to communicate with each other and with EPA, but not otherwise disclose the innovative methods or technology to the general public unless the Administrator determined that it was necessary in the public interest because of concerns as to protection of health, safety, and the environment. A procedure is provided whereby they can obtain summaries of innovative methods or technology which can be freely disclosed to the public.

AUTHORITY OF THE STATES

The third major issue addressed by H.R. 5203 relates to the authorization of the States to regulate the sale and use of any federally registered pesticide. Under section 24(a) of FIFRA a State is authorized to regulate the sale and use of such a pesticide so long as it does not permit the sale or use prohibited by EPA.

Industry representatives testified before the committee on a number of complaints regarding the operation of the pesticide registration program in the State of California. That State had recently enacted a statute patterned after FIFRA, and persons wishing to sell a federally registered pesticide in California must obtain approval from California Department of Food and Agriculture (CDFA) before being allowed to distribute the pesticide in the State. The industry representatives sought a change in FIFRA which would provide certain constraints on the ability of the State to request data beyond the data which had already been submitted to EPA for approval of a pesticide, and to otherwise expedite State action.

On the other hand, representatives of the State of California, the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture, and environmental groups supported retention of the current language of section 24(a) on the basis of States rights and on the grounds that industry complaints with the California program were exaggerated.

The committee held a number of hearings on this issue throughout the course of a year both in Washington and in the field and adopted a compromise contained in H.R. 5203 which reconciles the differences between the two contending sides on a fair and equitable basis.

The amendments to section 24(a) do not in any way modify the right of a State to make regulatory decisions pertaining to the sale or use of a federally registered pesticide, and to exercise authority to base such sale or use. In addition, each State may continue to request data above and beyond the data required by EPA. The amendments are addressed solely to providing for a review of a State's requests for data and to providing constraints on the period of time a State may take in reaching certain registration decisions.

The bill facilitates the States obtaining data which previously had been submitted to EPA by an applicant. H.R. 5203 specifically authorizes a State to obtain from EPA any data needed in its regulation of the sale and use of a pesticide under section 24(a). This includes trade secret data—which is not available to the public—on the condition that the State does not disclose the data publicly unless EPA has decided to release such data.

The bill also preserves the prerogative of a State to request additional data with respect to any restricted use pesticide, or any general use pesticide used for agricultural purposes in the event of special local concerns. A State's data request in such situations is not subject to review, and the only condition imposed by the statute is that the applicant must be provided written notice and justification for the requested data.

A review by EPA is provided in the case of special local concerns for pesticides which are classified for general use and used for nonagricultural purposes. In such event, the State's request for data is subject to EPA review and may be overruled or modified if it is determined that the State's request is arbitrary or capricious. In any event, the Administrator's determination in such cases is subject to judicial review.

A similar type of review is provided in case a State makes a request for data that is not available from EPA and does not involve a special local concern of the State. In such event, the consideration by the State is no different than that reviewed by EPA in its original registration decision. If the Administrator has not taken action within a designated period, approval of the State's request would be presumed.

In addition, time requirements have been set out in H.R. 5203 for handling of applications for registration by a State which are comparable to the time requirements that currently apply in many States. Again these requirements do not apply to cases of special local needs.

The approach taken in the committee amendment is comparable to the approach taken in other provisions of FIFRA. For example, the States have been given primary enforcement responsibility for pesticide use violations under FIFRA. Nonetheless, the act provides for the Administrator to have enforcement responsibility in those States which have not adopted adequate enforcement statutes or in the case of a State's failure to assure enforcement of pesticide use violations.

Similarly, States are authorized to conduct a program for the training and certification of applicators that apply restricted use pesticides if a State program has been approved by the Administrator. Whenever the Administrator determines that a State is not conducting a certification and training program in accordance with an approved plan, if appropriate corrective action is not taken, the Administrator can withdraw approval of the plan and the function would then be undertaken by the EPA.

NEW PROTECTIONS TO THE PUBLIC

The committee has adopted in H.R. 5203 a number of amendments intended to enhance the effectiveness of the act's safeguards against hazards associated with the manufacture and use of pesticides. The provisions address concerns brought to the committee's attention by farmworker and labor organizations, environmental groups, farmers, and public health organizations.

One provision would assure that pesticides are used safely. When found necessary, the Administrator is directed to promulgate new regulations within 1 year to establish minimum field reentry standards for farmworkers, including appropriate methods to assure that farmworkers are adequately informed of the standards. Such steps are prudent and necessary wherever people can be regularly expected to come into contact with crops recently treated with pesticides.

Another provision in H.R. 5203 mandates that States, in carrying out their primary enforcement responsibilities, must undertake appropriate field investigative action as soon as possible, and in no event more than 5 days after receipt of a complaint that an agricultural worker may have been injured by a violation of FIFRA. This mandate applies to those cases of pesticide injury where a delay beyond 5 days in conducting an appropriate scientific investigation of the facts surrounding a case would jeopardize the ability of the investigating officials to substantiate or refute the substance of the claim. The committee is deeply concerned that inconclusive enforcement actions may be undermining the existing protections afforded agricultural workers in FIFRA, and believes that this provision will help assure timely and more satisfactory investigative actions.

Another important new provision added to FIFRA by H.R. 5203 makes it unlawful to discharge from employment or otherwise take adverse employment action against any employee because that person has exercised rights or filed complaints concerning alleged violations of FIFRA. Such protection is also given to workers testifying in an FIFRA proceeding or participating in an investigation of the facts surrounding an alleged violation of this act.

The committee has adopted a comprehensive set of remedies designed to assure that a worker's rights will be protected against such discriminatory treatment. These include provisions for filing of employee complaints with the Secretary of Labor, and for that Secretary to order the person committing any violation, after investigation, to take action to abate the violation, reinstate the employee to his former position with back pay, compensatory damages and where appropriate, exemplary damages. Any such order may be appealed to the appropriate U.S. court of appeals. These employee remedies are patterned after those included in other Federal statutes.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

There are also a number of other miscellaneous amendments contained in H.R. 5203. The committee was repeatedly faced with the dilemma of resolving conflicting interests and concerns strongly held by different segments of society over how our Nation's pesticide law should be structured and administered. These positions have been thoroughly and forcefully presented to the committee over the last year. In balancing these conflicting interests in H.R. 5203, the committee has adopted provisions which it views as fair and equitable compromises that preserve the integrity of the statute.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Members to join in supporting enactment of H.R. 5203.

Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5203, the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1982.

This legislation popularly referred to as FIFRA, is indeed a complex piece of legislation. It has been often stated that there are very few individuals here on Capitol Hill who understand the act. The legislation that we are considering today is the result of many hours of hearings, meetings, and markup sessions, and is truly a compromise bill in every sense of the word.

FIFRA as enacted in 1972 has been the subject of numerous court challenges to many of its provisions. Congress in attempting to make it work has amended it in a major way on two previous occasions, in 1975 and 1978, and now is once more attempting to respond to various complaints as to the workings of this act by fashioning these amendments contained in H.R. 5203.

As I previously noted, the amendments were arrived at after a long process of meetings with all interested parties, and it is my considered opinion that we have a bill that responds to most of the problems raised by various witnesses at the subcommittee hearings and should be approved by the House with a minimum of amendments. Personally I can support the legislation as it now reads without further amendments, but I am aware of several amendments that will be offered and the debate on these amendments will further clarify the issues and allow this body to work its will.

One of the most controversial of amendments that will be offered is the one striking section 11 of the bill, dealing with the authority of States. The proponents of this amendment argue that the language as contained in H.R. 5203 impinges on a State's rights. Much, much more will be said on this matter when we consider this legislation under the 5-minute rule, but I would take a few minutes to clarify the position of the administration on this amendment. Last week there were some indications that the Office of Management and Budget would recommend a veto of this bill if section 11 remained in the bill as it is and if the budget authorization figures were not lowered to the amount as recommended in the President's 1983 budget submission.

Last Friday, when Congressman WAMPLER took the floor in support of adopting the rule for consideration of this legislation, he cautioned that the jury was still out and that it was his understanding that OMB was in fact still reviewing its position on section 11 as contained in H.R. 5203. Late Friday evening, I am advised, the word was given that after reviewing section 11 a decision was made by OMB to oppose passage of the bill only if the budget figures were not in line with the President's 1983 budget recommendations. Obviously, after the review OMB came to the conclusions that they no longer opposed inclusion of section 11 in the legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I will not take further time to elaborate on the various features of this legislation. An adequate explanation has already been provided, and I would conclude my remarks by recommending to my colleagues that we approve this important legislation.

● Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Chairman, I wish at this time to indicate my support for H.R. 5203, the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1982. This legislation reflects a compromise that we have been able to forge and I would hope that we can pass this bill without too many changes.

Approximately a year ago the Subcommittee on Department Operations, Research, and Foreign Agriculture undertook the process of amending FIFRA. The last major amending process occurred in 1978 and various changes have been called for almost from that date but the initial reaction was to allow a little time for the 1978 amendments to be implemented before attempting further changes. After the passage of time and the effects of certain court decisions it soon became obvious that additional amendments would be necessary if the observable deficiencies in the 1978 amendments were to be corrected. I hope all in this Chamber understand the FIFRA is a very complex piece of legislation with many issues that are not easily resolved. Numerous court cases over the years reflect how various interest groups perceive the legislation and are willing to take the issues involved to court. We as legislators are asked to clear the air and this is what we have attempted to do in this legislation we are bringing to you today.

A series of hearings brought out the problem areas, and witnesses provided recommended solutions. In a series of meetings between the interested parties which covered many months and required many drafts and redrafts we finally have perfected this legislation. The so-called major amendments deal with changes to sections 3, 10, and 24.

Section 3 concerns the registration of pesticides. One of the major changes provides for a period of exclusive use of 15 years for data submitted to support an application for registration. It is this research data that is so costly to produce. Testimony received indicated that millions of dollars are expended for research to develop a pesticide and it is this data that should be protected under both the exclusive use provisions and the trade secrets provisions. More will be said later about trade secrets. The effect of this change is to substitute 15 years of exclusive use protection for the 10 years of exclusive use protection plus 5 years compensation as contained in the present law. Data compensation has not been a success and this legislation in effect phases out data compensation by 1933.

Another issue addressed in section 3 is "cite-all". Congress thought it cleared up this issue in the 1978 amendments but the interpretation placed on the law by the EPA created considerable controversy. We have more precisely stated in this legislation that an applicant may satisfy data requirements by submitting its own developed data, by citing data previously submitted to EPA by another registrant, or by combining these two methods as long as the applicant is not precluded from using another's data by the exclusive use of data compensation provisions. It should be pointed out that EPA is not precluded from reviewing all data available to determine whether the product will cause unreasonable risks to the environment. It just means that a producer is not required to offer to pay compensation for a variety of studies that may or may not have a bearing on the decision to be made by EPA to issue a registration.

Another change in the registration process deals with procedures for developing additional data to support the existing registrations of pesticides. This is referred to in the trade as "defensive data." For a variety of reasons

EPA is reviewing and requiring this additional data on previously registered pesticides. New procedures have been established for sharing the cost of developing this data. Registrants are required to participate rather than permitted to participate as in present law and data developed receives 15 years exclusive use, shared by the joint task force that produces the additional defensive data.

There are many other changes to section 3 that I will not take the time to enumerate. Suffice it to say that both large and small producers of pesticides and formulators of pesticides have agreed to these amendments as well as EPA, who must implement the law, and all feel that these amendments will make for a better method of registering pesticides while still protecting the environment.

Let me now turn to the amendments to section 10, dealing with trade secrets. The controversy that exists, pits the companies which manufacture chemicals used in pesticides against public interest groups who are concerned with pesticide safety. The manufacturers which are required to furnish data in order to secure a registration feel thay have a proprietary interest in the data, which if improperly divulged to competitors will cause them economic harm. The public interest groups, on the other hand, feel they must have access to health and safety data in order to assess pesticide risks. Although EPA is charged with the protection of the environment, the public interest groups feel that the EPA for many reasons has not met that obligation; consequently the need to have data reviewed by independent scientists. The amendments we are bringing to you in this legislation are designed to meet the needs of both of these groups. It seems to me that we should try to protect the manufacturer's trade secrets in order that they will continue to do the research necessary to produce the pesticides which are so vitally needed by our farmers to help them produce the food and fiber this country needs. At the same time we must be concerned with safeguarding the health and safety of our citizens. The amendment fashioned in the legislation is a compromise that was developed by all the interested groups and accepted by them. Since the amendments appear to be a good balance between the conflicting views I urge that they be accepted as written.

The amendments to section 24, the authority of the States, are the last of the major amendments that I would like to discuss. A State continues to be authorized to regulate the sale or use of any federally registered pesticide or device so long as it does not permit a sale or use prohibited by EPA. This has not been changed. The amendments do provide new authority for an EPA review and override for certain State data requests and do impose time limits on the time period during which the States must act to approve or deny registration applications.

These amendments are an outgrowth of a situation that has occurred in California primarily, although a few other States also may be involved. Testimony received indicated that long delays occurred in the registration process in California and that additional data was required to be submitted over that required by EPA without showing the need or reason for the additional data. The complaints centered on the fact that requirements over and above the FIFRA requirements make it very hard to have a nationwide market when a particular State causes delays thereby causing economic hardships.

It should be noted that in working out a compromise the Committee provided that the State retain its ability to request additional data with respect to any restricted use pesticide or any general use pesticide used for agricultural purposes in the event of special local concerns pertaining to an increased risk of any unreasonable adverse effect on the environment or reduced efficacy of the pesticide within the State. Thus a distinction is drawn between agricultural and nonagricultural products in the case of a special local concern which, it appears, would comprise the bulk of California registrations. It should be pointed out that there is a deep division between various groups on this issue, with the one group advocating no change in current law and the other group supporting this compromise as worked out by committee staff.

It has been my position that we do not need 50 little EPA's and this compromise does not create that much of a burden on EPA and should expedite the process of registration. Additionally, the agricultural producer interests in California feel that changes are required; consequently I have supported this compromise.

Additional minor amendments are included in H.R. 5203, such as extending the authorization authority for funding for 2 years until September 30, 1984, extending the Scientific Advisory Panel authority until September 30, 1987, and providing that members of the panel be appointed to staggered terms of office and insuring that there be multidisciplinary representation on the panel, to include the disciplines of toxicology, pathology, environmental biology, and related sciences.

Further minor amendments include providing protection to workers through the promulgation of regulations, if found necessary, to establish minimum field reentry standards and to develop methods of advising farmworkers of these standards; strengthening the certification and training programs; making changes in the enforcement program; providing that information furnished to foreign governments as to the cancellation or suspension of the registration of a pesticide shall not include trade secrets material; making changes in the unlawful acts and penalty sections; and authorizing EPA to phase out a registration in addition to a cancellation or change.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a rather comprehensive review of H.R. 5203, and I would urge my colleagues to approve this legislation.●

Mr. DE LA GARZA. The able chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. GEORGE BROWN of California, let me say here, though, that I think that Mr. BROWN merits a commendation not only from me as chairman of the committee, but from the whole committee, and certainly the people of the United States concerned with this legislation for the fairness that he has demonstrated throughout the process, the diligence and dedication with which he presided over the subcommittee.

I know that he has problems, or might have problems with several parts of the legislation, but disregarding those, which of course he would have to protect as an individual Member at a later time, he has above and beyond the call of duty been fair to everyone who has come before the committee, from a migrant worker to corporate presidents and everyone in between has been treated with fairness and with respect as they presented their differing or contested views to the subcommittee.

With that, Mr. Chairman, I would yield the balance of the time to Mr. BROWN, the chairman of the subcommittee, to use as he sees fit and to manage the balance of debate on this legislation.

Mr. BROWN of California. I thank the chairman very much.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA) has already given an excellent explanation of the history of the committee's dealing with this admittedly complex piece of legislation, and I would not elaborate on what he has already said. I do very much appreciate his extremely complimentary remarks.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before us today, H.R. 5203, is the product of more than a year of work by the House Agriculture Subcommittee on Department Operations, Research, and Foreign Agriculture. The Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA) has been on a 1-year reauthorization since the last major changes to the act in 1978. Our goal this year was to incorporate needed changes into the act to allow its reauthorization for a 2-year period. I am convinced that the Environmental Protection Agency has adjusted to the changes made in 1978 and will perform its job better without the uncertainties which a yearly reauthorization brings.

The first major area where change was needed was section 3 of FIFRA. This section deals with the registration of pesticides with EPA and, over the last few years, a number of problems have developed which have placed an administrative burden upon the agency and the industry. In the amendments contained in section 3 of H.R. 5203, we have attempted to bring about a greater degree of cooperation within the pesticide industry in the development and sharing of data submitted to EPA in support of a pesticide registration. The language was worked out in close cooperation with EPA, the industry, and various Members of Congress, and has not generated any controversy.

The second major area where change was needed was section 10 of FIFRA, which deals with the protection and disclosure of data submitted to EPA in support of a pesticide registration. The 1978 amendments to FIFRA called for the release of health and safety data, excluding any trade secrets data. After a long round of court cases, the release provision was upheld. However, the industry feared that foreign competitors, many not bound by international patent agreements, could reconstruct a chemical formula based upon information contained in the health and safety data package. Environmental and labor groups wanted the widest possible disclosure of this data. EPA, faced with setting up a program for orderly release, sought guidance on this issue.

Thus began one of the most arduous and complex negotiations on this legislation. The issue was finally settled in a compromise presented to the subcommittee by a group comprised of industry, environmental, labor, and EPA negotiators. As with all compromises, it pleases no one group completely. There are still areas of controversy, upon which we will see some discussion during this debate. However, I am satisfied that we have reached the best compromise possible.

The other major area of controversy centered on section 24(a) of FIFRA, which deals with the role of the States in regulating pesticides. This provision was put into law in 1972 and has served well since then. However, a situation has developed in one State which prompted part of the pesticide industry to complain that there existed a de facto restriction on marketing products in that State due to the State's extensive data requirements. The industry sought changes to Federal law which would deal with that problem.

The subcommittee drafted compromise language to address the problem and then set out to encourage that State to correct the situation on its own. The State responded with numerous regulatory and administrative changes but, unfortunately, the now unnecessary language remains in H.R. 5203, a situation which I hope will be corrected during the consideration of this bill. If anyone requires a more detailed explanation of this situation, I would refer them to the additional views contained in the report which accompanies H.R. 5203.

The State to which I am referring is California, the only State which has set up a comprehensive pesticide regulatory system. Due to the extensive use of pesticides in that State—upward of 20 percent of the national volume is used in California—and due to the large numbers of specialty crops and the variety of climatic conditions present, the State decided to establish a comprehensive pesticide regulatory system in 1972. The system has grown as our knowledge about pesticides has grown, and it is currently funded by the State at a level of $18 million.

In recent years, the State has begun to require additional health and safety data, due to the factors of volume and climate and crop variability just cited. However, this system was understaffed and delays developed in registration. There were also regulatory bottlenecks in the system. This situation prompted the industry to turn to Congress, after it had failed to gain redress in the courts. During the course of the last year, a number of changes have been made. The unnecessary data call-ins have been eliminate and the State now concentrates upon essential health and safety data. They have also established a system where products can be conditionally registered, pending receipt of the requested data.

The State hired 30 new professionals in recent months for their program and their backlog has dropped from 1,000 applications in Janurary of 1980 to its present level of 125. With 135 new applications received per month in California, the reduction in the backlog is to be applauded. Also eliminated was a major conflict with Federal law which caused many applications to be denied. The State has also set up an Office of Administrative Law, a independent body to which regulatory problems can be appealed. Initiated in 1980, this body has not yet been asked by the industry to review the pesticide regulatory system in the State.

But the issue here is not one State, but the rights of all States. The House, in 1971, approved the current language by a vote of 289-90. A challenge to the right of a State to duplicate the Federal registration process was dismissed in Federal court. Now the issue is before Congress again in H.R. 5203.

The language in section 11 of H.R. 5203, which would amend section 24(a) of FIFRA, is strongly opposed by the administration. It is strongly opposed by a number of State organizations, such as the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture, the Council of State Governments, and the Southern Legislators Conference. It is opposed by the AFL-CIO and numerous individual unions. It is opposed by the United Methodist Church, the National Council of La Raza, the March of Dimes, and other community, religious, and public health groups. And it is opposed by nearly every environmental group. When a diverse group such as this opposes an amendment, we should be on our guard.

Section 11 contains two parts: One would allow EPA review of health and safety data requests made by a State and would provide for a Federal veto of some requests. The other part imposes mandatory deadlines upon a State within which it must come to a decision on pesticide applications. Taken together, these two parts of section 11 propose a major Federal intervention in State regulation.

In the first instance, the EPA is placed in the role of arbiter between the States and the regulated industry, a role which will consume needed manpower in order to second-guess the State government's decision. The State may be forced to endure another level of bureaucracy and will lose its right of independent judgment granted in 1972. There are also provisions for judicial review of many of these determinations which would force States into Federal courts to defend their actions.

Now, the proponents of this section point out that a State may still cancel a pesticide if it has a "concern." This is correct—the section 11 language does not deal with the right of a State to cancel a pesticide. The State is just being restricted from obtaining some of the data which it may require in order to make a sound regulatory decision. The logic of this situation escapes me. If a State wants to make a decision in a state of ignorance, that is fine, according to this argument. However, if a State wants the information which it believes is necessary to make the sound regulatory decisions which industry and the public are demanding, then we impose restrictions. The proponents of section 11 are apparently endorsing making regulatory decisions based upon some undocumented "concern," since they seek to restrict access to hard data.

And then, for good measure, the proposed changes to section 24(a) would impose deadlines upon this process, the second part of section 11 which I mentioned above. A State has 60 days to decide registration requests and 120 days to decide new use and new ingredient requests. If the State cannot make a decision to approve or deny the request within these time periods, it must conditionally register the product. This provision will require major new legislative and regulatory changes in every State. Few States have the existing authority to conditionally register pesticides. Many State systems require more than receipt of health and safety data for registration. Existing State requirements such as fee payment, appointment of resident agents or attorneys-in-fact, or submission of labeling, could take longer than the deadlines allow and force States to make arbitrary or capricious decisions. This is what proponents of section 11 have referred to in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD statements as the establishment of an "orderly registration procedure at the State level." There will be order, at least a new order, but at the expense of rationality.

Some of the proponents of section 11 say that this is not Federal preemption and that precedent for these changes exists elsewhere in FIFRA. They cite sections 18, 24(c), and 27 of the act as justification. From the State perspective this is a bit like saying, "Now that we have removed three walls from your house, we would like to take off the roof". Unlike the three other specific actions, the changes contained in section 11 go to the heart of the State programs. These proposed changes would restrict access to health and safety data and impose time restrictions which would affect the entire State program, including the three functions cited above. The States feel that they have given up too much in the past under FIFRA and have drawn the line, steadfastly refusing to accept any changes to section 24(a).

Some of the proponents of section 11 maintain that we are not dealing with only one State. They maintain that other States have "attempted to expand their pesticide programs to exceed or at least duplicate Federal requirements." Attempting to expand and actual expansion are two different situations. Legislation should be based upon fact and not upon probability. During testimony taken over the course of the last year, the subcommittee heard State after State maintain that they had no desire to duplicate the California system or even the Federal system. That no other State has expanded its pest regulation program is testimony to the ability of the groups supporting section 11 to work effectively on the State level, something I encourage them to continue to do. Perhaps striking section 11 will even provide them with the incentive to exhaust the remedies available to them in California.

However, it is certain that States will increase their requests for health and safety data in coming years. Recent tragic events have shown the need for better data of this sort being in the hands of State officials. Groundwater poisonings from pesticide runoff in New York, Wisconsin, Tennessee, Florida, and California are examples of trouble due to unique conditions in various States. States will be faced as well with an increasing burden as the Federal Government seeks to delegate more pesticide authority to the States. State governments should be encouraged to maintain health and safety data on pesticides, not discouraged, I believe that a rational review of sound data is the only way that we can seek to balance the public health needs with the benefits which carefully used pesticides provide.

For these and many other reasons, I feel that section 11 needs to be deleted from H.R. 5203.

There are other sections of this bill which will generate some debate. One major provision is the restoration of language contained in an earlier draft of H.R. 5203, which would have amended section 16 of FIFRA to allow a private right of action to persons aggrieved by the misuse of a pesticide. This provision was struck during full Agriculture committee markup of the bill on a 21-to-20 vote. Having worked hard to craft a fair compromise in H.R. 5203, I was distressed that this provision was struck. I am supporting its being amended onto the bill during House consideration.

The provision is needed to maintain a balance in the legislative proposals. It is also needed to correct a grey area of law which exists presently. With State enforcement of this Federal statute, proper jurisdiction for suits brought because of damages incurred due to pesticide misuse has been hard to determine. The State courts argue that they do not have jurisdiction because it is a Federal statute. The Federal courts tell aggrieved parties that jurisdiction is not spelled out in the act and they are reluctant to accept jurisdiction. this problem exists in other statutes as well, such as the Commodity Futures Trading Act. What we seek to do is correct this problem in FIFRA.

With that description, I would like to commend Chairman DE LA GARZA for his support during this process. It has been long and hard and has tried the nerves of Members and staff alike. I would especially like to applaud the efforts of Mr. WAMPLER, the ranking minority member on both the full Agriculture Committee and the subcommittee. His strength, rationality, and indulgence during the last year have been major factors in the subcommittee's success in bringing this bill forward. I look forward to future legislative initiatives with the strength of these two gentlemen involved.

● Mrs. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, while I am in support of most of the provisions in this bill, H.R. 5203, the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act, I am in opposition to section 11 which seeks to weaken the authority of States to administer their own pesticide programs that are designed to meet the legitimate safety concerns of their local citizens.

Specifically, section 11 of this bill creates an additional level of bureaucratic review by placing the Environmental Protection Agency between the industry and the States for data requests. Under these conditions, the EPA would decide on a case-by-case basis the authority of a State to act under special local conditions.

Because Federal resources are scarce due to EPA budget cutbacks, it would appear that the EPA will not have enough officials to review States' requests, thus, resulting in a backlog of registration applications. Needless to say, section 11 will create a Federal nightmare of bureaucratic redtape, and that is why I have joined with many of my colleagues in their effort to delete this controversial section from the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the State of Maine has benefitted greatly under its registration authority in the existing legislation. In 1980, the State instituted a pesticide review system and a registration process to address the legitimate public concerns about pesticides and inform the public of the State decisions concerning pesticides. In addition, a medical panel was established to review data on those pesticides of particular interest because of their widespread use or because of known medical or environmental problems.

Although this review system is relatively expensive, the process is quick, and insures that the State can collect health and environmental data from pesticide manufacturers whenever the State determines that Federal data is inadequate. I also might add, that because of this successful review system, in every case of major concern to the State of Maine, the State has been able to act more quickly than the Federal Government. It should be understood that we can not be too careful in protecting the health of our citizens, and the quality of our lakes and rivers.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, Maine has used its registration authority responsibly and has exercised sound judgment regarding environmental and health regulations. The authority of States to administer their own pesticides regulations and programs must be maintained. I ask, therefore, that the existing authority be preserved, and that section 11 be deleted from this bill.●

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Chairman, we have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of our time.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WHITE) having assumed the chair, Mr. MILLER of California, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5203) to amend the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act, had come to no resolution thereon.

CONCERNING SUCCESSFUL COMPLETION OF TEST FLIGHT PHASE OF SPACE SHUTTLE PROGRAM

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Science and Technology be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 541) concerning the successful completion of the test flight phase of the Space Shuttle program, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, but I do this to give the chairman of Committee on Science and Technology an opportunity to explain the joint resolution.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, today we pay tribute to the successful completion of the test flight phase of the Space Shuttle, and to the men and women who made it all possible. House Joint Resolution 541 congratulates the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and all persons involved in the success of the test phase of the Space Shuttle program. I am pleased to say that the Senate passed an identical resolution on July 21, 1982.

On July 4, 1982, Astronauts Thomas Mattingly and Henry Hartsfield piloted the orbitor Columbia to her fourth perfect landing. In just four test missions, the Space Shuttle proved itself to be the world's most advanced spacecraft, capable of routinely carrying to and from space a wide variety of scientific, commercial, and military payloads.

Mankind's routine presence in space began on April 14, 1981, when the Columbia made her successful maiden voyage. Piloted by Astronauts John Young and Robert Crippen, Columbia proved herself to be a technological triumph.

Joe Engle and Richard Truly commanded the second Shuttle launch on November 12, 1981, marking the first time a space vehicle was reused after orbital flight. STS-2 also delivered into orbit science and space applications experiments, and the remote manipulator system, developed by our Canadian friends.

STS-3, launched last April and piloted by Jack Lousma and C. Gordon Fullerton, continued the successful testing of the Space Shuttle system, reaffirming it as no less than a technological and engineering marvel.

The Space Shuttle system now becomes operational with flight five. This flight will carry paid-for commercial satellites and is scheduled for launch in November of this year. The designation of the Shuttle system as an operational Space Transportation System signals a new meaning to space and space transportation. The Columbia and the new completed Challenger, and two orbitors now under construction, the Discovery and the Atlantis, will routinely fly to and from space.

The Shuttle will transport a fully equipped scientific laboratory known as the Spacelab which was built by the European Space Agency. Experiments involving special alloys and materials will be performed yielding new products which cannot be produced on Earth.

The Shuttle will also place into orbit satellites which will enable us to learn more about our Earth and our atmosphere. Communications and remote sensing systems will continue to be improved.

Mr. Speaker, in closing let me put this occasion in proper perspective. We are at the genesis of a new era in space exploration. The decisions we make in the next few years will be critical as we begin to forge mankind's future relationship with the space environment.

We are truly at an historic milestone, and today we applaud those who have brought us to this occasion. We congratulate the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, and the brilliant industry team, prime contractor, Rockwell International, and associate contractors, Martin Marietta and Thiokol. Their dedication, along with thousands of Shuttle subcontractors and workers, have enabled this Nation to achieve what men have dreamed of for centuries. Their accomplishments open the space frontier for our future exploration, for the benefit of the people of the United States, and for all mankind.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague from California (Mr. HAWKINS) for introducing this House joint resolution concerning the successful completion of the test flight phase of the Space Shuttle program. As my colleagues know, the test flight phase of the Space Shuttle program included four test flight missions. Those now completed, the Shuttle has been declared operational.

The Space Shuttle is designed to be reusable and to allow routine access to and from space. The system allows great flexibility of use and shows great promise for commercial as well as scientific applications. This includes the important function of placing satellites in orbit which will serve to observe weather, monitor Earth resources, and improve communications.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the space program can contribute greatly not only to our national pride, but to our economy. Jobs creation and technological spinoffs in areas we might not even dream of are results of our space program. The Space Shuttle can be a part of the benefit provided our country of the space program. This is just the beginning and I hope we use the Shuttle's capabilities wisely.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the committee chairman will allow those of us on the minority side to become cosponsors of the joint resolution also.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 541. I want to join with my colleagues in congraulating NASA, the astronauts, and the thousands of workers in the aerospace industry who contributed to the success of the shuttle testing programs. With the conclusion of the fourth test flight of the space transportation system, we are entering into a new era of operational space shuttle missions. We have demonstrated that routine access to and from space is indeed possible.

Further shuttle missions will bring sceintific, commercial, and military payloads to and from space, and will further the technological advances of the United States in a number of areas. We will be able to utilize the unique qualities of the space environment to develop metals, crystals, and pharmaceuticals that cannot be produced on Earth. We will be able to place satellites in orbit which will observe weather, improve communications, monitor crop yields, and enhance our national security.

The vast base of technology from our space program supplies a continuous stream of goods and services which provide immense benefits to mankind. We take for granted our weather forecasting, global telecommunications network, computers, and calculators, without a second thought that these services and products exist because of the space program. As we continue our activities in space, these benefits will continue to multiply.

Once again, I want to congratulate all those involved with the shuttle testing program, and look forward to many successful missions in the years ahead.

Mr. BROWN of California. If the gentleman will yield further, I might point out that we did include the minority Members from California.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 541

Whereas, when the Space Shuttle Columbia returned to Earth with a blazing reentry and a perfect landing on July 4, 1982, at Edwards Air Force Base, California, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration completed successfully the test flight phase of the Space Shuttle program and entered into a new era of operational Space Shuttle missions;

Whereas in four test flight missions the Space Shuttle Columbia, a reusable spaceship designed to provide routine access to and from space for a wide variety of scientific, commercial, and military payloads, lived up to her promise as the world's most advanced spaceship;

Whereas in these four flight missions the Space Shuttle Columbia was lifted from the Earth by a thundering set of rockets, orbited in the vacuum of space like a satellite, served as a laboratory for a variety of scientific experiments, and, finally, landed on the Earth like a conventional airplane;

Whereas the Space Shuttle Columbia, the newly completed Space Shuttle Challenger, and their sister spaceships now under construction, the Space Shuttle Discovery and the Space Shuttle Atlantis, will be able to fly repeatedly to and from space as an operational space transportation system;

Whereas the Space Shuttle orbiters will accommodate an unprecedented variety of payloads, including Spacelab, a fully equipped scientific laboratory provided by the European Space Agency;

Whereas, utilizing the unique qualities of the space environment (including weightlessness and a near perfect vacuum), special alloys, metals, glasses, crystals, and pharmaceuticals, which cannot be produced on Earth, will be produced aboard the Space Shuttle orbiters;

Whereas the Space Shuttle orbiters will be used to place in orbit satellites which will carry out functions such as observing weather, providing improved communications, providing navigational aids, discovering mineral deposits, monitoring crop and timber yields, and assisting in the monitoring of arms control agreements;

Whereas the Space Shuttle orbiters will also be used to place in orbit the world's most powerful space telescope and to launch scientific probes to explore the planets;

Whereas the Space Shuttle program is a national enterprise that requires tens of thousands of skilled workers to design, develop, test, and evaluate the various components of the Space Shuttle system;

Whereas the Space Shuttle program has been judged by independent research organizations to have a positive effect on the national economy by creating jobs and by spurring the development of advanced technologies; and

Whereas the test flight period of the Space Shuttle program has demonstrated the world leadership of the United States in operating a reusable spaceship and is a source of great national pride: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress congratulates the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the members of its astronaut corps, the prime contractor, the associate contractors, the thousands of subcontractors, and the tens of thousands of dedicated workers who contributed to—

(1) the successful completion of the test flight phase of the Space Shuttle program; and

(2) the entry of the United States into a promising new era of space flight for the benefit of the people of the United States and all mankind.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members be permitted to have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

THE QUESTION OF FURTHER AID TO EL SALVADOR

(Mr. MILLER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, over the weekend I had the opportunity and the honor of hearing Mr. William Ford address a dinner in San Francisco of individuals; namely, attorneys and doctors concerned with human rights in El Salvador. Mr. Ford is the brother of Ida Ford, one of the four American churchwomen who were murdered in El Salvador on December 2, 1980.

I make this point, Mr. Speaker, because very shortly we will be considering two questions. One is further aid to the country of El Salvador, under the guise of promoting a land reform program that has basically been repudiated by the new government since the election and, second, the President of the United States, on July 28, will have to certify to this House that in fact El Salvador is moving forward and in compliance with basic human rights as we have come to understand them in this hemisphere. I think if the President does that he will be violating the law of this country because nobody agrees that that in fact is taking place in El Salvador.

More importantly, I think the President and the State Department owe it to the names of these four murdered American citizens to come forth with the data to push on El Salvador to prosecute the guilty parties prior to any consideration by this House of any additional aid to the Government of El Salvador.

I would like to share the letter from Mr. Ford to myself outlining the problems he and other families have had in dealing with the FBI, the CIA, and the State Department and a decent response to their questions about their murdered members of their family.

The letter follows:

UPPER MONTCLAIR, N.J.
June 30, 1982.

Hon. GEORGE MILLER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE MILLER: My sister, Ita Ford, was one of the four American churchwomen murdered in El Salvador on December 2, 1980. The families of these women have been largely ignored or rebuffed when they sought information from U.S. Government agencies about the death of their sisters. Permit me to summarize some of the difficulties faced by the families of the women, in their efforts to learn what happened, and who directed and carried out this terrible crime.

1. Secretary Haig and Ambassador Kirkpatrick have smeared the good names of the women with suggestions that they were political activists supporting the guerillas, and were killed for their actions. As recently as April 20, 1982, Ambassador Enders wrote to Mike Donovan, a brother of one of the murdered women that two of the women were killed upon their return from a meeting in Nicaragua with a Sandinista official. This is not so, and Ambassador Enders knew it was not so when he wrote the letter.

2. For over a year, no real investigation was conducted by the Salvadoran government, our government did nothing to push the Salvadorans, and so evidence has likely been lost and the recollections of witnesses grow faint.

3. For over a year the families have been repeatedly told by State and the F.B.I. that the Salvadorans had assembled and were forwarding to the F.B.I. the fingerprints and weapons of the approximately 85 National Guardsmen on duty the night of the murders. This material has never reached the F.B.I. The families have been given, by the F.B.I. and State, conflicting and confusing stories about the role of the F.B.I. in the investigations. It appears taht the F.B.I. may be troubled by State's political rather than investigatory approach.

4. The F.B.I., C.I.A., State Department and Defense Ingelligence Agency have delayed and evaded responding to requests for information made by the families. In fact, the C.I.A. demanded proof from the families that the women were dead, before it would consider the request. What should our government have to hide about the murders?

5. The State Department and the Salvadorans insist that only the five National Guardsmen now in custody in El Salvador were involved in the murders. There are clear and convincing facts that the crime was ordered by high ranking Salvadoran officials, yet the "investigation" has been conducted to limit the ranks of the accused to low level enlisted personnel.

6. Evidence linking the murders of the women to the same men accused of murdering the two American land reform advisers has not been pursued.

7. The families are not told the current status of the investigation, when and where the trial of the six will take place and what arrangements will be made to have the families represented at the proceeding, as provided by Salvadoran law.

The list of difficulties is longer, but that is a fair sample of the list. The difficulties the families have experienced seem to come from a basic cause: the decision of the United States government to support a government of gangsters in uniforms.

I ask for your help in two ways:

1. Will you help the families to arrange a meeting with the Director of the F.B.I. or his delegate, so the families can learn the facts about the "investigation"?

2. Will you request State, C.I.A., F.B.I. and Defense Intelligence Agency to cooperate with the families' requests for documents relating to the death, and investigation of the deaths, of the four women?

I will give you any specific background information which I have and you want.

Thank you.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM P. FORD.

CONSTITUTIONAL BICENTENNIAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill today to establish a commission to encourage and coordinate the bicentennial of the adoption of our Constitution. Our Constitution is truly a remarkable document. It has served as the fundamental charter of our Nation. It has guided us through two centuries of growth and progress, constantly guided by the basic concept that ours is a nation of laws. It has served to protect our rights as individuals and preserve those essential freedoms which the Founding Fathers were seeking when they came to this country.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important for each American to understand the myriad of rights and responsibilities which our Constitution embodies. In order to encourage this understanding, I believe that the bill which I have introduced today will create an overall program to encourage observances and activities across this Nation to commemorate the historic events associated with the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that Members will join me in supporting this bill.●

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. BROWN of California) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous materials:)

Mr. GONZALEZ, for 15 minutes, today.
Mr. ANNUNZIO, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. COELHO, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. RODINO, for 5 minutes, today.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to revise and extend remarks was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. HANSEN of Utah, and to include extraneous matter:)

Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE in two instances.
Mr. BEREUTER.
Mr. MICHEL in two instances.
Mr. DERWINSKI in 10 instances.
Mr. BETHUNE.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. BROWN of California) and to include extraneous matter:)

Mr. RODINO.
Mr. MINETA.
Mr. ANDERSON in 10 instances.
Mr. GONZALEZ in 10 instances.
Mr. BROWN of California in 10 instances.
Mr. ANNUNZIO in six instances.
Mr. JONES of Tennessee in 10 instances.
Mr. BONER of Tennessee in five instances.
Mr. BARNES in three instances.
Mr. DE LUGO.
Mr. LEHMAN.
Mr. SEIBERLING in 10 instances.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 52 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, July 27, 1982, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

4441. A letter from the Acting Assistant Legal Adviser for Treaty Affairs, Department of State, transmitting copies of international agreements, other than treaties, entered into by the United States, pursuant to U.S.C. 112b(a); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

4442. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report improving the administration of Federal public disaster assistance to reduce costs and increase the effectiveness (GAO/CED-82-98, July 23, 1982); jointly, to the Committees on Government Operations and Public Works and Transportation.

4443. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the new U.S. valuation system for imported products and the effectiveness of its implementation (GAO/GGD-82-80, July 26, 1982); jointly, to the Committees on Government Operations and Ways and Means.

4444. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report concerning the need for the IRS to find out how to best structure its compliance activities (GAO/GGD-82-34, July 23, 1982); jointly, to the Committees on Government Operations and Ways and Means.

4445. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on failure to implement regulations to reduce the cost to the medicare program and its beneficiaries for prolonged rentals of durable medical equipment (GAO/HRD-82-61, July 23, 1982); jointly, to the Committees on Government Operations, Ways and Means, and Energy and Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. ZABLOCKI: Committee on Foreign Affairs. H.R. 5900. A bill to promote economic revitalization and facilitate expansion of economic opportunity in the Caribbean Basin region; with amendments (Rept. No. 97-665, Pt. I). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. ZABLOCKI: Committee on Foreign Affairs. H.R. 6755. A bill to authorize assistance to promote economic revitalization in the Caribbean Basin region; with amendments (Rept. No. 97-666). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. RODINO. Committee on the Judiciary. H.R. 1799. A bill entitled: "The Export Trading Company Act of 1981"; with amendments (Rept. No. 97-637, Pt. II). Ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 5 of rule X and clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ALEXANDER:

H.R. 6858. A bill to amend the Agricultural Act of 1949 to improve the price received by producers for the 1983 crop of rice; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. DE LUGO:

H.R. 6859. A bill to amend or repeal certain provisions of the Organic Acts applicable to the Virgin Islands and Guam, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. LONG of Maryland:

H.R. 6860. A bill to restore the Federal extended unemployment compensation program providing up to 39 weeks of benefits for laid off workers; Jointly, to the Committees on Ways and Means and Education and Labor.

By Mr. RODINO (for himself and Mr. MCCLORY):

H.R. 6861. A bill to establish a commission to encourage, plan, develop, and coordinate the commemoration of the bicentennial of the Constitution; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

ADDITIONAL SPONSORS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, sponsors were added to public bills and resolutions as follows:

H.R. 850: Mr. DREIER.

H.R. 5511: Mr. VENTO, Mr. FISH, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. OTTINGER, Mr. DYMALLY, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. CONYERS, Mr. BRODHEAD, and Mr. TAYLOR.

H.R. 5727: Mr. MURPHY, Mr. MOLLOHAN, Mr. ZEFERETTI, Mr. LEE, Mr. FORD of Michigan, Mr. BEVILL, Mr. ROTH, Mr. YATRON, Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois, Mr. MCEWEN, Mr. WILSON, Mr. FITHIAN, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. MOTTL, and Mr. ECKART.

H.R. 5911: Mr. MCKINNEY.

H.R. 6036: Mr. EVANS of Georgia, Mr. DWYER, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. ADDABBO, Mrs. CHISHOLM, Mrs. SCHNEIDER, and Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania.

H.R. 6154: Mr. RINALDO and Mr. DWYER.

H.R. 6155: Mr. RINALDO and Mr. DWYER.

H.R. 6166: Mr. SHAMANSKY, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. GRAY, Mr. EDGAR, Mr. AUCOIN, Mr. SMITH of New Jersey, Mr. FRANK, Mr. CARNEY, and Mr. HERTEL.

H.R. 6488: Mr. COELHO and Mr. PETRI.

H.R. 6577: Mr. ERLENBORN, Mr. GINGRICH, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. FARY.

H. Con. Res. 342: Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois, Mr. LUKEN, Mr. FAZIO, Mr. MCCLORY, Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. MADIGAN, Mr. MARRIOTT, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. MYERS, Mr. COATS, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. SEIBERLING, Mr. YOUNG of Missouri, Mr. CONYERS, and Mr. DWYER.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII,

535. The Speaker presented a petition of the Board of Trustees, Village of Glencoe, Ill., relative to an immediate bilateral freeze of nuclear weapons; which was referred, jointly, to the Committees on Armed Services and Foreign Affairs.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 6030

By Mr. SYNAR:

REPORT ON THE USE OF LONG-RANGE MANNED BOMBERS

SEC. 902. Not later than March 1, 1983, the Secretary of Defense shall submit to the Committees on Armed Services and on Appropriations of both the Senate and the House of Representatives a report containing an analysis of using long-ranged manned bombers equipped with air-launched antiship missiles to defend vital, strategic shipping lanes (including the United Kingdom, Greenland, Iceland Gap).

SENATE—Monday, July 26, 1982

(Legislative day of Monday, July 12, 1982)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

May we have a moment of silence as we remember the Meese family on this sad day in their lives.

Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come.—Revelation 4: 8

Worthy art Thou, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for Thou didst create all things, and by Thy will they existed and were created.—Revelation 4: 11.

Gracious God and Father, the Founders of our Republic understood this fundamental truth and upon it based their conviction of human equality, human rights, and a government whose purpose was to secure these rights and whose authority was derived from the people. Grant us to see, O God that as we undermine this foundation of our Government, we, sooner or later, jeopardize the superstructure which was built upon it. As we forsake the root of our national uniqueness, we forfeit the fruit.

Help us to comprehend, dear God, that this is one explanation for the futility of out best human efforts today. We are struggling to preserve the benefits of a belief which we no longer hold to be true. We have smashed the foundation and are striving to prevent the superstructure from collapsing.

Forgive the secularism, the antisupernaturalism which we have exchanged for faith in a Creator God which motivated our Founding Fathers. Restore unto us their beliefs that we may recover the riches of the legacy they transmitted to us before it is too late. We pray this in the name of Him who is the Light of the world. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the Senate be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCOTT MEESE

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, it is my sad duty to inform the Senate of the death of Scott Meese, an employee of the Senate Republican Policy Committee.

All of us know his parents of course, and to them we extend our deepest sympathies.

Scott was only 19 and about to enter his sophomore year at Princeton. He had interned in Senator LAXALT's office last summer and was one of the early applicants for this year's intern program at the Policy Committee.

He was put in charge of the seminar program which the committee sponsors for college students in Republican offices, and because of his hard work, it was a most successful endeavor.

But more than anything else, we will remember Scott for the delightful person he was. He was a hard-working, dedicated, bright young man with a superb sense of humor. Many of you have met Scott and will understand how deeply affected those of us who worked with Scott are at the news of this tragedy.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I join with my colleague, Senator TOWER, in expressing my deepest sympathies to the family and friends of Scott Meese.

Scott was a bright and personable young man, at the beginning of a promising adulthood and a limitless future. Those who came to know him in the course of his work at the Policy Committee, came to respect and admire him.

His tragic death at the age of 19 is a tragedy for us all, and I am sure that I speak for the entire Senate, when I say that he will truly be missed.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, last Friday, Scott Meese, the son of Ed and Ursula Meese, was killed in a car accident. Scott was 19. He had just finished his freshman year at Princeton and was working as a summer intern for the Republican Policy Committee. Last summer, Scott worked for me as an intern on my Judiciary Committee staff. All of us who knew Scott deeply mourn his passing and share Ed and Ursula's grief.

This past weekend has been filled with grief for all who knew Scott. And, I suspect we shall grieve for some time to come. Today I should like to remember Scott less somberly, in a way more suited to his personality, to his exuberance. I should like to honor Scott by remembering him as we knew him.

Mr. President, Scott Meese was a great kid, a terrific young man. That really says it all—all the fun, the intelligence, the integrity, the wit, and the energy of Scott Meese.

Scott was comfortable among people of all types and ages. His quick wit and outgoing manner livened up any conversation. His lively personality attracted people; you just liked being around Scott. He would be the target of jokes, and would give it back to the jokester in spades. He was the type of guy you always included, always invited to join a group doing whatever. You could always count on Scott to add something special.

Mr. President, at work Scott Meese was as enthusiastic an intern as I have ever had. The work given to interns is rarely glamorous, but Scott accepted even the most tedious tasks with good cheer. Once when he had to copy almost a whole book, he joked about "slaving over a hot Xerox machine," but he did the job. He was always ready to participate in less work-related activities, playing on our softball team, beating individual staffers in tennis, becoming friends with almost everyone—in short, generally making our lives more fun while enjoying himself.

For those who did not know Scott well, his affability was apparent, but also was his relative maturity. Being the son of a man in high public office put very unique strains on Scott, strains with which a person his age rarely has to deal. Yet, whether at college or working here on the Hill, Scott dealt with those pressures with a grace striking for a person so young.

Mr. President, I know Ed and Ursula Meese were close to Scott, and they were rightly proud of him. He brought joy to their lives as he did to the lives of all his friends. We will miss Scott sorely, but remembering him—savoring those good times with him—must always lift our sadness. We can regret that he did not have the opportunity to fulfill all of his promise for the future, but we cannot really be sad for Scott. Scott took advantage of the time God gave him and lived his life fully, indeed to a degree not shared by many people who live much longer. I hope we all do as well.

To Ed and Ursula Meese, we send our most profound condolences to be sure. But we also have to add a wink and a smile for the happiness we all shared with Scott. He was a wonderful young man, a great credit to his parents. God willing, I look forward to seeing him again.

THE DAY IS DONE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this week's poem, "The Day Is Done," by Phoebe Cary, be printed in the RECORD.

THE DAY IS DONE

The day is done, and darkness
From the wing of night is loosed,
As a feather is wafted downward,
From a chicken going to roost.

I see the lights of the baker,
Gleam through the rain and mist,
And a feeling of sadness comes o'er me,
That I cannot well resist.

A feeling of sadness and longing
That is not like being sick,
And resembles sorrow only
As a brickbat resembles a brick.

Come, get for me some supper,—
A good and regular meal—
That shall soothe this restless feeling,
And banish the pain I feel.

Not from the pastry bakers,
Not from the shops for cake;
I wouldn't give a farthing
For all that they can make.

For, like the soup at dinner,
Such things would but suggest
Some dishes more substantial,
And to-night I want the best.

Go to some honest butcher,
Whose beef is fresh and nice,
As any they have in the city
And get a liberal slice.

Such things through days of labor,
And nights devoid of ease,
For sad and desperate feelings,
Are wonderful remedies.

They have an astonishing power
To aid and reinforce,
And come like the "finally, brethren,"
That follows a long discourse.

Then get me a tender sirloin
From off the bench or hook,
And lend to its sterling goodness
The science of the cook.

And the night shall be filled with comfort,
And the cares with which it begun
Shall fold up their blankets like Indians,
And silently cut and run.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to advise Members that I have consulted with the minority leader and apprised him of the schedule as I see it for the balance of the session before the Labor Day recess.

I had previously indicated to him that it is my feeling that if we could complete action on the balanced budget amendment, which is now pending, and four other items—specifically, the second reconciliation bill which is due to be available, I believe, on Thursday of this week; the urgent supplemental appropriations bill relating to pay and allowances, which is not here but which is anticipated to be received by the Senate soon from the House of Representatives; the immigration reform bill, which is on the calendar and which we have attempted to schedule once or twice before; and the second debt limit, which will include the debate on matters such as abortion and perhaps prayer in public schools—if we complete action on those—four items in addition to the balanced budget amendment, it will be my intention to ask the Senate to recess on August 20 instead of the 27th of August, which would make our break for the Labor Day period coincide with that of the House of Representatives.

In order to meet that schedule, however, Mr. President, it is necessary, in my judgment, to notify the Senate that we may be in session late on any weekday, not just on Thursdays, as is regularly the case. Therefore, I advise the minority leader and other Senators that, from this day forward, they should not be surprised if it is necessary to have a late evening beyond the usual 6 or 6:30 recess or adjournment hour in order to give us a fair shot at completing action on these several measures.

I must also say, Mr. President, there is some possibility of a Saturday session during that period if we get in a bind and if we have to have that extra time in order to transact the business that I have just described. I assure Members that it is not my intention to regularly schedule Saturday sessions, but rather, to do so only in the event that it is absolutely necessary in order to accomplish this agenda of legislation and other matters which may come before the Senate that require immediate and urgent attention.

To repeat, Mr. President, I have advised the minority leader and I state now for all Senators that, in addition to the balanced budget amendment which is now pending, if we can finish the second reconciliation bill, the new urgent supplemental appropriations bill which we expect to receive shortly, the immigration reform bill, and the debt limit, it will be my intention to ask the Senate to recess on August 20 instead of August 27.

If we do not complete those items, we shall have to take all or such parts of the following week as may be necessary in order to do so.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, this seems to me to be a very reasonable schedule. I ask the majority leader when he anticipates the action on the debt limit bill. I doubt he is in a position to answer that at this time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I expect the debt limit bill will be reported by the Committee on Finance within the next few days. I anticipate, however, that we probably must do reconciliation and the supplemental before we do debt limit, since they are both very urgent in nature. I would not be surprised to see us do immigration before the debt limit as well. So it may be that debt limit will be the last several days before we go out, which I hope will be on August 20.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I hope the Senate can attain the schedule set out by the majority leader. It is my understanding that the other body will go out also around the 20th of August. I hope this body can complete its work in time to go out at the same time the other body goes out for the Labor Day recess.

I appreciate the courtesy the distinguished majority leader has shown to all Members in stating at this early date his intentions with respect to the program. I think it gives us all an opportunity to schedule our own personal matters accordingly. I hope that, while we may not be in agreement on every facet of the subject matter of the legislation that comes up, we can work together in facilitating the overall program that the majority leader has laid out.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am most grateful to the minority leader. I look forward to that, as he always does cooperate in matters of schedule. I am reasonably optimistic that we can do these things and complete action on them by August 20.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to Mr. PROXMIRE 3 minutes from my time.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I thank the Democratic leader.

LET US DO ALL WE CAN TO STOP THE SPREAD OF NUCLEAR ARMS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on July 19, the Christian Science Monitor carried an article by Prof. Richard Wilson, the chairman of the physics department at Harvard University urging our government to pursue a consistent policy of resisting the terrible threat of nuclear proliferation, Wilson concludes that we should consider the possibility of selling nuclear reactors only to those nations that have signed the nonproliferation treaty of 1978 or agree to full scope safeguards in their countries. He suggests that to those countries which have signed the treaty, nuclear materials may be sold for civilian purposes in the spirit of the nonproliferation treaty, but sold for a purpose, to wit, to discourage them from acquiring facilities which could be used secretly for bomb-making.

As more nations acquire the ability to conduct nuclear war the prospects of our children or grandchildren living out their lives diminish. This Government has no more important, no more vital responsibility than to do all we can to stop the spread of the capacity to make nuclear war.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article entitled "Nuclear Sales to China?" be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, July 19, 1982]

NUCLEAR SALES TO CHINA?

(By Richard Wilson)

The report that the United States is considering the sale of nuclear reactors to China raises once again the question of consistency in the U.S. policy of attempting to prevent proliferation of nuclear weapons.

At first glance, the proposal will not add to the number of nuclear weapons in the world, nor to the number of nations possessing them. The sale of reactors, and any nuclear fuel, would be accompanied by guarantees that such reactors and fuel would not be used for making bombs.

This is a believable guarantee, because China has demonstrated that it has other reactors, and other uranium which will make bomb-grade fissionable material much more easily. But, as we follow the logic carefully, there are traps down this road.

Four years ago the U.S. Congress was in considerable turmoil about selling nuclear fuel to supply the Tarapur reactors in India. India made the same guarantees as China and is happy to repeat them and in addition allow limited international inspection to be sure that the guarantees are kept. Again, the guarantees are believable. India has indeed exploded a nuclear device, but has not used fuel from Tarapur for that purpose. India has four heavy-water reactors, two at Rajastan (one supplied by Canada) and two more nearly complete at Kalapakkum, which have on-line fuel changing facilities and are better suited for the "short burn" necessary to produce bomb-grade plutonium.

Yet the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) of 1978 forces us to break our agreement with India to provide fuel for Tarapur. Three distinct reasons have been advanced for breaking the agreement. First, we are upset that the India of Gandhi and Nehru exploded a nuclear device and is no longer a symbol of peace; second, we are upset that India hoodwinked Canada and, while obeying the letter of an agreement not to use Canadian fuel for bombmaking, broke the spirit by substituting its own fuel in the Canadian-supplied Rajastan I reactor; and third, we want to send signals to Pakistan that we disapprove of India's bombmaking.

We are willing to use civilian nuclear power and a country's need for energy to exert pressure on that country to desist from its military programs. This pressure can be exerted until a country has a well-developed manufacturing capability of its own for nuclear power plants.

The same principle is likely to arise in Israel. At the time of President Mitterrand's visit in March, it was announced that the Guy Mollet committee set up in the 1960s on nuclear cooperation between India and France, was being reactivated, and that one of the topics for discussion is the sale of nuclear reactors to Israel. Presumably, American reactor manufacturers will want to be allowed to compete for this business. Yet Israel has not signed the NPT, has rejected all international inspection, and probably has atomic bombs waiting to be assembled. Even if China agrees to inspection of the particular reactors, the situation is not the same as for India—in India we broke an agreement and in China and Israel there are no agreements to break.

It is, unfortunately, cheaper to make a bomb than to make a large nuclear power reactor. Suppose, therefore, we agree to sell reactors freely to all countries that have made bombs and make trouble for other, less-developed countries. Do we not invite others who merely want reactors to make bombs first? Is it more sensible to sell reactors to a country, such as South Africa or Israel, which has not signed NPT and only accepted limited inspection, and to worry (as the American public worried in June 1981) about selling reactors to a country, such as Iraq, which has accepted all inspections the international community requested?

These are important questions, and other political considerations must clearly be involved. But in general, these political considerations should be used to extend our caution rather than to relax it.

Priority should be given to supporting international treaties such as NPT. The sale of one or two reactors to China, or to Israel, will not bail out the US nuclear reactor industry; nor will it solve, by itself, the energy problems of these countries.

In the absence of such overriding political considerations, US policy should try to be consistent; one consistent possibility is to sell nuclear reactors and nuclear fuel only to nations that have signed NPT or agree to full-scope safeguards on all nuclear facilities in their countries. To those countries which have signed NPT nuclear materials may be sold for civilian purposes in the spirit of NPT to encourage their economies but to discourage them from acquiring facilities which could be used secretly for bombmaking.

WISCONSIN'S FORT McCOY WINS NATIONAL ENERGY CONSERVATION AWARD

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, one of the newest and most important categories by which military organizations are evaluated is the Energy Conservation Award. This award gives recognition for the soundness of a unit's overall energy program as well as the overall energy conservation achievements of the unit.

The Secretary of the Army has just announced that Fort McCoy, Wis., has received the Army Energy Conservation Award for fiscal year 1981 in the Reserves category. Futhermore, Mr. President, the winners of all services' Reserve awards were judged on a Defense Department-wide basis. Fort McCoy also won that honor.

The Wisconsin National Guard also demonstrated its prowess in the energy conservation area. They were not able to give Wisconsin a clean sweep in Army energy conservation honors among nonactive duty elements. But they were selected as first runnerup for this competition for Guard units.

Wisconsin has a long history of civic responsibility and that includes the full participation of the military units within our State borders. We are particularly proud of the contribution of the National Guard and Reserves in Wisconsin and this award for energy conservation is just another in a long list of reasons why.

DISMAL U.S. RECORD IN RATIFYING U.N. HUMAN RIGHTS TREATIES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the protection of human rights on an international level has been clearly mandated by the U.N. Charter. Articles 55 and 56 of this charter require a U.N. member to promote human rights and to take joint affirmative action on human rights issues. Furthermore, article 1 states that one of the principles of the U.N. is to "encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion." Despite the U.N. Charter's efforts to protect individual human rights and the U.S. endorsement of that charter, our record in participating in U.N. international human rights agreements is appalling.

Traditionally, the Congress and the Executive have emphasized the obligations of the United States to protect and promote human rights through the establishment of international agreements. And our domestic system of government has vigorously protected the fundamental rights of its citizens better than that of any other country. Despite this rhetoric and our domestic efforts to protect individual rights, the United States has only ratified a small number of international human rights agreements. The United States has ratified five U.N. human rights treaties and five OAS treaties, none of which is considered a major international human rights treaties. The United States has not ratified over 30 human rights treaties in which it was invited to participate. The Genocide Convention is among those treaties that the United States has not ratified.

I ask unanimous consent that a table listing international human rights conventions and U.S. action on their ratification be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. PROXMIRE. The table was compiled by the Congressional Research Service and illustrates that, while we would like to think of ourselves as human rights advocates, our record shows that we have not translated our thoughts into action. We proclaim our Nation as a leader in the international human rights field, yet we have not signed half of the U.N. international human rights treaties and agreements that we have been asked to sign. Particularly tragic is the fact that we have not signed the Genocide Convention which would simply make it a crime to destroy in whole or in a part a national, ethnical, racial, or religious group. It is necessary, Mr. President, if the United States is to maintain any credibility in the world with respect to human rights, that we seriously consider the Genocide Convention along with other human rights treaties, and in the near future, give our advice and consent for ratification.

EXHIBIT 1

The following table lists international human rights conventions and U.S. action on their ratification:

Convention	U.S. action
United Nations conventions:
International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.	Signed, submitted to Senate.
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights	Do.
Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.	None.
International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.	Signed, submitted to Senate.
International Convention on Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid.	None.
Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Genocide.	Signed, pending before the Senate.
Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity.	None.
Slavery Convention (League of Nations)	Acceded.
Protocol Amending the Slavery Convention Signed at Geneva on 25 September 1926.	Ratified.
Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery.	Acceded.
Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others.	None.
Convention on the Nationality of Married Women	Do.
Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness	Do.
Convention Relating to the Status of Stateless Persons.	Do.
Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees	Do.
Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees	Acceded.
Convention on Consent to Marriage, Minimum Age for Marriage and Registration of Marriages.	Signed, but not submitted to Senate.
Convention on the International Right of Correction	None.
Convention on the Political Rights of Women	Acceded.
Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women.	Signed, submitted to Senate.
International labor organization conventions:
Convention Concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize.	Pending in U.S. Senate.
Convention Concerning Abolition of Forced Labor	Do.
Convention Concerning Employment Policy	Do.
Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention.	None.
Equal Remuneration Convention	Do.
Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention.	Do.
United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) conventions:
Convention against Discrimination in Education	Do.
Protocol Instituting a Conciliation and Good Offices Commission to be Responsible for Seeking a Settlement of any Dispute which May Arise between States Parties to the Convention against Discrimination in Education.	Do.
Inter-American conventions:
Convention Establishing the Status of Naturalized Citizens Who Again Take up their Residence in the Country of their Origin.	Ratified.
Convention between the American Republics Regarding the Status of Aliens in their Respective Territories.	Ratified with the exception of articles 3 and 4.
Convention on the Nationality of Women	Ratified.
Convention on Extradition	Ratified, subject to reservations.
Inter-American Convention on the Granting of Political Rights to Women.	None.
Convention on Asylum	None.
Convention Relative to the Rights of Aliens	Do.
Convention on Nationality	Do.
Convention on Political Asylum	Do.
Inter-American Convention on the Granting of Civil Rights to Women.	Do.
Convention on Diplomatic Asylum	Do.
Convention on Territorial Asylum	Do.
American Convention on Human Rights	Signed, submitted to Senate.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, once again I thank the distinguished Democratic leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR HEINZ

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time under the standing order to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Texas for yielding his time to me for this colloquy, the subject of which is the American steel industry.

S. 2770-S. 2771—TO PROVIDE IMPORT RELIEF FOR THE SPECIALTY STEEL INDUSTRY

THE AMERICAN STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I might say at the outset that the colloquy that I and other members of the Steel Caucus will be participating in this morning and during the course of the day, comes at a most propitious time. We all read that the administration late last week rejected the offer made by the European Community to settle the steel cases, and had told Europeans to come back with a substantially improved offer.

It is highly likely that some kind of an offer will be forthcoming between now and August 24, the date on which the investigation of the duty petitions filed many months ago becomes a concluded investigation, and at which time countervailing duties will be assessed in full on all items on which injury has been found. Indeed, this is a very long and significant list.

So, Mr. President, it is an extremely timely occasion that my colleagues and I rise to address the Senate on this issue. It is also timely, Mr. President, because the American steel industry is in the midst of its most serious crisis in the postwar era.

Capacity utilization is currently hovering around 40 percent. Over 115,000 steelworkers are laid off with an additional 26,000 on short weeks. Imports have been steadily increasing to the point where they now account for over 40 percent of the U.S. market. By any standard of measurement, this is an industry in real difficulty.

Yet, at the same time, the steel industry is fundamental to the American economy. It supplies virtually every sector, from automobiles, construction, railroads, shipbuilding, aerospace, defense, oil and gas, agriculture, industrial machinery and equipment, the appliances, utensils and beverage containers. The fortunes of this industry—good or ill—will have a major impact on the rest of the economy.

Obviously, the steel industry's problems are many, not the least of which is the current state of the economy which has recently depressed steel demand. Current projections are for 1982 shipments to be below 80 million tons, compared to a 1981 level of 87 million tons, and a 1979 peak of 100 million tons. The extreme depression in construction and automobiles—both sectors responsive to high interest rates—has been a most important factor.

Equally clearly, given the multiple problems, there are multiple remedies. One such, the so-called steel stretchout legislation, was enacted last year. It enables companies to extend the compliance deadline in the Clean Air Act under certain conditions to give them more time to invest in and install the needed pollution control equipment.

Similarly, last year the Congress passed major tax legislation that should assist significantly in aiding capital formation in the industry.

But the purpose a number of us have in speaking today, Mr. President, is to discuss trade; for it is the major component of the current crisis and may prove to be the factor most difficult to control, inasmuch as it is not totally a domestic issue.

Trade is also not a new problem. Steel import restraints have been proposed in one form or another since the 1960's. The trigger price mechanism was in effect from 1978 to 1980 and then again in 1981. Although these programs achieved some short-term results, mostly in terms of improving price levels, none of them provided long-term solutions to the growing problems of global overcapacity and the failure of noncompetitive steel industries to adjust.

The latter problem has become more and more a factor in the difficulties of the past several years. While we have continued to practice the ethic of the free market system, the Europeans, quite plainly, have not. Subsidies and dumping have increased as European governments attempt to stay in power and forestall social unrest and unemployment by maintaining steel jobs and production at any cost. Hence the tremendous Government subsidies.

In the beginning those were social policy decisions any government is entitled to make for itself. However, it has become apparent in the past few years that maintaining steel production through subsidies require substantial exporting in order to unload the excess supply. The chief victim of that export has been the United States, meaning that the European steel process has been at our expense. And that, Mr. President, is unacceptable.

It is all well and good for European Community governments to say their steel industry is in bad shape—which it is; or to argue they need time for adjustment—which they do. But their adjustment plans have consistently been behind schedule thanks to foot-dragging be member nation governments, while exports here have increased. I have no intention of explaining to the steelworker in Pittsburgh or Youngstown or Gary or East Chicago that has to give up his job in order to help his Belgian, French, or Italian colleague keep his. My responsibility, the responsibility of the Senate, the resonsibility of the administration, is to our own people—to take those actions which will be good for them both in the long term and in the short term.

That responsibility does not preclude compromise, and it does not preclude a recognition that steel is a global industry where multilateral solutions may be necessary and appropriate. In fact, I think there is much to be said for an international steel agreement which would include limits on financing new capacity in third countries, guidelines on adjustment, and, if necessary, global import restraints. But progress in that direction must begin with a recognition of where the problems are and whose responsibility it is to begin fixing them. And, as I said in this Chamber last Thursday, the responsibility in this case—both legal and economic—is clear.

European steel subsidies violate both U.S. law and international agreements which the European Community member nations have signed. We went through 5 years of negotiations to produce those agreements. On our part we made significant, substantive, concessions, like the abolition of the American selling price, the wine-gallon-proof-gallon system, and the acceptance of an injury test in subsidy cases. What we seem to have received in return was a lot of promises. Promises to adhere to the discipline of the codes that had been negotiated. Promises to reduce or eliminate subsidies, dumping, and other unfair trade practices. Promises to open up Government procurement.

We accepted all those promises, Mr. President, because they contained the hope of greater discipline over unfair trade practices and the hope of more markets for American products. And we accepted them because we believe in a free market system that functions according to prescribed rules that all parties adhere to. Promoting those rules has been the essence of our trade policy ever since, and I for one believe that should continue to be our policy.

But I must say, Mr. President, that in the intervening years since 1979 when we finished negotiating the Tokyo round and enacted the Trade Agreements Act of that year, I have heard a lot from the people in this country injured by the concessions we made in the Tokyo round and very little from anyone who has gained by those agreements. And now, the system we sought to establish at that time faces its most serious test. Simply put, the European Community and its member states do not want to accept the responsibilities they agreed to undertake in 1979. They do not want the rules enforced. They do not want to make the hard economic decisions about their own steel industry that the market requires them to make.

They would rather export their unemployment to the United States. They are screaming very loud about our efforts to hold them not only to their word, but to the letter and spirit of international law. Mr. President, despite the screams, despite the alleged serious consequences to trade relations, this is a test we must meet, because both our own industry and the international trading system, one based on the concept of free and fair trade, are at stake.

I need say no more about the desperate situation in our steel industry. Those of us with steel facilities in our State see it every time we return home. Not to defend our own industry, particularly when it is consistent with our own law and with our international obligations to do so, is to turn an already serious situation into a major disaster. It is also to abandon the people who elected us.

There is an issue here beyond the survival of the American steel industry, Mr. President. That is the survival of a fair and equitable trading system based on mutually acceptable rules of the game. Some people in this country bemoan the revival of the days of the Smoot-Hawley tariff or a return to the "begger-thy-neighbor" policies of years ago every time anyone in Congress starts to talk about imports being a problem.

Mr. President, no one, including me—most specifically me—wants to return to that era of depression, but to avoid it, we must understand the reason for it. That reason, in my judgment, was the failure at that time to develop an international trading system based on free market principles, based on the theory of comparative advantage, based on universally accepted rules for participation in that system.

Mr. President, this country was a great leader during and after World War II. In 1943, our leaders of the free world went to Bretton Woods, N.H., and at Bretton Woods, we developed a system with exactly those goals in mind that I just mentioned. At Bretton Woods, we developed that system and we have maintained it ever since, at least up to now. Now we face problems more intractable, a world more complex, and power more diffused than ever before. The old solutions seem to be losing their attractiveness in favor of even older solutions, a return to the mercantilist policies of the past.

Mr. President, that is what is at stake in this controversy. Not just our steel industry, and not just the European steel industry, important though they both are. It is the survival of a free world trading system that is the issue, because it cannot survive unless nations are willing to accept their responsibilities and end their subsidies.

That is precisely what our administration has sought to accomplish thus far, and it is precisely what it should continue to do. I am sure that the other 45 members of the Senate Steel Caucus join me in applauding the efforts of Secretary of Commerce Baldrige and Under Secretary Olmer to enforce the law. They are not being too tough. They are fairly and vigorously enforcing the laws we wrote tin 1979, laws which are entirely consistent with the GATT and the various codes negotiated during the Tokyo Round—most specifically, the subsidies code and the antidumping code. Beyond that, they have been more than open in their desire to reach a fair and equitable settlement of this matter with the Europeans, one which meets the requirements of our laws. I know we all want them to continue on this same course. I particularly note the Secretary's decision last Thursday, as I stated at the outset, to reject the latest European offer, which was, I understand, a proposal by the four worst offenders to reduce their imports 10 percent below last year's levels, and a promise by the other producers not to fill that gap. Given the 30-percent increase in imports from the European Community during that period, it is easy to see that the offer did not even begin to meet the standards of fully eliminating the injury suffered and being better for the domestic industry than a continuation of the investigation—standards, I might add, Mr. President, which we painstakingly, after weeks and months of negotiation with then USTC Bob Strauss, wrote into the law in 1979. I was deeply involved in the drafting of that section among others. I remember well how the then administration wanted carte blanche to settle almost any case almost any way they wanted. I opposed that kind of settlement authority.

Indeed, I must say I was skeptical about any kind of settlement authority, but I ultimately agreed to one which is narrowly circumscribed in the law today, one which contains a number of guarantees that the domestic industry will have its injury fully offset. I do believe the Department of Commerce is to be commended for thus far fully adhering to the letter and spirit of the law in that respect.

Parenthetically, Mr. President, I note that there is one area of the law where I believe the Department has erred. This is its refusal to make a judgment on the presense of critical circumstances prior to its preliminary findings of dumping or subsidy. The law is quite clear on this point. The legislative history, I think is particularly obvious. But the Department has apparently chosen to interpret it differently, wrongly; I think, because of that, injuriously to the steel industry. But overall, the record is good thus far.

Despite this overall good record thus far, recent news reports have caused some concern to me and other members of the Steel Caucus. These reports indicate that the Europeans think Secretary Baldrige may be "too tough," and they are reportedly increasing pressure on the administration to settle these cases on terms unfavorable and unacceptable to the domestic industry. Thus far, that has not happened, but it is worth noting at this point how committed those of us in the caucus are to an equitable, acceptable solution and how important it is that our Government maintain the strong stand in support of the MTN agreements that it has thus far taken.

Mr. President, I state this not only to send a message to the European Community, but also to make it clear to others in our own Government that we in Congress hold very strong views on this matter. We in Congress wrote this law. We in Congress made it tough on purpose—precisely to prevent the kind of devastating unfair trade practices and actions that we are experiencing right now in steel.

Today it is steel, tomorrow, it may be some other product, it may be some other set of States, it may be some other industries.

I say, Mr. President, that it is terribly important that the law continue to work now against those kinds of unfair trade actions.

So far the law is working to stop that action. It is absolutely essential that we let it continue to work and not seek some expedient end to the matter that might make for short-term peace at the bargaining table but will produce long-term chaos in the international trading system.

At the same time, Mr. President, the Caucus in holding open the possibility that additional legislative action might be necessary. The House Steel Caucus has already introduced comprehensive quota legislation, covering both carbon and specialty steel products. I am not proposing that at this point. The domestic industry has chosen to take its chances with existing law, since the offending practices are so clearly in violation of it. Should that law not be vigorously enforced, however, the industry, and the Congress, retain the option of producing a legislative remedy that will succeed where the administration might choose to fail.

The area of specialty steel, however, is something of a different matter. The pending trade cases which have produced the frantic negotiations in recent days do not generally include specialty products. This is not to say that industry is not experiencing the same problem. They are. Indeed, a section 301 petition has been filed covering a broad range of specialty products against four major European producers and one other country. In addition, the specialty industry has filed a number of antidumping and countervailing duty cases against various producers on several different products. Those cases are also making their way through the administrative process, and the industry has won each of the rounds that have been fought thus far.

Nonetheless, I remain concerned that, even with the successful conclusion of these cases, the specialty steel industry will not receive the full measure of relief to which it is entitled by law. Unfair trade practice cases are expensive to file and to pursue. This is a small industry, compared to the carbon steel industry, and it has been difficult for them to marshall the resources necessary to seek redress in all the cases where it is warranted. They cannot afford to hire hundreds of lawyers as some of the big steel companies can. They cannot afford to hire the batteries of Washington lobbyists and consultants to expedite the handling down here that some of the big steel companies can. These specialty steel companies are smaller companies. I might add that there is for them the danger that a negotiated settlement in carbon steel might not also include specialty steel products, thereby creating some incentive on the part of the Europeans to shift production in the direction of those product categories not covered by any agreement. Finally, the critical importance of specialty steel to our defense and aerospace industries makes it absolutely essential we retain a viable domestic industry fully equipped to meet our national security needs.

For those reasons, Mr. President, I am today introducing two bills intended to provide full protection from unfair imports of specialty steel. The first is straightforward quota legislation. It directs the President to establish quotas in each of six major specialty steel categories—plate, bar, rod, sheet and strip, alloy tool steel, and pipe and tube—based on the market penetration of imports during the 1978–80 period. In my judgment this is the most recent representative period prior to a renewed onslaught of subsidized imports, and as observers will note, even so, the levels of U.S. market share allocated to imports are quite high in a number of the product categories—nearly 36 percent for rod and 44.5 percent for pipe and tube, for example. In addition to these aggragate levels, the President is given authority to allocate market share among the various foreign suppliers. The bill makes no attempt to make that judgment on a country by country basis. This is a matter better left to the Executive. Finally, the bill calls for updating the quotas every 6 months based on actual sales over the same period the preceding year.

The second bill approaches the same problem through the use of the expertise of the International Trade Commission. The bill states that Congress finds the specialty steel industry has been injured by imports according to the same criteria provided in the so-called escape clause mechanism—sections 201–203 of the Trade Act of 1974, which, incidentally, is the act under which the industry received relief in 1976. In other words, section 1 of the bill substitutes the judgment of Congress for that of the ITC with respect to a finding of injury. Section 2 of the bill then directs the Commission to develop an appropriate remedy pursuant to section 201(d)(1)(A) of the Trade Act of 1974. Generally speaking such remedy would be a quota or a tariff. Following the presentation of the Commission's remedy to the President, the President is directed to implement it without change. The main difference between this bill and the first bill is that the second one substitutes the judgment of the Commission for that of Congress in determining the extent of relief that is appropriate in this case. The Commission has ample experience in such task and is well acquainted with this particular industry through past investigations under a number of different provisions of the law.

It is my hope, Mr. President, that one or the other of these bills will be enacted into law soon in order to stem the tide of unfairly traded imports into this country. At a later point, should circumstances warrant, I will be prepared to introduce broader legislation covering other parts of the steel industry as well. For the time being, however, I plan to pursue these proposals for specialty steel as well as encourage the efforts of all caucus members in supporting the strong position the administration has taken thus far in steel matters and in urging them to continue to hold firm against this attack on the GATT system.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of both bills be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2770

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

This Act may be cited as the "Specialty Steel Fair Trade Act of 1982."

SEC. 2. ESTABLISHMENT OF QUANTITATIVE LIMITATIONS

(a) Effective fifteen days following the date of enactment of this Act, quantitative limitations on imports of stainless steel and alloy tool steel are established. These limitations are to be calculated as detailed in subsections (b), (c), (d) and (e) of this section.

(b) On the first day of October each year beginning October 1, 1982, the Secretary of Commerce will announce quantitative limitations for the six months commencing on the first day of January of the following year. On the first day of April each year, the Secretary of Commerce will announce quantitative limitations for the six months commencing on the first day of July of that year.

(c) For the period of time between the date of enactment and January 1, 1983, the Secretary shall, within 15 days following the date of enactment, announce quantitative limitations determined by taking the applicable product lines under subparagraph (e) of imports of the applicable product lines under subparagraph (e) for the first six months of 1982 and multiplying that number by the number obtained by dividing the number of months remaining in 1982 by six.

(d) The quantitative limitations for each six months period announced by the Secretary of Commerce shall be determined by taking the percentage indicated in subsection (e) of total apparent domestic consumption of each product category for the six month period beginning one year earlier than the date the new limitation takes effect.

(e) The following percentages shall be used to calculate quantitative limitations:

Product and applicable import percentage share of domestic markets:

SEC. 3. ALLOCATION OF QUANTITATIVE LIMITATIONS

The President may, after consultation with all nations having an interest in supplying stainless steel or alloy tool steel products to the United States, negotiate multilateral or bilateral agreements establishing for periods beginning on or after the date of enactment of this Act, quantitative limitations on United States imports of such products from such countries, within the total quantitative limitations set forth in section (1).

SEC. 4. ADMINISTRATION OF QUANTITATIVE LIMITATIONS

(a) Import limitations established under this Act shall be administered by the Secretary of Commerce. The Secretary may issue such regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of this section.

(b) Whenever the Secretary of Commerce determines it to be necessary to avoid disruption of regional markets, he shall provide by regulation that the proportionate share of total imports and imports in any category from any nation entering through any port of entry in or near such regional markets shall not exceed the proportionate share of such imports entering through such port during the preceding three calendar years. The Secretary shall conduct the review required to make such a determination at least annually.

(c) Six months before the expiration of five years after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Commerce shall submit a report to the Congress as to the effects of the imports limitations established under this Act on (1) the economic soundness of the specialty steel industry and the employment opportunities in such industry, (2) the general economy, (3) the U.S. balance of payments, and (4) the national security, together with his recommendations as to whether such import limitations should be continued, modified, or revoked. Before making such report, the Secretary shall conduct a hearing at which all interested parties shall have an opportunity to be heard.

SEC. 5. TERMINATION

The provisions of this Act shall continue in effect until Congress acts on the recommendation of the Secretary of Commerce to modify or revoke the import limitations, as set out in section (3)(c). In no event shall the import limitations established in section (a) terminate in less than five years from the date of enactment of this Act.

S. 2771

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. The Congress determines, in lieu of the International Trade Commission, that imports of specialty steel products listed in Schedule I are being imported into the United States in such increased quantities as to be a substantial cause of injury to the domestic industry producing articles like or directly competitive with the imported articles, consistent with section 201(b)(1) of the Trade Act of 1974.

SEC. 2. (a) The International Trade Commission shall report the finding in section 1 to the President along with the Commission's recommendation for import relief pursuant to section 201(d)(1)(A) of the Trade Act of 1974.

(b) The President shall promptly implement the recommendation of the International Trade Commission without change and without regard to the procedures of section 202 of the Trade Act of 1974.

THE AMERICAN STEEL INDUSTRY SUFFERS SERIOUS INJURY THROUGH FOREIGN IMPORTS AND WEAKENED ECONOMY

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, a few weeks ago, speaking from my desk, I told Members of the U.S. Senate, and through correspondence which followed and such media comment as took place, that there were more employees working today in just one, just one, fast-food company—McDonald's—than were working at that time in all the steel plants of the United States of America; some 400,000 in McDonald's and a much lesser number now in steel. Steel workers who have lost their jobs now number 110,000.

I did not do that as a gesture or a play on words. I was attempting, and hopefully in a proper manner, to give to the American people the distressing picture of the steel industry in the United States of America.

Earlier today, the present chairman of our Senate steel caucus, Senator HEINZ, addressed our Members on the conditions, the tragic economic conditions, which exist in the steel industry of this country.

Again, I join with concerned colleagues who are vitally interested in steel issues. I urge our administration to maintain a strong position in support of, first of all, our domestic steel industry, so vital to our overall economy, and to reject any settlement of the steel trade cases which will further bring injury to American steel companies and American steelworkers.

Mr. President, I stress anew that the tragedy in the steel industry continues to worsen. I wish from that time, when I spoke several weeks ago, until now, that there had been an improvement, but the tragic condition worsens.

And regretfully, I must say, apparently our economy worsens on a broad spectrum.

Last year, the steel plants of America were operating at 70 percent of capacity. Earlier this year, in April, they were operating at 50 percent of capacity.

What is the operating capacity of the domestic steel industry as I speak today? A shocking 40 percent. Steel production this year, we believe will be the lowest since 21 years ago, in 1961.

What is the seriousness of this plight of which I speak, of heavy and heavier unemployment in the steel industry? Mr. President, one-third of domestic steelworkers are unemployed. The unemployment rate continues to stagnate at 9.5 percent nationally. This dire distress is a problem for us to grapple with now.

This figure is even higher in steel States, such as West Virginia, where the unemployment stood in May of this year at 10.9 percent. We cannot continue to allow unfairly priced steel imports from across the seas to force our workers into the unemployment lines in greater numbers and thus cause the steel companies to suffer even heavier financial losses.

Subsidized steel imports, I emphasize, must not be permitted to destroy the American steel industry. We recognize that this industry is critical to the national strength of our Nation and basic to the productive well-being of our economic system and the consuming public in this country.

I earnestly hope administration officials will be encouraged by my comments and the comments of Senator HEINZ in this Chamber today. The administration concern, and I do not minimize it, is a concern that is present. But more and more, the administration and the Nation must stand firmly behind our American steelworkers—American steelworkers not now employed. The number of workers unemployed and American steel companies suffering financially cuts too deeply.

I trust that all segments within the U.S. Government and also at State levels, when possible, will resist efforts to solve the problems with subsidized steel imports in a negative manner. Such ill-advised action would be unacceptable to domestic steelmakers and further injure American steelworkers and their families.

Mr. President, our people as a whole, not just steel producers and steelworkers, are faced with a crushing, terrible economic crisis. This problem, to be solved hopefully sooner rather than later, calls for a crusade of every official, every person or group of concerned citizens, who provide a constructive proposal or program or project, an effort to be helpful.

No partisan effort is in order. We must work together, work together perhaps as we have not realized that we must work together, on a policy issue of this kind; and work in cooperation, with diverse viewpoints of course. We must secure a commitment and do it now, now, now. We must turn this industry upward.

It is for us now to recognize that the undergirders on which the economic structure of America stands are being ripped apart. We need a shoring up as well as a stronger base to keep this house of American industry intact.

● Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I have joined a number of my colleagues in sending a letter to Commerce Secretary Baldrige encouraging him to pursue a hard line against subsidized steel imports.

The steel industry has been one of the hardest hit sectors of our economy in the current recession. Downturns in the automobile, building, and equipment industries have severely depressed the demand for steel. Add to that the unfair labor practices of some Europeans, long known by the industry and finally documented by the Commerce Department in June, and it is small wonder that the steel industry has fallen into a dangerous depression.

The U.S. steel industry today is operating at barely 40 percent of capacity compared to 81.4 percent just 1 year ago. Over 110,000 workers are currently laid off, sending ripple effects through related industries and depressing entire communities. Our industrial base, vital to our national defense and economy, is jeopardized. We clearly have reached a critical juncture, and without fair but unyielding action, we could be facing a major disaster.

The Commerce Department determined in June that steelmakers in some European countries are receiving government subsidies amounting to as much as 40 percent of their production costs. It is not "protectionist" to take action against such patently unfair practices. In fact, to fail to do so would compromise the principles of free trade which are central to the international trade agreement both we and the Europeans signed.

We must send a strong message to our trading partners that the United States expects fair trade in our markets and the vigorous enforcement of our trade laws, and I urge the Secretary of Commerce to hold to that course.●

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR NUNN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR) is recognized not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, with the permission of the Chair, I yield my place and time to the distinguished Senator from Georgia, and then after he has finished his special order and his remarks, I should like to be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Arkansas. I will take just a few minutes.

THE CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1982, TITLE IV—HABEAS CORPUS REFORM

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, Senator CHILES and I continue to speak daily on the pressing need for reform of habeas corpus proceedings in our criminal justice system. Our courts are overburdened and overtaxed with needless and repetitive habeas corpus petitions. Despite that fact, the Senate persists in failing to act to alleviate the problem. Senator CHILES and I have offered one clear and effective legislative remedy: the proposals for habeas corpus reform in S. 2543 which today remain untouched on the Senate Calendar.

As I mentioned last week, Senator CHILES and I are not alone in calls for congressional attention to this problem. The public, as well as Federal judges themselves, have become more and more willing to vocalize their frustrations with the needless delay and uncertainty which current habeas corpus laws produce within our criminal justice system. Again this morning, I call the Senate's attention to relevant and pertinent comments from a member of the Federal judiciary.

Those comments stem from the case of Willie Lee Darden, yet another criminal offender whose ultimate punishment was postponed via a delayed petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

On September 8, 1973, Darden robbed Carl's Furniture Store in Lakeland, Fla. In doing so, he victimized Mr. and Mrs. Carl Turman, the store's owners, as well as Phillip Arnold, a 16-year-old neighbor who came to the aid of the Turmans. Darden fatally shot Mr. Turman between the eyes in his wife's presence. He then shot the Arnold boy three times, leaving permanent injuries, including a bullet lodged in his neck at the time of Darden's trial. Finally, he sexually accosted Mrs. Turman prior to leaving the scene of his crimes.

The State of Florida subsequently charged Darden with first degree murder, robbery, and assault with intent to commit murder. At Darden's trial in January 1974 the State produced both Mrs. Turman and Phillip Arnold as eyewitnesses against him, in addition to substantial and credible circumstantial evidence. The jury convicted him of the charged crimes and he was subsequently sentenced to death.

Darden's direct appeal of that conviction was denied by the Florida Supreme Court in 1976. The following year the Supreme Court of the United States denied his petition for a writ of certiorari in the case. For the next 2 years, Darden pursued clemency requests within the State system. In May 1979, the Governor issued a death warrant based on Darden's 1974 conviction. Only after that warrant was signed, some 6 years after Carl Turman's murder, did Darden file a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in Federal court. Darden's petition required the Federal court to fully examine and review again trial issues decided and affirmed in the State system many years before. In May 1981, nearly 8 years after Darden's criminal acts, the Federal district court found his claims to be "unfounded" and denied his petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

In issuing his opinion, Federal District Judge William Terrell Hodges took care to include an "epilogue" which should be of special interest to this Congress in considering legislation to amend the statutes governing habeas corpus proceedings. Judge Hodges pointed out that cases like Darden's serve "* * * to fuel a growing public frustration concerning the administration of criminal justice" which in turn results in "an overall loss of confidence on the part of the public in its court system." On the problem of delay and needless relitigation of issues, the judge noted that, as current law does not require Federal courts to defer to earlier State court determinations, "Of necessity, the habeas corpus proceeding is always a rehashing of constitutional issues already decided in State courts."

Of particular relevance to the Senate's consideration of habeas corpus reform is that part of the opinion which specifically suggests that shortcomings in habeas corpus relief are statutory in nature, and not mandated by consitutional tenets. As such, Judge Hodges clearly emphasized that the solutions to these problems must come from Congress, rather than the courts themselves. He states:

> While there is great clamor for statutory redress of our present law concerning habeas corpus relief, all involved should remember . . . that the existing law is itself of statutory origin. It was not created, and cannot be amended, by the courts. Given the statute it would be a gross violation of law of a judge's oath of office if he should arbitrarily decline to entertain a proper petition filed under it; and to the extent there is widespread belief that the federal courts have somehow 'bootstrapped' their own authority to indiscriminately meddle in state court criminal prosecutions . . . unjustified and unnecessary damage is being done to the very system of judicial administration in which all of us are so vitally interested. Those who wish to debate the need for change should focus their attention and the brunt of their remarks upon the statute, and the Congress, not the Courts.

The "need for change" to which Judge Hodges refers has reached the point where reform can no longer be responsibly delayed by this Congress. As the Darden opinion so clearly points out, change must come from this Congress and from the legislation which we must enact. S. 2543 would affirmatively require deference to full and fair State determinations of factual issues as well as enact a 3-year statute of limitations on habeas corpus proceedings. I suggest that the Senate, by passage of those provisions, can act responsibly and fairly to fully restore public confidence and respect for our criminal justice system.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Arkansas. I thank him for his consideration. I appreciate his courtesy.

If I can be recognized under my special order, I will yield all that time to the Senator from Arkansas, if he needs that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator from Georgia yielding me that time. I do not think I will require it, but I will hold it in reserve.

OPERATIONAL TESTING OF WEAPONS

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, last fall, Russell Murray II, former Assistant Secretary of Defense, testified in a Senate hearing that during the early Pacific patrols of World War II, U.S. submarine crews discovered a dangerous problem with their torpedoes when they encountered enemy ships near Pearl Harbor.

The torpedos, fired with deadeye accuracy, hit their targets with an ominous thud. Shell after shell failed to explode. When officers complained of the problem, no one believed them until the crew of the Tinosa came home with their bone-chilling account. They told of eight dud torpedoes fired straight into the hull of a Japanese merchant ship. None of the eight exploded.

Long-delayed operational tests of the weapon—tests designed to simulate wartime conditions as closely as possible—finally were conducted. Twenty months after the start of the war, the testers found a problem in the torpedo firing pin that was corrected easily.

In the meantime, we had missed countless opportunities for attack and left our own men exposed and vulnerable to assault once they had telegraphed their presence by pounding dud torpedoes into the hulls of enemy ships.

For some time, I have been concerned about the dependability of weapons the Department of Defense is providing to American servicemen. We all have heard the horror stories of the M-16 rifle, the disturbing reports of failures in the M-1 tank, and the criticisms about the performance of the Maverick missile system, the Bradley armored tank, the AH-64 helicopter and many other costly weapons systems.

On May 13, in the early hours of the morning during debate of the defense authorization bill, I introduced an amendment which I believe would take the first step in guaranteeing better quality control and safety in the weapons issued to American troops. The late hour prevented a full discussion of this important legislation, and I withdrew it. This was done on the basis of an understanding expressed by the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, floor manager of the bill—who, by the way, I see in the Chamber at this time—that the matter would be fully considered in hearings by the Governmental Affairs Committee.

On Thursday of this week, I will introduce legislation to address this problem and I invite the support of my colleagues.

The need for independent operational testing has been well-documented. Defense experts have been telling us for more than a decade operational that testing—the process designed to evaluate a weapon's performance in real life-and-death situations—has been the most sadly neglected activity in the weapons procurement process.

I am pleased that this issue is receiving increased attention. The cover story of this week's National Journal by Michael R. Gordon entitled "Billion-Dollar Failures May Slip Through Pentagon Weapons Testing Net" presents a thorough, careful analysis of this issue. I commend it to all my colleagues and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, in the continuing quest for more and better weapons, the services have downplayed the importance of operational testing. Many in the Defense Establishment, particularly the contractors and weapons promoters, have argued that operational testing slows down the acquisition cycle and unnecessarily delays delivery of the most advanced weapons to our troops. This argument was advanced in 1977 by the Defense Science Board task force, and it is well worth noting that three-quarters of the members of that Board were representatives of the technical community—companies whose products would be subject to independent testing.

More objective sources have painted a different picture.

A blue ribbon panel appointed by President Nixon issued an exhaustive study in 1970 which concluded that operational testing conducted by the services was not effectively identifying faulty weapons and halting production in time for life-saving improvements to be made.

The panel concluded that operational testing lacked objectivity, and received little guidance or encouragement from the upper levels of the Pentagon. The study said that data gathered through tests rarely was distributed to key decisionmakers who could use test scores to evaluate a weapon's worthiness.

The General Accounting Office has warned us time and time again that the services are falling short in their responsibility to test and weed out ineffective weapons.

The GAO has criticized the services for doctoring test scores, "babying" their exotic weapons through the testing process and using overly qualified personnel to conduct tests which are intended to serve as an indicator of how well a weapon will perform in the hands of the average soldier.

Finally, the GAO has criticized DOD for withholding key information from Congress about operational test results—data which could be used to make better informed decisions about funding for multibillion dollar weapons projects.

The weapons procurement process has been fraught with the most blatant conflicts of interest. Because operational testing is tied so closely to the Pentagon's research and development arm, we have a situation where the developers and promoters of weapons also play a direct role in passing judgment on their performance.

In other words, we are in the same situation in testing our weapons systems today as we would be if we were asking students to grade their own final exam papers.

Predictably, the Pentagon and the military-industrial complex have vigorously fought any attempts made over the years to change the operational testing structure. Such attempts have been viewed as a threat to the bureaucrats and corporate officials who have staked their professional reputations on pushing new weapons into production.

After President Nixon's blue ribbon report was issued, DOD made a transparently half-hearted effort to comply with recommendations that testing be handled by an independent office with civilian leadership.

But, the "civilians" appointed to the job were in most instances retired generals who had been out of their Pentagon jobs only a matter of weeks. The office's funding and authority was questioned at every turn. Finally, the independent testing office was reorganized and placed under the control of the Defense Department's research and development branch. So, we have the same song, but only now the second verse.

Mr. President, I believe it is time to renew our efforts to guarantee more objective and thorough weapons testing.

I am now developing legislation which I will introduce on Thursday of this week which would create a separate and distinct operational testing office. This office would report directly to the Secretary of Defense on adequacy of tests conducted by the services for new weapons systems. It also would evaluate whether test results confirm that the new hardware is effective and ready for combat use.

An independent operational testing office is neither a new nor radical concept. An overwhelming body of evidence tells us that such an office would drastically improve the weapons acquisition process.

It also is not an attack on this country's commitment to a stronger national defense, a commitment to which we will devote $1.6 trillion from our Federal budget during the next 5 years.

It is simply a demand for better quality control and objectivity. We cannot afford to pour precious resources into sophisticated weapons which fail our men on the battlefield.

There is no place in any war for weapons which do not work.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Morton Mintz in yesterday's Washington Post entitled "Fiasco in Weaponsland," which gives a detailed discussion of the problems with the Maverick missile.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, the General Accounting Office recently released, at my request, an unclassified version of a report on the Maverick missile which raises questions about its effectiveness and demonstrates clearly the value of realistic operational testing. These documents, the GAO report, and the Post article should have the attention of all our colleagues at this time.

BILLION-DOLLAR "FAILURES" MAY SLIP THROUGH PENTAGON WEAPONS TESTING NET

(By Michael R. Gordon)

Early in World War II, a U.S. submarine came upon the Tonan Maru, a Japanese merchant ship. The submarine fired eight torpedoes, all of which struck their target. None exploded.

The problem, said Russell Murray II, assistant Defense secretary for program analysis and evaluation in the Carter Administration, lay in the torpedo's firing pin, which had worked well in engineering tests but had not been fully tested at sea.

The Japanese, Murray told the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee last fall, did things differently. They "subjected their topedoes to proper operational testing before the war—live shots at sea against real hulls," a procedure that paid off at Pearl Harbor.

Some 40 years after this incident, there is still plenty of controversy over how the Pentagon tests its weapons. Only the names of the weapons have changed; they now include the billion-dollar Aegis guided-missile cruiser, which is intended to protect naval battle groups against attack from planes and sea-skimming missiles, and the Pershing II missile, a nuclear weapon that the United States seeks to deploy in West Germany. And the list goes on: the Army's Patriot anti-aircraft missile, the Air Force's tank-killing Maverick missile and its advanced medium-range air-to-air missile (AMRAAM).

At the heart of the controversy, critics charge is a Pentagon bureaucracy so enamored of its new weapons that it often cannot fairly judge their real-life capabilities. And the military decision makers, they say, are heavily influenced by the defense industry that produces its weapons.

"The conflict of interest just stares you in the face," Murray said in an interview. "None of the reforms implemented by [deputy Defense secretary Fran C.] Carlucci get at the biggest problem of them all: the need to have an independent office to do operational tests."

That sort of criticism comes from Congress as well. "What we are doing is having the military-industrial complex test the weapons it develops," complained Sen. David Pryor, D-Ark. "That's like having a student grade his own final exams."

In an effort to transform the Pentagon's testing procedures, Pryor has asked the General Accounting Office (GAO) to conduct a series of studies on weapons testing and is prodding the Governmental Affairs Committee, on which he sits, to hold hearings on the issue later this summer. Pryor is also working on legislation that would create an independent weapons testing office in place of the current testing directorate in the Pentagon's research and engineering office, which has the primary responsibility for weapons development.

Added to the conflict-of-interest issue are such problems as the cost of testing sophisticated weapons and the inherent difficulties of simulating battle conditions in an age when military technology is changing rapidly. Vice Adm. Robert R. Monroe, director of the Navy's research, development, test and evaluation office, said that because of these kinds of problems, the Pentagon runs a risk that "billion-dollar systems" could be "totally ineffective."

Few other Pentagon officials are willing to criticize the testing process for the record, although many commented on the condition that their names be withheld. But defenders of the current system are highly vocal.

Some defense contractors and Pentagon research and engineering officials contend that testing is competently executed and that a new testing office would only lengthen the time it takes to get badly needed systems to the field. As things stand now, they say, the acquisition cycle is already too long.

Other defenders of the current system speak in harsher terms. "I think independent testing is pure goddamn balderdash and a waste of money," said Rear Adm. Wayne E. Meyer, project manager of the Aegis system. "I've never seen independent testing make a better product."

CONFLICTING APPROACHES

Putting the testing controversy in perspective requires some background into how the United States and the Soviet Union develop their weapons. As some experts tell it, the superpowers have different approaches to weapons design and production.

As a general rule, the Soviet method is said to be more evolutionary than that of the United States, which puts a greater premium on achieving significant technological advances.

The Soviets have made "a conscious decision to stay further below the leading edge of technology in what they field," said Leonard Sullivan, a defense consultant, former assistant Defense secretary for program analysis and evaluation and former principal deputy director for defense research and engineering. This reflects their concern that systems on the frontiers of technology might be too difficult to maintain and too complicated for Soviet troops to operate, he said.

As some see it, the U.S. emphasis on state-of-the-art weapons technology puts a premium on thorough testing. But many testing controversies have sprung up over the years.

One problem, in the view of critics, is the reporting of test results. The Maverick anti-tank missile is case in point. In the 1960s, the Air Force developed a Maverick that used a television camera to pick out targets. In the 1970s, the Air Force made a major effort to develop a version of the missile that would create images from the targets' thermal energy. In was intended to overcome problems in identifying targets that plagued the old Maverick and to give pilots the ability to fire in bad weather and at night.

As the system is explained by the GAO, the new version of the Maverick shows a target on a special video display. The pilot can "lock" the missile onto the target and launch it. This capability is called "launch and leave" because, as the GAO describes it, "the pilot can presumably turn away after launching the missile and leave the area with evasive maneuvers while the missile should stay locked onto, and eventually kill, the target that the pilot selected."

It worked well in theory, but the test results were not encouraging. Anthony R. Battista, a House Armed Services Committee staff member and an engineer by training, noted in an interview that actual test results were distorted.

In one case, he said, the Air Force contended that the Maverick could lock onto its targets at greater ranges than seemed possible from his viewing of Air Force films. Battista said he insisted on flying in the planes used in the Maverick test and confirmed that the Air Force claims were exaggerated.

Murray says he had a similar experience. While the Air Force reported that the Maverick program was proceeding without major problems, Murray says, he saw Air Force films that showed that the pilots experienced great difficulty in locking onto their targets. The films convinced Murray that an independent testing office was needed.

Critics of Pentagon testing are also concerned about the way service officials score maintenance tests. In essence, testers record each maintenance failure, however small. But later, at special scoring conferences, service officials discount minor maintenance failures that, in their view, would not seriously interfere with performance in actual combat.

Dina Rasor, who heads the Project on Military Procurement, a public-interest group, said that in one test of the M-1 tank at Fort Knox, Ky., "a group of senior officers and civilians from various commands threw out all but 171 of the 1,007 maintenance actions." That gave the tank a "chargeable" maintenance failure rate—the distance it runs before it breaks down—of 93.97 miles, Rasor wrote in Reason magazine. "It just happens that the goal the Army set for itself for this point in the tank development was 90 miles between failures," she noted.

A similar pattern can be seen in the testing of the Army's advanced attack helicopter, the AH-64. In a May 1982 report, the GAO noted that Army tests showed that the helicopter could fly an average of 17.9 hours between mission failures, which was close to the Army's objective of 17 hours. But this figure, the GAO said, reflected only failures that caused "actual aborts" and that were related to certain hardware problems. If failures resulting from crew and maintenance errors and unknown causes were considered, the GAO said, "operational mission reliability" would drop to an average of 3.5 hours between failures.

The GAO has generally said that the latter measure, which includes failures from a variety of causes, is a better indication of how the system would perform in combat. But some Pentagon officials say their scoring procedures are needed to compensate for the zealousness of the Army's testing procedures, which often identify minor maintenance problems, and to distinguish major deficiencies from less important ones.

Another set of problems stems from what critics call "success-oriented" tests. Battista, who also believes there is a need for an independent testing office, cited early tests of the Phalanx, a ship defense system that employs a rapid-fire 20-millimeter weapon to attack close targets, as a case in point. Early tests of the Phalanx, Battista said, used "soft" target drones that were easy to destroy. At the direction of his committee, he says, the Navy later used more durable, and therefore more realistic, drones.

Yet another example of success-oriented testing cited by Battista are the tests of the airborne warning and control system (AWACS) plane. In 1975 testimony, the Air Force contended that recent tests had shown that AWACS planes could survive a "moderate" scale of attack. But military officials conceded under questioning that they did not employ the type of tactics in the test that would likely be used by the enemy. Specifically, they admitted, the tests did not show what would happen if the enemy tried to use electronic countermeasures—called "jamming"—on planes sent out to protect the AWACS plane.

Battista said that the Air Force's test spurred congressional skepticism about the real capabilities of the aircraft and undermined support for what he considers a valuable program.

Yet another problem with testing stems from the use of conractor personnel, according to some defense experts. In a recent article, Army Capt. Bruce E. Arlinghaus, an instructor at the U.S. Military Academy, observed that precision guided munitions systems that are to be tested "often come with corporate representatives who 'look after' and initially teach people how to use them. These 'tech reps' know the system, can keep it working and can teach and train people how to use it better. If the system is adopted, very few in the military will be able to match their knowledge, maintenance ability or standards of training."

Contractor representatives were also present at a 1976 test of the Army TOW (tube-launched, optically tracked and wire-guided) anti-tank missile. The test was specifically designed to assess a new laser sight for the missile that allowed it to be fired at night. "To do the test, we selected the best gunners," a participant said, adding that the gunners had to have special security clearance and were given 60 days of special training.

The system performed well. But the test raised questions as to whether the Army could achieve the same level of performance without substantially increasing the training it provides gunners.

Nuclear weapons systems have been subject to some key testing limitations. In some cases, the terrain at test ranges has constrained efforts to make tests more realistic. The GAO has noted, for example, that much of the terrain at the White Sands (N.M.) test range and other western test ranges bears little resemblance to Soviet territory. Yet these ranges are used to test strategic cruise missiles.

The Air Force long ago gave up efforts to fire Minuteman missiles out of operational silos. An Air Force spokeswoman cited cost concerns because the silos are damaged in firings. But experts also note that three out of four efforts during the 1960s to fire missiles out of working silos failed when the missiles did not get out of their silos.

Other testing problems are apparently matters of economics. Neither Congress nor the services have generously financed programs for drones and other targets. Project managers often have to pay for them out of their weapons development budgets, and some complain that this practice handicaps realistic testing.

Adm. Monroe added that jamming is a key testing weakness because it is difficult both to simulate Soviet efforts to disrupt American weapons and to replicate Soviet missiles and radar systems to determine whether U.S. jamming efforts would work.

"It's almost impossible to get good electronic warfare representation of enemy radars and enemy missiles," he said. "In trying to get inside enemy circuitry, we're just in our infancy."

PERSISTENT QUESTIONS

Whether these sorts of testing problems represent the exceptions in a procurement system that churns out billions of dollars of equipment each year or reflect deep institutional problems is the key question.

The way the Pentagon's testing system works now, each service assesses whether weapons meet their design specifications, an evaluation that is called "developmental testing." In addition, the services have separate agencies that assess how well the systems perform in simulated combat conditions, a procedure that is called "operational testing."

These tests are generally carried out in several stages. As an official in the office of the Defense Secretary explained it, the first step in developmental testing is to define the concept of the weapons system and subject it to engineering tests. A complete prototype is usually then tested.

While developmental testing proceeds, operational testing, which is supposed to be important to the Pentagon's decision to order full-scale or limited production, begins. But this stage of the testing process is done too late to influence the initial development decision, which is made by the Defense System Acquisition Review Council, a committee of service officials and assistant Defense secretaries that is headed by Richard D. DeLauer, a former executive vice president of TRW Inc. and now Defense undersecretary for research and engineering and the Pentagon's chief acquisition executive.

In Monroe's judgment, the testing problem is aggravated by pressure from defense contactors, project managers and other Pentagon officials to push ahead with new programs.

To meet tight shipbuilding schedules and comply with the bureaucratic need to prepare budgets years in advance, Monroe said, decisions to buy "long lead time" components and to go ahead with full production are made while research and development is still going on. "We're starting to buy something and I don't know what the hell it is," he said.

The Pentagon's emphasis on concurrent testing and production of weapons is "terrible," he said. "We can't build good hardware that way."

Some of Carlucci's management initiatives, Monroe said, are making matters worse for testers. One of Carlucci's initiatives, for example, is to leave the final "milestone" production decisions up to the services instead of the Defense System Acquisition Review Council.

Monroe hailed some of Carlucci's reforms, however. One, to provide more hardware "test pieces," has helped the weapons testers, he says.

There is also controversy over what sort of monitoring is done by the office of the Defense Secretary.

In 1970, the Defense Department convened a "blue ribbon" panel of academics, contractors and business and labor leaders to review several defense issues, including testing.

The panel's recommendations led to the creation of independent operational testing agencies in each of the services. In addition, the panel called for a separate testing and evaluation directorate within the office of the Defense Secretary to monitor the service agencies. It was established and placed for administrative purposes within the Pentagon office of research and engineering, a move that has been a continual source of internal dispute.

The testing office's mandate specified that it was to report directly to the Secretary or deputy secretary. But despite this independent access, some argue that the research and engineering office has acquired too much influence over the directorate.

A veteran Pentagon official who is familiar with the office says that Alfred Starbird, the Army lieutenant general who was the first director of the testing office, was the most independent and showed no reluctance to bypass the head of the research and engineering office to bring his opinions to the deputy secretary. Since then, the directorate's clout and independence have gradually diminished, he said.

Monroe said that since the testing office is "organizationally tied into the hierarchy" of the research and engineering office, its independence is diminished. If research and engineering takes a firm position on a test policy issue, he said. "It's tough for [the directorate] to march off in a different direction."

Concern over the testing office's independence—or lack thereof—surfaced during the Carter Administration transition in 1976. An early proposal to restructure the Pentagon would have created the position of undersecretary for evaluation to oversee program analysis and evaluation, the testing office and the department's comptroller.

That never happened, but soon after Harold Brown took over as Defense Secretary, plans were hatched to transfer operational testing to the office of program analysis and evaluation, where it would be directed by Murray and Thomas P. Christie, now deputy director of the office of program analysis and evaluation for general purpose forces.

The ensuing power struggle over control of the testing office underscores the intensity of opposition to an independent test office among defense contractors and the rest of the research and development community.

As Murray tells it, the proposed transfer ran into trouble almost immediately. It was resisted by the Defense Science Board, an advisory body whose members include representatives of such defense contractors as TRW and Martin Marietta Corp., and by William J. Perry, the new undersecretary for research and engineering.

Perry and Murray clearly had two very different approaches to weapons development. In an interview, Perry said the transfer would have hurt his drive to reduce the time it takes to develop weapons systems. "We were taking 10 or 12 years," he said. "I wanted to get that down to five or six years."

In Perry's view, this meant that the Pentagon would have to conduct developmental and operational testing in tandem, with production beginning for some weapons systems while important testing on them was still going on.

Some of Perry's argument was endorsed by Pentagon testers. One said that shifting operational testing to the program analysis and evaluation office was not a good political move because the office has an adversary relationship with the services. And Monroe charged that the analysis and evaluation office had strong views about which weapons the Pentagon ought to develop and might have sought to use test data to "bomb out" some systems.

Murray, on the other hand, argued at the time that developmental and operational testing needed to be kept separate in order to provide checks and balances on the procurement process. As he put it in his later testimony to the Governmental Affairs Committee, shortcutting operations tests "may get hardware into the field sooner, but not working hardware." Murray complained that the Pentagon bureaucracy too often "has inflicted half-developed systems on our forces in the field and given high technology a reputation it may not deserve."

The dispute between Murray and Perry was fought out in several forums. After Brown approved the transfer, the Defense Science Board convened a study panel on acquisition questions headed by DeLauer, who became Perry's successor. The panel criticized the move and complained that extensive testing had already unduly lengthened the time it took to produce weapons.

Murray replied that there was little evidence that testing was responsible for the delay in getting weapons to the field, a view buttressed by a 1980 Rand Corp. study on weapons system acquisition that was prepared for Perry and the Air Force and that concentrated on aircraft. Although the study cites "some slight evidence" of longer intervals between "first flight testing" and "operational delivery," it said that "statistical support for such a trend is very weak and is certainly inadequate by itself to justify any change in policy."

Brown went ahead with the transfer of operational testing authority to Murray's office, but gave it an additional staff of only eight. When Murray requested a much larger staff, he was offered three more positions. Several months later, operational testing reverted to Perry's control.

CONSTRAINED INFLUENCE

Just how well the testing office functions now is a matter of contention. It is headed by Isham W. Linder, a retired admiral who was appointed by Perry and is described as capable, honest and dedicated by Murray.

Though the testing directorate is housed within the research and engineering office, its charter provides for the independent reporting of test results to the Defense System Acquisition Review Council and to the Defense Secretary. The testing office is also charged with approving service test plans.

Critics inside and outside the Pentagon maintain that the office's influence is constrained. A former test official who has worked under Linder said that test evaluations prepared by the office staff are sometimes "chopped" before they reach the Defense Secretary. "It's a difficult situation," the former official said. "You're not really going to send something up that [research and engineering] doesn't like." Perry said that when he was in office, he controlled the testing office's appointments, its budget and the scope of some of its plans.

A defense official familiar with the testing office said that Linder is not aggressive in disputes between his office and the services over access to service test data. The practice of having undersecretaries for research and engineering select the head of the testing office, he said, ensures that the director of the office will not be "a strong guy."

He also noted that Linder's position as a deputy to DeLauer limits his influence. "This building functions on symbols like that," he said. In general, he said, the testing office is dependent on DeLauer to push some of its initiatives, such as its recommendation that the services buy more realistic devices to simulate enemy threats.

Murray says Linder is in an impossible position. "He's underneath the engineering community, in particular an undersecretary who has opposed independent testing with all of his might," he said. DeLauer was not available for comment.

Other officials complain of the widespread assignment of the uniformed military to the testing directorate as a potential, if not actual, conflict of interest. They note that the former head of air and land warfare test programs in the office became the project manager for the Patriot missile.

Currently, the office includes officials who have worked on the M-1 tank program, among other systems. The current deputy director for tactical air and land warfare systems in the test office, Eugene Fox, is an active Army brigadier general.

The concern of service loyalists for advancement, critics say, may affect test evaluations. "Some military staff people don't like to alienate their parent services that they have to go back to for advancement," said a Pentagon official.

Another criticism is that the office is stretched far too thin to monitor the Pentagon's weapons programs effectively. It has an official staff of about 30, but according to one official, only 14 are directly involved in evaluating tests for all tactical and strategic weapons systems. The office has only three officials to oversee Army tests, a significant number in light of the Army's modernization program to field a slew of new systems.

Beyond that, officials say, the testing office is under pressure because of the tendency to mix developmental and operational testing to shorten the acquisition cycle. Carlucci's philosophy of "controlled decentralization," which grants the services more authority adds to the pressure.

In general, argued a Pentagon official, the users of new weapons systems do not have a sufficient part in the weapons development process. While the commanders of troops in the field have an important role in establishing weapons requirements, he said, they have little influence over the sort of systems that are eventually produced. To grant the commanders more of a voice in weapons development, he said, "would require the Pentagon to create something like an undersecretary for forces."

Linder and some other testing officials take issue with these criticisms. Linder asserts that his independence is not compromised by the current arrangement and says he reports test results directly to Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger and "around DeLauer." He said he had never been subjected to pressure from DeLauer or Perry.

He also denies that the testing office is understaffed. While the extensive use of military officals, he said, is "something to watch carefully," he said that they provide valuable expertise.

"Service guys have a strong sense of loyalty for whomever they work, said an official in the testing office. "We work for the Defense Secretary."

Asked about the office's impact, a Pentagon official replied that it "caused project managers to make changes . . . about 50 percent of the time." As an example, he pointed to the Army's AH-64 attack helicopter. "They were going to full production and the fire control system wasn't operating." he said. The testing office, he said, forced the Army to test the weapon some more.

The office, officals say, also pressured the Army to conduct more tests on the reliability of the engine in the M-1. It alerted Carlucci to the need for more tests, an official says, and as a result, Carlucci added to his list of 32 management reforms one that urges the services to develop more prototypes so that weapons testing can begin sooner.

But much of the office's purported influence is hard to assess. Linder says he submitted a critical evaluation of the Maverick missile a month before The Washington Post printed a series of damaging articles about the system. But an Air Force official credits the publicity from the Post's article—not Linder's report—with the Defense System Acquisition Review Council's subsequent decision to hold off on a large-scale purchase of the missiles.

To Monroe, the independence of Linder's office is not a key issue because he maintains that service test agencies are effective. A totally independent test office, in his opinion, would only create management problems for the Defense Secretary because the Pentagon leadership needs an acquisition executive like DeLauer to resolve many of the testing issues.

But he added that the system works against thorough testing and evaluation. "For every voice that says, 'Don't proceed, fix it first,'" he said, "there are nine that say, 'Move ahead and we'll fix the problems later.'"

AEGIS: A HIGH-PRIORITY NAVAL DEFENSE PROJECT, BUT WILL IT WORK WHEN THE CHIPS ARE DOWN?

Rear Adm. Wayne E. Meyer has posted a sign in his Crystal City (Va.) office that nicely sums up his management philosophy. Rule No. 1, the sign proclaims, is that the project manager is always right. Rule No. 2, it adds, is that Rule No. 1 must always be obeyed.

As the project manager for the Aegis air defense cruiser for the past 12 years, Meyer has earned a reputation as one of the most successful managers in the military. By sheer force of personality and a lot of smarts, it is commonly said, he has made the Aegis program a reality.

But despite Meyer's drive, critics say, the Aegis is a classic case in which an assumed need to move ahead with the development of a system has restricted the system's testing program. As a result, they say, there is considerable uncertainty about what the system can really do.

The Aegis is a high-priority Navy project that has drawn increased attention since the Falkland Islands conflict revealed the threat that sea-skimming missiles such as the French-built Exocet pose to surface ships, including aircraft carriers. Navy Secretary John Lehman has called the Aegis the "key to survival of the battle group." The system is described by its contractors, RCA Missile and Surface Radar and the Ingalls shipbuilding division of Litton Industries Inc., as the "shield of the fleet."

In essence, the Aegis is a combination of highly sophisticated radars, missiles and other weapons that are deployed on specially designed cruisers. A Defense Department report puts the cost of an individual Aegis-equipped ship at more than $1 billion, and the Navy would like to buy 17 of them through fiscal 1987. The first Aegis air defense cruiser, the Ticonderoga, has already undergone sea trials.

As described by RCA, the ship's radar would be able to detect hundreds of aircraft and missiles, maintaining "continuous surveillance of the skies from the wavetops to the stratosphere." Unlike conventional radars, which use a rotating radar antenna, the Aegis antenna is four sided. Each side contains more than 4,000 small radars that send out hundreds of pencil-thin radar beams.

Upon tracking a potential target, the Aegis system would use another signal to determine if the plane or missile is "friend or foe," an RCA spokesman said. If the latter, the Aegis would attempt to shoot it down; surface-to-air missiles would be fired and radar information gathered by the Aegis computer would be used to direct Standard missiles toward the target with midcourse commands.

Then, in a process called "illumination," a separate radar, using a conventional radar dish, would bounce radar signals off the target so that the missile could home in on the reflected radar energy. The Aegis, Meyer said, could have 18 missile salvos in the air at one time.

That's not all the Aegis system is supposed to do. It also has a computerized weapons control system to direct anti-aircraft fire from its Phalanx air defense system, the cruiser's five-inch deck guns, its rocket-launched torpedoes and its depth charges.

The Aegis also includes an operational test and readiness system, a computerized diagnostic system that is designed to pinpoint maintenance problems in the complex array of computers and radars.

RCA notes in its press releases that the system's "effectiveness has been proved" in "rigorous" tests. But some critics complain that the test results have been less than reassuring. A study for the Defense Systems Managment College by Booz Allen and Hamilton Inc. that was based in part on internal Pentagon documents noted that in 1978, the Defense Secretary's office "approved production of the system in spite of substantial evidence of inadequate (test and evaluation) data." Both the department's testing office and its office of program analysis and evaluation, the report observed, felt that "there was insufficient evidence that Aegis would function effectively in a high-threat environment."

As the critics tell it, the testing limitations were many. For one, a complete prototype was never put to sea and tested. A proposal to this effect was advanced by the Center for Naval Analysis, a research organization financed by the Defense Department.

What sea tests were conducted, on the ship Norton Sound, involved only one face of the Aegis radar system. Other missing elements, the Booz Allen report noted, were parts of the command and control system and the operational readiness test system.

Another limitation of the tests, in the view of a naval expert familiar with the Aegis testing program, concerned the drone aircraft and missiles used as targets. The drones, a Pentagon expert on aerial targets said, were "not anything like" some Soviet cruise missiles in terms of "low-fast threat."

Thomas S. Amlie, former technical director of the Naval Weapons Center at China Lake, Calif., said the drones also bore faint resemblance to an Exocet-type threat. According to a Navy chart on the Norton Sound test, the drones and missiles used in "low-altitude" test firings have considerably larger length, body diameter and wing span than Janes' 1981 "All the World's Weapons Systems" attributes to Exocets. Nor can they fly as low as Exocets, which fly lower than 10 feet above the water.

The Booz Allen report said that there were only seven firings of the Standard-2 missile during the operational tests, which were conducted in 1977. Other test data show that the targets in these tests were not lower than 200 feet.

The number of simultaneous targets that were fired at was also limited. Meyer said that during the Norton Sound tests, the Aegis never had to face more than two missiles at once. In the two instances that it faced two missiles, he said, the targets were destroyed. But in 1983, he said, the Ticonderoga will face six simultaneous targets in a test.

There is likewise controversy over another part of the Aegis test program, which took place on land near Moorestown, N.J., where the Navy built a test center complete with a simulated ship deck near the RCA Missile and Surface Radar offices.

The Navy built two of the Aegis' four radar faces there and has tested them by tracking air traffic in the Northeast air corridor. Contractor literature stresses that Navy fighters also tested the system under "combat conditions." F-14s and A-4s were flown near the test site, as were other planes with special jamming equipment. But there were some constraints. The land-based system was not tested against extremely low-flying threats because the Navy was enjoined from directing high-powered radar beams very low to the ground. Operational test data show that the Aegis had some tracking problems when planes practiced a maneuver called "weaving tracks," in which they frequently crossed paths.

Most of the combat tests used simulated targets programmed into the Aegis detection system and simulated missile firings. And testing the system was limited, data show, because the Navy was changing the system so much that testers found it hard to assess its effectiveness. The test data also indicate that the Aegis computers showed a rate of small maintenance failures that was five times greater than the goal.

Beyond that, in the view of a naval expert close to the testing, the land-based test exercise had an air of artificiality. "Just think about the fact that you have a land-based system across the freeway from the manufacturer of the product," the expert said, "That's very different from an air-sea environment."

Meyer and Robert R. Monroe, director of the Navy's research, development, test and evaluation office, take vehement exception to most of these criticisms. Regarding the Norton Sound exercise. Meyer said that to test a full prototype of the system would have been a waste of money. Even though only one of the four radar faces was tested, he said, that was sufficient because the Aegis radar is "a collection of repeatable systems."

He added that many of the drones used actually "overrepresented" much of the Soviet threat. Acknowledging that the latest sea-skimming Soviet SS-22 missile is "going to be tough," he said defense always lags behind offense.

Meyer said that cost was one reason that tests were not made with Exocet missiles. "I don't see anyone offering to buy me some Exocets," he said. Even acquiring the necessary drones for test firing, he said, was costly because the services have not given strong support to their drone programs and many drones were acquired "out of our budget."

Monroe and Meyer offer different explanations of the tests against low-flying missiles. Monroe said that at the time the tests were made, most cruise missiles could not fly much below 200 feet. But Meyer said that extensive low-flying tests were conducted during the developmental phase, including a successful one against a missile flying at lower than 50 feet.

Meyer said the Aegis's main mission is to defend against "saturation attacks" and attacks from low-flying missiles. But Monroe contended that the Aegis system is not "optimized" to deal with sea-skimming missiles. The Phalanx air defense system, a 20-millimeter gun that fires at incoming missiles, will remain the Navy's key defense against sea-skimming missiles, he said.

On the land-based testing. Meyer said the Aegis was recently tested successfully against planes making weaving tracks. He acknowledged that problems with the diagnostic testing system have hampered efforts to assess its effectiveness but said improvements are being made. He confirmed test data on maintenance failures but said the number of "interrupts" has declined greatly during trials on the Ticonderoga.

Monroe insisted that many of the criticisms were misplaced. "We probably got better results for the taxpayer by making wiser compromises on comprehensiveness, and without it being that much of a gamble. We did about as much testing as you can . . . and still make any progress."

A former tester disagreed: "Like a lot of tests, the Aegis tests were not designed to overly tax the system or show the user what you can or can't do with it. It will be a big improvement over what we've got now. But there will be a lot of uncertainty about what its capabilities are."

PUTTING THE PERSHING II MISSILE TO THE TEST

The Pershing II is not just another missile. Along with the gound-lanched cruise missile, it is part of NATO's planned deployment of new intermediate-range weapons. If deployed as scheduled next year, it would be the first U.S. missile in 20 years with sufficient range to strike Soviet territory from Europe.

According to NATO's "extended deterrence" doctrine, the Pershing would couple U.S. and European strategic interests by increasing the likelihood that any nuclear war in Europe would escalate into a U.S.-Soviet intercontinental exchange. To the European anti-nuclear movement, the Pershing II stands as a dangerously provocative weapon that would allow the United States to fight a limited nuclear war in Europe and invite a Soviet preemptive strike in a time of crisis.

Some experts on missile testing, on the other hand, question whether all this sound and fury signifies much of anything. Simply put, they wonder if the missile will work.

Questions about the utility of past Pershing missile tests are sensitive for the State and Defense Departments. In February, the General Accounting Office (GAO) produced a report that criticized some Pershing tests for being too success-oriented. (In another report, the GAO held that tests of the air-launched cruise missile have not been "operationally realistic.") (See NJ, 7/3/82, p. 1188.)

The Pershing report was presented in classified form to the Senate and House Armed Services and Appropriations Committees. But the State and Defense Departments expressed concern to the GAO about the suggestion of problems with the Pershing II; consequently, the report was not made public.

The tests discussed in the GAO report occurred in 1978, when the Army fired five modified Pershing I missiles over the White Sands (N.M.) test range as part of its advanced development test of the Pershing II's new guidance system. Unclassified portions of the secret GAO study note that the tests were somewhat limited in scope. The Pershing review was directed by Hyman Baras, director of the GAO's land warfare audits office.

The Pershing II contains a new terminal guidance system developed by Martin Marietta Corp. that, in essence, attempts to home in on its target by matching radar returns from terrain with a programmed "reference scene" of the target area. Much of the missile's accuracy will depend on the ability of the Defense Mapping Agency to craft accurate reference scenes from satellite photographs of Soviet target areas. But in the five advanced development tests, the Army took a shortcut.

As the GAO reported, "Target scenes were made by attaching a radar to an aircraft and flying it over the target area to determine the actual radar returns. The actual returns were then used to construct the target reference scenes for the missile's correlator." This, it suggested, provided the Army with more accurate reference scenes than could be developed for actual Soviet targets.

The GAO faulted the Army on another count. It noted that for three of the five firings, the Army "altered the target area by emplacing aluminum reflectors in a precise geometrical pattern to ensure that the area had a distinctive radar signature." The Army, the GAO reported, said the reflectors were needed because terrain of the test range lacked the distinguishable features of the Soviet Union. But the GAO concluded that "while some alteration of the target area may have been warranted, the high radar reflection provided by having the aluminum around the target. . . enhanced success in achieving correlation."

Even with these aids, the performance of the five test firings was less than impressive. According to David G. Harris, a spokesman for the Army Missile Command, one missile failed in the booster phase. Another went off course because of a radar malfunction, and a third went off the track because of computer problems. A fourth missile hit relatively close to the defined target area. Only one of the missiles landed within the target zone, which was marked by reflectors.

Harris confirmed the GAO's account of the tests but said they were still judged by the Army to be successful because they proved "the concept" of the missile. Harris also said that the missile correlator, which matches the stored reference scenes with the radar returns from the target area, worked well even when the missiles went off course. The tests were so successful, he said, that the Army dispensed with a scheduled sixth firing.

Harris's argument was supported by a former Armed Services Committee staffer. "It's not unusual to give yourself very favorable conditions in the early developmental phase to see if the concept will work," he said.

But some defense officials who monitored the tests were concerned. "The Army has done a good job, but they're working with a very sketchy test program," said one.

The GAO report also took issue with the "captive flight tests," in which the Army attached the missile guidance system to airplanes and flew over different terrain to test the correlator. The GAO wrote: "According to the Army, the captive flight tests to be held before the production decision will be equivalent to about 4,000 missile firings. In our view, they do not adequately demonstrate the system's accuracy. The captive tests only test the correlator's performance and not the performance of other components that affect missile accuracy."

Whatever one makes of these disputes, the Army is pushing ahead with the Pershing to meet its 1983 deployment deadline. Late last month, it signed a contract with Martin Marietta to begin production on a limited number of missiles even though no missiles had been flight-tested. The decision to go ahead with full-scale production, which will be made by the Defense System Acquisition Review Council, has been put off until November.

The future test program has also been shortened. Originally, the Army planned 28 missile firings, half of them "developmental" tests by the contractor and half "operational tests" supervised by the Army's Operational Test and Evaluation Agency and conducted by actual soldiers.

The developmental and operational testing stages have been combined and the number of test flights has been cut back to 18. Harris denied that the reduction reflects the Army's push to meet the 1983 deadline. Rather, he said, the merging of the operational and developmental tests is simply a more efficient way to test the missile.

Two of the 18 test missiles will be fired over the Atlantic. They are primarily intended to test the missile's propulsion system and will do little to test homing ability. The remaining 16 will be fired at targets at White Sands from within the missile test site or at long range from a launch site in Idaho. Harris said some of the reference scenes in the tests will also use data from airplanes. But most will have reference scenes produced by using the same procedures that are being employed to craft scenes of Soviet targets.

AMRAAM: "AN EXPENSIVE BIRD" OF LIMITED USE?

The Air Force is bullish about AMRAAM, the advanced medium-range air-to-air missile that it is developing in conjunction with the Navy.

As described by its enthusiasts, AMRAAM will be a formidable weapon. A key feature of the new radar-guided missile is its "fire and forget capability," which the Air Force's current radar-guided missile, the Sparrow, lacks.

To fire a Sparrow, a fighter pilot must use a plane's radar to "lock on" to a target. While the pilot is guiding the missile to the target, the plane's radar is unable to scan for other enemy planes.

Air Force officials say that simulated dogfights carried out at Nellis Air Force Base in Nevada showed that Air Force planes equipped with Sparrows were vulnerable to enemy attack while they were guiding the missiles to their targets. AMRAAM is designed to eliminate this vulnerability because each missile will contain its own radar.

Another key feature of the AMRAAM system is its "multi-shot" capability. As conceived, pilots would be able to shoot several AMRAAM missiles simultaneously at different enemy targets.

Much of the controversy is over tests the Pentagon has not done. In 1978, Russell Murray II, then assistance Defense secretary for program analysis and evaluation, and his deputy, Thomas P. Christie, pushed for some early "conceptual" tests that would include a mock air battle at Nellis.

To Murray, the rationale for the tests was clear. Tests of other air-to-air missiles had shown important limitations that were not foreseen by weapons designers. A series of tests in 1977 of follow-ons to the Claw and the Agile missiles at Nellis is one example. These heat-seeking missiles were designed to enable pilots to direct missile "seekers" at targets while their planes pointed away from enemy aircraft.

But the tests showed that the pilots had difficulty using this procedure in simulated dogfights. "The idea was that you would get this fantastic capability. But if you can't use it, how do you get an increase in capability?" asked John Boyd, a retired Air Force colonel and defense consultant who reviewed the test results.

With these tests in mind, Murray proposed a similar set of tests for AMRAAM to determine whether pilots could manage the multi-shot mechanism and how well the missile could perform in the face of enemy electronic jamming. The latter was an important consideration because much of the rationale for a long-range missile would be undermined if jamming forced pilots to maneuver relatively close to their targets before firing the missile.

Other parts of the tests would have shown whether AMRAAM should be deployed with an ordinary radar or a new "track-while-scan" radar.

Other reasons to conduct the tests were to see how the problem of distinguishing friendly from enemy aircraft would affect actual use of the missile and to determine the ranges at which the missile could be best used.

To run the tests, Murray said, planes would be outfitted with "seekers" that simulated the radar homing capabilities of the missile. The planes would then engage in mock battles while aircraft instrumentation would relay important performance data to computers below.

This testing plan didn't go far before it ran into trouble. For one thing, the Air Force opposed the tests because they would have forced it to expand its test range to deal with the missile's long range. That, it argued, would have cost money and delayed the program. A Pentagon official said that the program would not have been delayed had the Air Force immediately gone to work extending the test range, but as the dispute over how to test wore on, the argument became a self-fulfilling prophecy.

In addition, William J. Perry, then Defense undersecretary for research and engineering, opposed the plan. "It was an honest technical disagreement," Perry said in an interview. Perry supported the use of McDonnell Douglas Corp. flight simulators as a testing procedure. He said Murray's proposed test would have been artifical and "not better" than using simulators. But the Air Force initially opposed even this sort of test, according to Isham W. Linder, head of the Pentagon's testing directorate. Eventually, Perry Linder and the Air Force decided to rely on the simulators.

But that didn't end the controversy. In 1979, Murray sent two memos to Perry that pointed out that an estimate by an independent Pentagon cost analysis group put the cost of AMRAAM at 50 per cent more than that of the Sparrow. "The Sparrow is already so expensive that we are not able to afford more than two missile loads per F-15," he wrote.

Given the high cost of AMRAAM—the services initially projected $3.5 billion, but some experts predict more than $10 billion—Murray said he would withdraw his support for the program unless the Air Force agreed to real-life tests at Nellis. Now, Murray predicts that AMRAAM will turn out to be "an expensive bird with limited utility."

Some of his concerns may have been underscored by the results of recent simulator tests. The results were presented to Richard D. DeLauer, undersecretary for research and engineering, in the form of briefings by the Air Force and the Institute for Defense Analyses.

In essence, the briefings showed that planes armed with AMRAAMs often moved within visual range of their targets, negating one of the missiles' advantages and cutting down on its multi-shot capability, sources said.

Linder said the pilots tended not to use the beyond-visual-range capability because the test involved a "limited" combat scenario. He said that the simulation showed that the missile's high acceleration and independent ability to home in on targets were important attributes.

But he acknowledged that the test would have little impact on the basic engineering design of the missile. The test, he said, "has more to do with confirming the requirements" for the missile than with challenging them.

"Murray was too late," said Linder. "He wanted to start from the beginning. The sort of tests he wanted should be lined up for AMRAAM II."

EXHIBIT 2

FIASCO IN WEAPONSLAND

(By Morton Mintz)

Early next month a panel of Pentagon officials will make one of those multibillion-dollar decisions that help keep the American defense budget in the fiscal stratosphere. In all likelihood, the panel will make the most expensive choice, and the evidence is compelling that it will be the wrong choice as well.

The weapon is the Maverick, a so-called "smart" weapon which contains its own elaborate guidance system. It is intended to be used by Air Force Fighters to destroy Warsaw Pact tanks in any future Soviet invasion of western Europe. The Air Force wants to order 61,000 Mavericks at a cost currently estimated at $5 billion.

Maverick is the embodiment of the pervasive, relentless passion in the Pentagon for highly complex, costly "solutions" to problems for which advanced but simpler and less expensive alternatives are available. In this case the alternative is a remarkable cannon of proven reliability as a tank killer.

In the view of many critics of Pentagon purchasing policies, the available cannon is a fine weapon, while the Maverick is a turkey. These experts argue that unless the Maverick can be proven to be a reliable improvement on the existing weapon, the Pentagon should not buy it.

The Pentagon likes the cannon, and is buying it in large quantities. But it also wants the Maverick—even at a cost of $5 billion or more.

The Air Force wants the Pentagon panel meeting next month to authorize "limited pilot production" of 200 second-generation Mavericks, a foot in the door that the Air Force hopes will lock in the ultimate purchase of 61,000 missiles. Alton V. Keel, assistant secretary of the Air Force for research, development and logistics, assured the House Armed Services Committee last March, "This missile will work and we can produce it."

Such arguments didn't impress committee staff expert Anthony R. Battista, who has studied Maverick test videotapes, interviewed test pilots, and flown in the rear seat of a test aircraft. "What justification have you to keep this program alive?" he asked. "It is five years now and we are getting the same arguments in favor of keeping it alive now as we did then. . . ." The Maverick, he told Keel, "would probably get more pilots killed than they would kill targets."

The General Accounting Office wants the panel to hold off, saying that five years of operational testing of the new Maverick have failed to show that it "can be used effectively by U.S. military personnel in combat." The missile did poorly even under "very favorable test conditions," such as alerting pilots to "what to look for," the GAO stressed in a report released July 2.

Ten days later, a reporter learned, two Mavericks, the last of 10 tested since February, flunked an operational test in Utah. The previous eight were found to have a less than 30 percent probability of working properly after being airborne for 14 hours, though they were supposed to be 85 percent reliable. After repairs, however, six of the eight missiles reportedly destroyed their targets, while two more failed. The Air Force declined to comment on either the GAO report or the recent testing.

Still, the odds are strong that the Pentagon panel—which rarely kills any weapons program that has advanced as far as Maverick has—will approve the first purchase of missiles.

The chairman of the panel, Under Secretary of Defense Richard D. DeLauer, is already on record as a staunch supporter of Maverick. "I've looked at the test data so far," he said in an interview early this year. "I've looked at the design. One of the guys who designed it sat in that chair. I have high confidence in his technical ability and his honesty to me." He was speaking of one of his predecessors as director of Pentagon research and engineering, Malcolm R. (Mal) Currie, vice president for missiles of Hughes Aircraft Co., Maverick's manufacturer.

"He and I went over the whole goddamn design," DeLauer said. "And, you know, we talked what the hell is the problem, how can we get [a component] to work a little better, what the production problems are. You know, we sat there as a couple of engineers. That's my goddamn life."

Moreover, the Pentagon claims that there is no alternative to the new Maverick. If the DeLauer panel turns it down, "I frankly don't know where we'd turn," Maj. Gen. James H. Marshall, the Air Force Chief of development and production, said in a December interview. "There's no other solution hanging on the horizon to go grab."

Yet even as he spoke, Air Force A10 squadrons were armed and poised for combat with the most lethal tank-killer available to tactical aircraft anywhere in the world. The weapon is a simple, inexpensive cannon—the first in 30 years that the Air Force has developed for airplanes.

The gun uses a radically new 30-millimeter shell with a unique incendiary penetrator. Nearly twice as heavy as lead, and moving at a speed of 3,240 feet a second, it cuts easily through side or rear armor. The heat generated in tearing through thick steel makes the penetrator burn fiercely, and bits and pieces scatter around the tank compartment, igniting fires and exploding ammunition. The rate of fire—from seven barrels—is 4,200 rounds per minute. Usually, a strafing burst of a mere 30 rounds or so kills a tank.

In operational tests at Nellis Air Force Base, Nev., in 1975 and 1976, "passes" by A10s against the sides or rears of 10 Soviet T62 main battle tanks gutted and destroyed six and totally immobilized the other four. The 60 percent kill rate was four times higher than had been predicted by computer studies during development of the gun, called the GAU8/A.

Cheerleaders for the new cannon are found even among advocates of the missile. "I'll never downgrade it," says Maverick's program requirements manager, Maj. Grant G. (Nick) Nicolai. A top jet pilot, he has logged more than 1,000 hours in the A10, which carries two missiles under each wing and the GAU8/A gun in its nose. For tank-killing at short-range, he says, the gun is "excellent . . . the best thing in the world for it's purpose."

However, Nicolai and other advocates of the Maverick think "its purpose" is too limited. They want another tank killer that can be used from much greater distances; they want a tank killer that is a missile, not a gun. As Maj. Nicolai put it, he thinks a pilot would want to have both weapons. "As a fighter pilot," he said, "I don't want to get my ass shot down. I want to live to come back to drink beer at the bar."

Others disagree, Col. John M. Verdi, a retired Marine Corps aviation weapons expert, led one of the first Marine fighter squadrons in Vietnam combat. For him, the choice between Maverick and the gun is no choice at all.

"If the question is, which would you rather take in against the target at interest, I would unhesitatingly say, 'guns,'" said Verdi, who holds the Legion of Merit and 30 air medals. "I wouldn't want that other sonofabitch," he told a reporter from his home in Santa Ana, Calif. "You have to have a gun on a plane that's going to fight somebody. Anything else is absurd."

The Air Force pays about $20 each for the 30mm armor-piercing rounds, which are made of "depleted" uraninum of very low radioactivity. A 30-round burst costs $600—less than one-hundredth the estimated cost of a single advanced Maverick.

The Air Force has been buying the "DU" rounds, which were independently developed and produced by Aerojet Ordnance Co. and Honeywell Corp., for about seven years. Now large amounts of the ammunition are "prepositioned," mainly in Europe, for possible use in battle. By the end of 1983, the Air Force expects to have an adequate war reserve of tens of millions of rounds.

Not for many years after that, if ever, could there be enough of the new Mavericks. It would take a decade after 1984, when full production may begin, for Hughes Aircraft, and possibly a second manufacturer, to build the desired 61,000, and the Air Force does not so much as claim that this number would constitute an adequate war reserve.

One crucial advantage of the cannon is logistics, and it has been powerfully documented by Col. Robert G. Dilger, a retired fighter pilot who managed the GAU8/A gun and DU ammo programs for the Air Force.

For a squadron of 16 functioning A10s, he said in a May 1980 talk to the American Defense Preparedness Association, a six-man ammunition ground crew is needed to reload the GAU8/A guns, each with 1,174 rounds; a 70-man crew is needed to reload Mavericks, four on each airplane. He also figured that the supplies airlifted in by a single C130 enable the squadron to make 520 firing passes with the gun, but only 60 with Mavericks.

To reload a single aircraft, the gun crew needs a half hour, sometimes as little as 15 minutes, compared with about 75 minutes needed by the Maverick crew, Dilger said. For each pass against a tank, the approximate ground time needed for the gun is two minutes; for the missile, 18 minutes. The more time an aircraft spends on the ground, the fewer the combat sorties it can fly.

A former Pentagon specialist in air warfare says he would forget Maverick and substitute under each wing of the A10 a four-barrel gun enclosed in a pod, the GEPOD 30, so as to enhance the aircraft's anti-tank capability while increasing its ability to take out air defenses. The pod and the GAU8/A fire the same armor-piercing ammunition. Both guns were developed by the General Electric Co. working with the Air Force.

Notably, James P. Wade, Jr., Under Secretary DeLauer's principal deputy, acclaims the 30mm pod. In a letter to the GAO, he pointed out that it evolved "from existing, proven hardware," that it has the "capability to kill multiple vehicles in a single pass," that its accuracy permits it to be used "in close proximity to friendly troops," and that it can be carried on numerous tactical aircraft in addition to the A10—the F4, F5, F15, F16 and A7.

The Tactical Air Force "does not have one single weapon which has the flexibility to attack many different types of targets," including tanks, armored personnel carriers, supply depots and bunkers, Wade wrote. The 30mm pod "provides a practical near term solution" because it "has the flexibility and lethality against this wide spectrum of targets and has demonstrated kill potential against enemy armor arrays."

Yet the Air Force refused for three straight years to fund the GEPOD 30, until Congress forced the money on it for fiscal 1980. This was but one of many signs that the enduring Air Force romance is not with the cannon, but with successive generations of Maverick missiles.

"I know they [Air Force leaders] don't like the gun," says Thomas S. Hahn, a member of the House Armed Services Committee staff from 1975 to 1980. "Missilery is what people are all enthused about." And missilery is what Congress has been going along with, despite staff skepticism.

"They hated guns, because guns are far too simple and are likely to compete with glamorous high technology," says a former Pentagon weapons analyst. "The Maverick backers were saying the gun [generically] is obsolete, even though we haven't begun to scratch the available new gun technology."

The romance with Maverick originated in the early 1960s, when President Kennedy revived sagging interest in conventional tactical weapons by abandoning the policy of massive retaliation for "a wider choice than humiliation or all-out nuclear action." The Air Force found itself with no effective way to attack small armored targets. Its thin-skinned jet aircraft, built for the entirely different mission of dropping bombs, were catastrophically vulnerable to defensive automatic weapons fire. Its 20mm Vulcan cannon, excellent for aerial combat, pelted a tank as ineffectually as raindrops pelt a window.

This situation spawned a fervent wish for a "stand-off" air-to-ground weapon, meaning one that would be fired, in theory, from outside the lethal envelope of air defenses. In July 1964 the wish became the father to an Air Force "operational requirement" for what would become the original Maverick, a day-time-only, television-guided missile that works on contrasts between a target and its lighter or darker immediate surroundings.

The Air Force "tested" the TV Maverick in ideally stark conditions in the sunswept Nevada and New Mexico deserts, firing it at dark tanks squatting on white sand. Despite warnings from critics that the missile would not work against normally camouflaged targets, the Air Force spent about $500 million to buy 20,000 Mavericks and sent some into combat in Southeast Asia. There, green enemy tanks melded into green vegetation, making the missiles nearly useless, according to Gen. John W. Vogt, who commanded U.S. air forces in the region.

Meanwhile, the Air Force stockpiled TV Mavericks as its primary antitank weapon in Europe, where the environment is green, wet and overcast much of the time. In 1975, Vogt, who had become commander of U.S. air forces in Europe, ordered the first realistic operational test, and the missile failed dismally.

This did not catch the Air Force flatfooted: it had prepared for just such a contingency by starting to develop the second-generation, heat-seeking Maverick, which uses infrared rays to sense thermal contrasts between an object and its warmer or cooler close surroundings. Its glory is that darkness does not affect it, so it can "see" 24 hours a day.

But the new Maverick has two main weaknesses. First, on the tiny cockpit screen, the images of many objects, such as sun-warmed rocks and burning bushes, can resemble the images of tanks. Second, it can be defeated by simple humidity; by thermal clutter, such as hot shell holes and flaming battlefield wreckage, and by enemy countermeasures, such as tank-gun firings. For the Maverick, says Battista, the House Armed Services staffer, all of this makes for a "world down there [that] is very, very cruel."

The Air Force objection to the cannon is twofold: It can be used only in daylight, and then only with excessive danger, because the aircraft cannot stand off a great distance from the target.

"The argument against the gun as the primary antiarmor weapon is that the pilot can't get in close enough to use it before getting shot," says Col. Verdi. The error in that is that standoff only buys the first [wrong] shot; then you have to close [in on] the enemy."

Some analysts go as far as to assert that the missile has no real utility at all in combat—even in daytime—and one of them says that this is shown by a fundamental paradox:

To spot a camouflaged object shrouded in battlefield haze and make sure it's a tank, an enemy tank, a pilot must see it with his eyes. At "eyeball" range—no more than 3,000 feet—he can't fire the missile, because it needs more distance to overcome the perturbations of launch so that its guidance system can take over. But at the much greater stand-off ranges at which the missile could home accurately, he can't spot the target out of the cockpit, and he can't be certain that the object outlined on his five-inch-square cockpit screen is the enemy tank.

A simple operational test would have revealed the dilemma even before the first TV Maverick was bought, says C. E. Myers Jr., a former Pentagon director of air warfare.

By persevering in its overriding commitment to Maverick, the Air Force has created a situation full of seeming anomalies:

It developed and has acclaimed the GAU8/A gun and the unique ammunition, but embraces only Mavericks—even the TV version it stopped buying in 1978.

As a primary argument for the new Maverick, the Air Force and the Pentagon have emphasized for many years that its infrared sensor works as well in darkness as in daylight, giving it night and adverse-weather capability. But they have yet to spend any money on adapting an infrared viewer as a nighttime gunsight. The Fairchild Republic Co., with its own money did such an adaptation, and it says, the experiment showed the cannon to be as accurate in darkness as in daylight.

Summing up the arguments: the rigorously tested gun is much safer to use than Maverick. It is cheap and classically simple, and its shells go where they are aimed. The questionably tested new Maverick is unreliably workable in combat. It is highly dangerous to use, costly and complex. It frequently fails to go where it is aimed, because its infrared guidance can be deceived and defeated. And the logistics strongly favor the gun.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I do not have any need for any additional time which might be allocated to me.

I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m. with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The remarks of Mr. RANDOLPH at this point are printed earlier in today's RECORD.)

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, what is the business pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are presently in morning business under the previous order, which will extend to 1 p.m., at which point the Senate will resume consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 58.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I anticipate that debate will occur on Senate Joint Resolution 58, the constitutional amendment for a balanced budget. I would not expect today to be a late day. There are a number of intervening circumstances that require a great number of Senators to be absent from the Hill today, including the funeral of a family member of a prominent administration official.

ORDERS FOR TUESDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I indicated earlier that there are a number of people necessarily absent from the Hill today for a number of purposes. While we shall go on the balanced budget amendment at 1 o'clock, it seems clear to me that we are not going to get very far with it today. That also suggests to me that we ought to come in early tomorrow.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS AND FOR CONSIDERATION OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 58 TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, after recognition of the two leaders under the standing order tomorrow, there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 10 a.m. and that, at 10 a.m., the Senate resume consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 58.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS TOMORROW FROM 12 NOON UNTIL 2 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, tomorrow is Tuesday. It is the day for the usual caucuses on both sides of the aisle. The caucuses are of a quasi-official nature and are the meetings of all Senators on both sides which facilitate the action of the Senate, the formulation of the issues, and are thus important to the official functions of this group. Therefore, in order to accommodate those requirements, I ask unanimous consent that, at 12 noon tomorrow, the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 2 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR SENATORS TO SPEAK FOR 3 MINUTES DURING ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators may speak during the period for the transaction of routine morning business tomorrow for not to exceed 3 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The following proceedings occurred later:)

EL SALVADOR RESOLUTION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, earlier today, the Senate gave its consent that we would convene at 9:30 a.m. tomorrow and go back on the resolution on the balanced budget at 10 a.m. Since that time, it has been called to my attention that we have a matter on which there is a deadline. I am speaking of the El Salvador resolution, House Joint Resolution 494, Calendar No. 713, that must be dealt with. In view of that, since that cannot be done today and since Wednesday is the deadline for dealing with this matter, I ask unanimous consent that the order to turn to consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 58 be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is my intention tomorrow to ask the Senate to go to the El Salvador resolution, House Joint Resolution 494, after the opening business is transacted, including the recognition of the two leaders and the transaction of routine morning business. It is not anticipated that resolution will take very long. Immediately thereafter, we shall be on the constitutional amendment resolution once more.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, is the distinguished majority leader willing at this time to order that resolution in time for tomorrow morning?

Mr. BAKER. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to do that. It is my intention to do that, but I have not cleared through my process the matter of a unanimous-consent request to that end.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

(Conclusion of later proceedings.)

EXTENSION OF TIME TO FILE REPORT ON RECONCILIATION BILL UNTIL 6 P.M. TODAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Budget Committee may have until 6 p.m. today in which to file their report to accompany the reconciliation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am advised by the staff on this side that our Executive Calendar has certain items that are cleared for action by unanimous consent. I inquire of the minority leader if he is in a position to consider all or any part of those items. I am referring to those items under National Institute of Building Sciences on page 4 of the calendar, through the balance of that page, including the item under New Reports, the single item on page 5 under National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs, and nominations placed on the Secretary's desk in the Public Health Service on page 6.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senators on this side of the aisle are ready to proceed with the aforementioned nominations.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in view of that, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now go into executive session for the purpose of considering the nominations just identified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask that the nominations so identified be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed en bloc.

The nominations considered and confirmed en bloc are as follows:

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF BUILDING SCIENCES

The following-named persons to be members of the Board of Directors of the National Institute of Building Sciences:

Charles A. Doolittle, Jr., of Kansas, for a term of 3 years.

Van Norden Logan, of California, for a term of 3 years.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

Nancy A. Maloley, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the Council on Environmental Quality.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON WOMEN'S EDUCATIONAL PROGRAMS

Eleanor Thomas Elliott, of New York, to be a member of the National Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs for a term expiring May 8, 1985.

NOMINATIONS PLACED ON THE SECRETARY'S DESK IN THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

Public Health Service nominations beginning Robert E. Dawson, to be assistant surgeon, and ending Arvo J. Oopik, to be senior assistant surgeon, which nominations were received by the Senate and appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 24, 1982.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nominees were confirmed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to these nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CREDIT FOR FINANCE CKMIITTEE RECONCILIATION BILH IS SHARED BY MANY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, In the early hours of last Friday morning, as we closed off our consideration of the Finance Committee reconciliation bill, I did not have an adequate opportunity to express my appreciation to all those who made this legislation possible. I should like to take the opportunity to do so now.

No legislation as detailed and complex as H.R. 4961 can be put together without a thorough, coordinated staff effort over a period of time. In the case of our reconciliation bill, the staff began work on the particular provisions early this year, in many cases even before the President's budget was released in February. The Finance Committee staff put in many extra hours over the past several months to help shape a bill that would be balanced, fair, and responsive to the concerns of Members of the Senate. Similarly, the Joint Committee on Taxation provided invaluable technical assistance and advice in helping us sort through various options, cost them out, and see that they made good tax policy sense. Their efforts should be greatly appreciated by every Member of Congress.

On the spending side, considerable help was provided by the Congressional Budget Office staff and by the staff of the Congressional Research Service. Everyone knows that making specific program changes in such complicated programs as medicare, medicaid, and AFDC requires great care, and this professional staff support was invaluable in preparing the actual legislation.

Mr. President, the support of the Senate's legislative counsel is always important, and it was particularly important in the case of this wide-ranging bill. In particular, I thank Jim Fransen and Mike Geary for their work on the tax provisions, and Bruce Kelly for drafting the spending provisions. Their kind of professionalism does a great deal to make the legislative process run smoothly.

The Reagan administration, of course, also made a major contribution to the success of this legislation, from the President on down. The Treasury Department staff, led by Buck Chapoton and Dave Glickman, gave very strong support to our efforts on the tax side. Without their help, it would have been much more difficult to work out that problems Members raised with various aspects of the legislation, and to explain the significance of this major tax reform legislation. Treasury Secretary Don Regan, of course, again showed his outstanding leadership in helping to advance this bill. The Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Labor also aided our effort in many ways in connection with program changes on the spending side.

Mr. President, a major legislative effort such as this makes us realize just how important the cooperation, dedication, and courage of our colleagues is to making the legislative process meaningful. This is particularly true, this year, in the case of the members of the Finance Committee. The Republican members of our committee, and their staffs, cooperated in an outstanding way to make some very tough decisions about the budget in an election year. This is a major achievement when you consider that six of our Republicans are running for reelection this year. This has been a long and difficult process, and I want all our Republicans—BOB PACKWOOD, BILL ROTH, JACK DANFORTH, JOHN CHAFEE, JOHN HEINZ, MALCOLM WALLOP, DAVE DURENBERGER, BILL ARMSTRONG, STEVE SYMMS, and CHUCK GRASSLEY—to know how deeply I appreciate their contribution.

It cannot be denied that, in some ways, this legislation has been the subject of more partisan debate than we might have hoped. Still, it would not have been possible without bipartisan cooperation in a number of areas, and I do want to thank the distinguished ranking minority member of the Finance Committee, RUSSELL LONG, for his invaluable help, even if we found in some cases that we had to agree to disagree. This process has been a learning experience for many of us, and I hope any disagreements will not interfere with the long and valued tradition of bipartisan action in the Finance Committee.

Mr. President, I know that this bill has been a difficult matter for many in the business community. Our goal, of course, has been to help the business climate by cutting the deficit and bringing interest rates down to restore confidence: Things we all know must be done. But the actions we have to take to accomplish these things are not easy, and the support we have had from the business community has been gratifying. I would especially like to thank the National Association of Manufacturers and the American Business Conference for their help, and I must mention also the support of Paul Thayer, chairman of the board of LTV and chairman of the chamber of commerce. Many other trade and business associations also cooperated in this effort, and many did much more than that: We owe them our thanks.

Finally, Mr. President, I must say that the prompt passage of this bill is a remarkable tribute to the Senate leadership. Without the tireless and dedicated efforts of HOWARD BAKER, we would not have come this far. I know that every Member agrees that the majority leader has been fair and judicious at all times in his dealings on this legislation, but I must add my personal note of thanks for a job exceptionally well done. Thanks to Senator BAKER, we have avoided the kind of acrimony and ill-will that might have accompanied such controversial legislation. The distinguished minority leader, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, also deserves a vote of thanks for his cooperation on this bill, even though we seem to have a gentleman's disagreement about some of its contents. Senator BYRD has once again demonstrated that, even in partisan debate, he values fairness and honest dealing, and we all appreciate that.

Many others deserve credit: Senator DOMENICI and the members of the Budget Committee for their leadership in the reconciliation battle, and every Member who voted for this bill and for its key provisions. Without bipartisanship, this effort might well have collapsed: My thanks go to one and all who helped.

The President of the United States certainly went the extra mile with respect to this legislation. I am not certain how many phone calls the President may have made and how many visits he may have had with Members of the Senate, but it was an outstanding effort on the part of the President. I know that he appreciates the efforts of all those in the Senate and all those I may have mentioned in getting this bill through the Senate and to the House.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CHARITIES CAN BENEFIT FROM ARTIST'S WORKS

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, over the past few months, we have asked private organizations and charities to fill the gap left because of cutbacks in Government spending. One of the most effective methods charities have to raise money is to auction art works which have been donated by famous artists. Unfortunately, there is not the necessary incentive in the present Tax Code to encourage this fundraising.

Although collectors of creative works are allowed to deduct any of their gifts at full market value, artists may only deduct the cost of materials when making a charitable donation. Not only is this inadequate compensation to artists for their contributions, but it highly discourages them from donating their works to charity auctions and public and private institutions in the first place.

The present tax provisions are unreasonable and counterproductive. The changes proposed by S. 2225, the Artist's Tax Equity and Donation Act of 1982, would cost little, yet provide great benefits.

I understand this provision could not be included in the reconciliation tax bill; however, I hope the Senate will move quickly to enact this important tax reform. I strongly support this act and believe that there must be a revision in the tax law to insure and promote America's literary, musical, and artistic heritage while encouraging the creators of these works to donate their works of art for the benefit of the community.

Mr. President, on July 3 an excellent article on this issue, written by Dr. Daniel J. Boorstin, the Librarian of Congress, was printed in the Washington Post. I commend this article to the attention of my colleagues, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 3, 1982]

TO THE TUNE OF A FEW MILLION DOLLARS

(By Daniel J. Boorstin)

When a New York judge recently decided that the manuscripts of Igor Stravinsky should be sold to the University of California at Los Angeles for $1.5 million (as his widow wished) and not to the University of Texas for $2 million (as his children preferred), he argued that the national interest and the cause of scholarship would be better served in that way. His heirs lost half a million dollars.

If there is a national interest in such matters sufficient to prevent sale of manuscripts to the highest bidder, there is a greater national interest in bringing together a great author's or composer's manuscripts for study in one institution where the creator wanted them to remain. Americans should be reminded that legislation in 1969 deprived creators of their right to claim the value of such donations as tax deductions when they gave their manuscripts to research libraries of universities.

The Stravinsky case is a classic demonstration of the social costs of the present tax policy. In the disposition of the Stravinsky archives, there were other losers: the Library of Congress and the people of the United States.

The Library of Congress acquired its first Stravinsky manuscripts in 1928, as the result of a commission by Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. Stravinsky's ballet, Apollon-Musagete, received its premiere in the Coolidge Auditorium, which had been constructed at the library with Coolidge's generosity just three years earlier. As was customary, the manuscripts of the commissioned work was added to the collections of the library's music division. In 1940, the library purchased for $1,000 another work by Stravinsky, his Symphony in C.

In 1962, Stravinsky began to donate manuscripts to the library on a systematic basis: two manuscripts in that year, two more the next, nine additional manuscripts, in 1964, four in 1965, and so on through the 1960s. By 1969, the great composer, then in his late 80s, initiated discussions with the chief of the library's music division, Harold Spivacke, concerning the disposition of the entire body of his works, and there can be little doubt that, but for the enactment of the tax reform of 1969, the complete archive would have been placed in the national library.

Instead, the greatest portion of the papers is now divided between Los Angeles and Washington, and scholars must travel coast to coast to compare preliminary sketches with finished projects. Photocopying accomplishes little because Stravinsky used many inks in drafting his intricate masterpieces.

The President's task force on the arts and humanities, of which I was a member, recommended a revision in the tax law to restore the incentive to artists, composers and writers that existed before 1969. Legislation before the Senate—S2225—would accomplish this. These benefits would ensue: libraries and museums would acquire creative works without cost; artists, composers and writers would choose the institutions where their works in progress would be displayed and studied. The record of American civilization would be preserved and enriched by discouraging the dispersion of manuscripts for commerical reasons and by encouraging the prompt deposit of these works by their creators in institutions competent to preserve them.

Inflation and shrinking assistance by city, state and federal appropriations reduce the resources of libraries and museums. The $1.5 million committed by UCLA to the Stravinsky papers will not be available for other necessary university purposes.

We thrive on our heritage. Restoration of the tax incentive for gifts of literary, musical and artistic works to cultural institutions will benefit all Americans, present and future.

MARQUETTE UNIVERSITY HIGH SCHOOL SETS UNPRECEDENTED RECORDS IN FORENSIC COMPETITION

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I would like to congratulate the coaching staff and members of the 1981-82 forensics team at Marquette University High School. This team shattered the standing records previously held in forensic competition in the United States. Marquette, annually a top-notch competitor, startled the opposing teams by winning a total of 134 rounds of competition.

I wish to cite this achievement, and also to commend these fine young men for an outstanding performance in speaking and debating, by asking unanimous consent that my July 20 letter to the team and a press release written by coach Edmund J. Fish be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,

Hon. ROBERT W. KASTEN, Jr.,
Washington, D.C., July 20, 1982.

DEAR MUHS DEBATERS: It is with great pleasure that I congratulate you on your victory in the recent National Forensics League tournament.

The superior performance shown by all members of the team reflects the hard work and long hours of research that must have preceded tournament competition. You should all be proud to know that by working together with a fine coaching staff you were able to achieve individual excellence and set new team records.

Again, congratulations on your sweepstakes victory!

Best regards,

Robert W. Kasten, Jr.

MARQUETTE HIGH FORENSICS TEAM SETS NEW NATIONAL RECORDS

In the National Forensics League Tournament recently held in San Francisco Calif. Marquette High School won its unprecedented 8th Grand National Sweepstakes title in record breaking fashion.

In winning their eighth title, Marquette shattered the old total of 86 cumulative rounds of speaking or debating by 48 rounds, accumulating at the end of the week a record 134 total rounds of competition. The Marquette squad, comprised of state or district champions, qualified a national record 12 contestants for the National Tournament. In addition, the team's performance enabled Marquette High to become the only school to ever win for a third time the Tau Kappa Alpha trophy which is annually awarded to the school accumulating the most rounds of national competition. In doing this, Marquette won the trophy by the largest total ever. Director of Forensics for Marquette, Mr. James M. Copeland became the first coach to surpass 1000 rounds of national competition. And coaches Ron Krikac, Edmund Fish, and James Copeland won coach of the year honors.

The winning Marquette team was comprised of:

Seniors—Paul Choi (8th place in Boys Extemp.). Dough Binzak (5th in Boys Extemp). Michael Hughes (tied for 8th in Boys Extemp). Christoper Roe (State Debate Champion). Richard Schmidt (State Debate Champion). Philip Jennings Jr., (State Original Oratory Champion), Michael Uy (State Dramatic Interp. Champion).

Juniors—Christopher Conrad (11th in Humorous Interp.). Kieth Joung (District Lincold Douglas Debate Champion). Robert Kroll (District Original Oratory Champion).

Sophomores—Anthony Scaduto (2nd in Original Oratory). Andrew Turner (State Humorous Interp. Champion).

Other Wisconsin winners included:

Lisa Backus of Pius IX H.S. (5th in Girls extemp).

Karla Slasser of Durand H.S. (2nd in Lincoln Douglas Debate).

Catherine Coy of Eau Claire Memorial H.S. (8th in Original Oratory).

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

BALANCED BUDGET—TAX LIMITATION CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order the Senate will resume consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 58, which the clerk will state by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 58) proposing an amendment to the Constitution altering Federal fiscal decisionmaking procedures.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 58).

AMENDMENT NO. 1933

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, if any Member of the Senate wishes to speak on this constitutional amendment to balance the budget, it is a good time for them to do so. We have ample opportunity to hear from the various Senators. If they have amendments, we would like for them to put those amendments before the Senate if they have not already been put before the Senate.

I believe Senator FORD's amendment is before the Senate now.

Mr. FORD. The Senator from South Carolina is correct. My amendment to the constitutional amendment is the pending business.

Mr. THURMOND. What I was hoping was that we could have debate on these different amendments and maybe vote on all of them tomorrow without delay, if that would suit the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Well, the Senator from Kentucky is not prepared to accept that proposal now. We might be able to work out something that would be acceptable for voting beginning at 2 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. THURMOND. We want to go forward. The majority leader has a lot of legislation pending, and we would want to cooperate with him all we can and get through this amendment as soon as possible.

Mr. FORD. I assure the Senator from South Carolina I would like to do the same thing, and I understand the problems under which the majority labors. But I have an amendment I think is of vital importance to this country. I am not sure how we are going to have a balanced budget when the present administration cannot balance the budget.

They want to mandate that Congress do it. However, I think it is equally important, if not more so, that the President submit to Congress a balanced budget. That way both the President and Congress will be on the same working wavelength. We are not on that wavelength now that we are facing a budget that has over a $180 billion deficit. Congress was only able to cut it less than half. If we are going to get to a balanced budget, we will need better cooperation here in this Chamber and from the President. I want to see to it that the American people get the balanced budget of the Federal Government that I believe they desire.

Mr. THURMOND. Well, of course, I have previously called to the attention of the Senator to page 2 of this constitutional amendment section 1 where the wording is:

> The Congress and the President shall insure that actual outlays do not exceed the outlays set forth in such statement.

We think that puts the responsibility on the President, too, and we think that means if you want to make legislative history that he will submit a balanced budget unless there is some vital reason why he should not, in which event then he may ask for three-fourths of the Members of both parties to aquiesce in the situation.

Mr. FORD. Well, the Senator says that it implies that. It only means the President will have to sign a budget. It does not mean he has to submit a budget that is balanced. There is no language in the proposed consitutional amendment that says that he must. He has all of the workers, he has the budget examiners who are now working on the budget for 1983-84.

He has the office of OMB; he has every Cabinet Secretary. He has hundreds and hundreds of people out there working to develop his budget that he will submit next year. We do not have that. Also, we work from his budget, not ours. We work from the budget he submits, and the first budget we see is the one he submits. If that is not a balanced budget, then we start out behind. I do not think that is the proper posture for Congress to be in.

Mr. THURMOND. Of course, we have the congressional budget now, too, and Congress has an obligation, in fact it is mainly their obligation. The President can only recommend. The President just has two powers: One is to recommend and the other is to veto, and the President recommends, but Congress has the responsibility to authorize appropriations, Congress has the responsibility to make appropriations, and we feel that the wording in here would be sufficient to take care of that regardless of who the President is.

By the time this amendment is passed, we do not know whether we will have a Republican or a Democratic President. Then it provides they have 7 years to pass it, and if they take several years to do it—of course, I think President Reagan will be elected if he runs again but, at the same time, this 7-year period—then it does not take effect until 2 years after it has been ratified by three-fourths of the States. We feel that gives ample time for the situation.

Mr. FORD. Well, I think the distinguished Senator from South Carolina left out one power of the President. He forgot the power of persuasion, and the power of persuasion is something that your President is given a great deal of credit for. He may have only two powers, as the Senator says, but he also has the power of persuasion because he is the President of the United States. When he takes a Senator or Congressman to the Oval Office, he lobbies them pretty good. I have been one who has been there, and I understand what he can do and how he operates. So if he does not propose a balanced budget, we are placed in an untenable position.

Mr. THURMOND. Well, the power of persuasion, is not an official—in other words, that is not an official function of his. It is not an official duty that he has.

Mr. FORD. It is just as official as the other powers he has because——

Mr. THURMOND. Was he able to persuade the Senator from Kentucky when he took him to the Oval Office?

Mr. FORD. No; he was not.

Mr. THURMOND. It does not always work.

Mr. FORD. He called me into the Oval Office to get me to approve the AWACS sale. I did not like it, I did not like it and he did not like it very much when I voted against the sale.

Another President, when I voted against him, patted me on the back and wrote me a personal letter to say that it was a good thing.

Mr. THURMOND. It depends on the issues involved.

Mr. FORD. There is not much difference in the issues.

Mr. THURMOND. I am in agreement with the Senator on the Panama Canal. We should not have acted on that treaty.

Mr. FORD. Is the Senator saying that when I vote against a Democrat I am right but when I vote against a Republican I am wrong?

Mr. THURMOND. Not necessarily. It depends on the particular issue. I have voted against Republicans and Democrats.

Mr. FORD. I have not noticed the Senator doing so in the past year and a half.

Mr. THURMOND. I have served as a Democrat, as a Republican, as an Independent candidate I got elected, and also as a write-in I got elected. I tried all parties, so I belong to all the people in every way. It really does not bother me which party is in so long as they stand for the right thing. Of course, today there is no question about the soundest party sitting in this House here today is the Republican Party because we have more conservative people here. In fact, I have always thought the Senator ought to be sitting on this side of the aisle himself.

Mr. FORD. Well, Senator, I have tried awfully hard to find some goodness in the hearts of those who say I ought to be on the other side, and that goodness does not seem to be out to embrace and say "Come with us." I am only seeking a little amendment here. However, the Senator says I am on the wrong track. If I am on the wrong track on this point, the Senator will not buy me on anything else.

Mr. THURMOND. Not necessarily. You come up with a real good idea and we will grab it quickly. [Laughter.]

Is there any other Senator here today who wants to speak or can we get any other Senator here who wants to debate this matter? We will be glad to have debate on it so that tomorrow we can begin to vote as soon as we can. Maybe they do not care to debate any more on this.

Mr. FORD. I say to the Senator from South Carolina that if this amendment, or one similar, is not in the constitutional amendment, you are going to lose some Senators that would like to vote for it. Right now you do not have enough votes to pass it.

I would say to the Senator from South Carolina that if this amendment, or one similar to it, is in the constitutional amendment to balance the budget, it has a much better opportunity of passing than in its present form.

Now, the Senator has already told me today that he is going to accept the so-called Domenici and Chiles amendments. At least one of those amendments deals with the relationship of the President and the Congress. If he is going to accept them, I cannot understand why he would not accept my amendment. I cannot understand why my amendment, which requires the President to submit a balanced budget, is not just as important as the other amendments which deal with the relationship of the President and the Congress.

Mr. THURMOND. We think the Domenici amendment will improve the situation, but we feel we have taken care of the point the able Senator from Kentucky has raised.

Mr. FORD. Well, the Senator keeps saying it is implied, but he does not know whether the President will or will not submit a balanced budget. He cannot stand here and tell me that it is going to be a fact. The distinguished Senator from Utah is on the floor now and he said the other day he could not guarantee it.

All I want is cooperation. And the best way I know to get it is to include it in the amendment, not leave it out. You can argue anyway you want to, but it just does not make political sense or legal sense to leave it out.

Mr. THURMOND. Suppose the President felt he had to submit a balanced budget and it might be unbalanced. But how could he submit an unbalanced budget, because he would then have to depend on the Congress, three-fifths of both bodies, voting for it? I think you have to give him some flexibility.

For instance, he may submit a budget that is not balanced but he would say that because this is such a vital matter that goes to the national security of the Nation or goes to the distinct welfare of the Nation and, therefore, he feels that both bodies ought to adopt this matter by a three-fifths vote of the House and three-fifths vote of the Senate.

Mr. FORD. Well, let me ask the Senator this: He says he is not going to accept any amendments.

Mr. THURMOND. I did not say we are not going to accept any amendments.

Mr. FORD. That was what you originally intended.

Mr. THURMOND. We will consider any amendments that are offered, but we hope it will not be necessary.

Mr. FORD. The administration has submitted and suggested an amendment to take out "in case of war" and add "in case of national security." Is the Senator going to accept that amendment?

Mr. THURMOND. We have made no decision on that.

Mr. FORD. The administration does not like the constitutional amendment. They want to change it.

Mr. THURMOND. We will give consideration, of course, to any amendments that are offered, but we just felt the amendment offered by the able Senator from Kentucky is not acceptable in this matter now.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I am willing to debate any Senator who wants to oppose my amendment. I think that the Congress will be in a much better position to balance the budget. My amendment and the proposed constitutional amendment are integral parts, in my opinion. They have a common objective that makes both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue start out from the same spot to insure the Federal Government does not continue to allow high deficits.

My distinguished friend from South Carolina says it may be 9 years before this amendment takes effect and there may be a Democratic President in office. Right now, I am not worried about whether we have a Democrat or a Republican. I am more worried about whether we have a balanced Federal budget or not.

The deficits that we are seeing today are causing the high interest rates. The President could submit any kind of budget he wants to under this constitutional amendment, whether it is a $50 billion deficit or a $250 billion deficit. Then it is ours to balance or, by a three-fifths vote of each House, we could approve an unbalanced budget.

Well, this is one Senator that does not even vote to increase the debt ceiling. I have seen a lot of changes in the feelings in this Chamber concerning the legislation to raise the debt ceiling. I have been one on the Democratic side who has opposed a Democratic President and voted against increasing the debt ceiling. But I noticed those on the other side who, time after time voted against the debt ceiling under a Democrat, are now under a Republican vote to increase the debt ceiling. One of the largest items in our future budget will be the interest we are paying on the debt this country owes.

You are trying to put a smokescreen over the largest deficit in the history of this Nation by saying you want a constitutional amendment for a balanced budget. It is not washing with the American people. They want a balanced budget, but they want both sides to be a part of it. That is all I am attempting to do.

You could say you do not think it is a good one, but you go out to the coffee clubs and ask those coffee clubs, as I did last week, what they think about the President submitting a balanced budget. They will tell you he ought to submit one because that would basically assure the Congress would pass one.

The President has his David Stockmans, his Secretary Regans, he has all of these people to come up here and cajole Congress. He has a White House full of lobbyists who come up here and stand outside that door and tell us how to vote. The budget at the White House went up 31 percent so they could have more employees to lobby us to get their budgets through.

Now we come down to the bottom line and it is whether you want a balanced budget or if you are trying to fool the American people. If you are trying to fool the American people, then vote my amendment down. If you are not trying to fool the American people and really, truly and honestly want a balanced budget, you will take my amendment. And when these people see that the Congress has finally balanced the budget and we are back on the right track, they can say it is because both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue are on the same wavelength. The President introduced a balanced budget, the Congress passed one, and that is in the best interest of the future of this great country of ours, particularly our children and our children's children.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the New York Times, dated July 16, 1982, by Senator ORRIN G. HATCH, entitled, "Budget Rule: Yes—Politicians Need It."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 16, 1982]

BUDGET RULE: YES—POLITICIANS NEED IT

(By Orrin G. Hatch)

WASHINGTON.—The Senate this week began considering a balanced-budget amendment to the Constitution. With bipartisan support from more than 60 Senate cosponsors and more than 220 House co-sponsors, there is a realistic possibility that Congress may offer this amendment to the states for ratification as the 27th Amendment to the Constitution.

The most frequent criticism of the proposed amendment has been that it would "write economic policy into the Constitution." As Prof. Laurence Tribe of the Harvard Law School has observed, "The Constitution embodies fundamental law and should not be made the instrument of specific social or economic policies."

While I reject the implication that economic affairs are somehow foreign to the Constitution, I am nevertheless sympathetic to this criticism. I do not believe the Constitution ought to be amended to reflect economic theories that may happen to gain the support of ephemeral political majorities.

This criticism, however, badly misconceives the immediate amendment. Its primary objectives is not to write into the Constitution any permanent economic policy but rather to establish as an element of our national fiscal process a fundamental element of democratic government—accountability by elected representatives to the citizenry.

Such accountability is largely absent now because members of Congress do not have to vote to raise revenues in order to approve increased spending. They need not cast politically difficult votes to raise revenues commensurately but may simply resort to more deficit spending or do nothing and allow inflation in combination with our progressive tax system to produce automatically a greater share of the national wealth for the public sector.

In either case, Congress is free to respond to the concentrated political pressures of prospending groups with politically advantageous prospending votes without having to cast politically disadvantageous votes for higher taxes or reduced spending for other prospending interests. In other words, the virtually unlimited access by Congress to deficit spending and the regular availability of greater revenue through so-called tax-bracket creep operate to create a pronounced bias toward higher public spending.

Thus, year after year, public spending inexorably increases, whatever the genuine will of the people. The political advantages of prospending votes are direct and immediate to members of Congress, while the disadvantages of such votes—in the form of higher future inflation or unemployment or interest rates—are indirect and deferred. Indeed, there may be no disadvantages at all if those who are the victims of these economic ills are not sufficiently sophisticated to appreciate the causal relationship between the earlier spending and their present symptoms.

The proposed amendment would help overcome this institutional spending bias and establish a more equal competition in the fiscal process between organized and informed tax-spending interests and diffuse and ill-informed tax-paying interests. It would democratize the budget process by making it a more honest and open process. Congress would continue to be free to increase public spending but only in the event that it was equally prepared, as a condition, to vote for the necessary higher taxes or to go on record for a higher deficit. Tax increases would have to be voted explicitly rather than being implicitly imposed through deficit spending and inflation.

The proposed amendment merely says to Congress, in effect; "If you want to spend, let us, the people, know how such spending is going to be financed. If you want to tax, do so in an honest and aboveboard manner." So long as there is little more than a random relationship between decisions to spend and decisions to finance spending, our fiscal process will continue to be dishonest, with members of Congress perpetually able to avoid accountability for their spending and taxing decisions, perpetually able to escape public identification for their policies and perpetually able to reap the immediate political benefits of their actions while postponing indefinitely the political costs. Only a constitutional amendment can permanently right this process.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the comments my friend from Kentucky has made.

I believe that we have already expressed the case against his proposed amendment. I personally share the concerns of the Senator that the President not be exempted from the responsibilities of enforcing the provisions of this amendment. He raises an important issue. I believe, however, that the present amendment adequately deals with his concerns, while avoiding the weaknesses of his amendment. Let me summarize these points once more very briefly:

First, the amendment is superfluous in that its requirements are largely implicit in Senate Joint Resolution 58 already. If Congress is under a general responsibility—as it is—to balance its budget, then the President will effectively be under a similar obligation. In other words, the President's authority, in this regard, is largely limited to his informal responsibilities under law—not under the Constitution—to submit proposed budgets. To the extent that he submits something other than a balanced budget to Congress, after enactment of the amendment, he either has the burden of persuading three-fifths of Congress that it is necessary, or else risks losing all influence in the budget process. Whatever obligation is directly imposed upon Congress by this amendment will also be indirectly imposed upon the President by virtue of his role in the budget process.

Second, the amendment is harmful in that it would impose upon the Executive an absolute obligation to submit a balanced Federal budget, under all circumstances, without exception. This is totally inconsistent with the flexible obligation imposed upon the Congress to prepare a balanced budget unless three-fifths of the Members of each House of Congress conclude that a budget in deficit is warranted. In other words, while the present amendment provides flexibility to Congress with respect to the balanced budget mandate, the amendment from the Senator from Kentucky would impose a rigid and inflexible obligation with respect to the Executive. This obligation is inconsistent and unreasonable, and can only have the effect of requiring the Executive to submit a balanced budget under circumstances when he does not believe that such a budget is desirable or achievable.

Third, the amendment opens up questions that none of us can answer with certainty by imposing—for the first time—a direct, constitutional obligation upon the President of the United States to submit a budget. Presently, this obligation is derived solely from statute, not from the Constitution. The implication of this for the balance of power between the executive and the legislative is unclear. The present language in Senate Joint Resolution 58 does not upset the present separation of powers balance.

Finally, the amendment opens up the possibility for mischief in the event that a President who is at odds with the executive decides not to submit a budget until shortly prior to the outset of a fiscal year. In that event, Congress might have an unreasonably short period of time within which to prepare a budget in order to satisfy their own constitutional obligations under the proposed amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky would delay congressional passage of its budget until after receiving the budget required by section 1 of this article. This amendment opens up the possibility of unnecessary adversary relationships between the executive and the legislative that could work to the detriment of the budget process.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I emphasize that the objectives of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky are desirable ones, and are shared by the managers of this bill. It is simply our conclusion that these objectives would be better incorporated in simple legislation than in the body of the proposed amendment. I strongly urge the rejection of the pending amendment.

Mr. President, I might point out that there will be implementing legislation required by this amendment and I think that we can place in that legislation what the distinguished Senator from Kentucky desires. That would be far more preferable than treating this constitutional amendment as though it were a statute designed to accommodate every desire of every Member of the Congress. The time is short, and if we want a balanced budget amendment it seems to me we have to take Senate Joint Resolution 58 and resolve many of these issues in good faith in the subsequent implementing legislation. I would suggest we do that.

Rather than cluttering up the present amendment, which some feel is already long enough, we can readily resolve them through implementing legislation. I will be the first to assist the distinguished Senator from Kentucky in helping to get his language into that legislation. There is little reason, however, to place it into this amendment.

I yield the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. FORD. Will the Senator withhold?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am glad to withhold.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, it seems that there is such a clamor to oppose my amendment which requires the President to submit a balanced budget. I think my colleagues will recall, and if they do not recall I would like to say to them, that I am not alone in my call for the President of the United States to submit a balanced budget to Congress. Many of my colleagues in this body, and I would like to specifically mention the distinguished Senator from Utah, have even voted to require the President to submit a balanced budget.

In the last Congress, the Senator from Utah, the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Virginia, the Senator from Alabama, and myself all voted to require the President to submit a balanced budget to Congress. It was the distinguished Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) who proposed that amendment requiring the President to submit a balanced budget. At that time, the proponents of the Packwood amendment argued that it would be very useful in arriving at a balanced budget to know which programs the President would cut to attain it. They argued that this would give Congress an additional alternative to the balanced budget offered by the Senate and offered by the House.

Now that the shoe is on a different foot, we find that they are not only speaking differently but they are voting differently.

It would be my thought, Mr. President, that we should have some consistency concerning the balanced budget. Where last year we voted to require the President to send a balanced budget to the Congress, this year we do not want to do it. I do not understand that. It may be because the majority has changed. That may have more than a significant part to play in it. But it just does not make sense to me where on one hand you are for it and on the other hand you are against it. If it is good enough for Congress to balance the Federal budget, it certainly is good for the President. If we do not have his leadership. regardless of who he or she might be in the long-term future of this country, then we are going to have a very difficult time finding those who are willing to vote for additional taxes to balance the budget.

I was amazed and a little bit amused Friday morning at about 4:45 when there was a lot of wailing and gnashing of teeth in this Chamber by certain Members who were being requested to vote for additional taxes.

Almost $100 billion in new taxes over the next 3 years. The pressure was on us. There was no pressure on the President to submit a package to Congress for new taxes. It is all right to submit a plan for cutting taxes, but not for raising additional revenues. Let us see that the pressure is the same at the Oval Office and here, in the Capitol Building.

Mr. President, I understand that we are going to lay this aside or recess until tomorrow. I am perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FORD. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. He is right. I think it would be unwise to proceed very far with this matter today. It is important. The pending question, the Ford amendment, is one that deserves the consideration of every Senator. To tell the truth, we are far down on attendance this afternoon that I think all of us would be better served if we put this over until tomorrow.

Does the Senator from Virginia wish me to yield?

STATUS OF CONSIDERATION OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 58

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. What is the majority leader's plan with regard to this constitutional amendment resolution? We have been on it for 2 weeks. We have had very few votes on it. It has been set aside one or two times.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, let me tell the distinguished Senator I have had one or two conversations with the minority leader today on this subject. I expect us to be on this resolution all of this week. I hope very much to be able to finish it, perhaps even finish it on Thursday instead of Friday. As I have indicated to the minority leader and have previously stated on the floor, we shall be on this measure tkmkrrow, Wednesdax, and Thursday, and perhaps Friday.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, in other words, it has priority?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it does indeed, I shall do everything I can to see that it passes. I support the measure, and I think the time has come to deal with it.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I understand one Senator is on his way to the floor to speak, but not on this measure. If there is no other Senator seeking recognition on the pending business, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 2 p.m., in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE NATIONAL CORPORATION FOR HOUSING PARTNERSHIPS AND THE NATIONAL HOUSING PARTNERSHIP — MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 157

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I herewith transmit the Thirteenth Annual Report of the Independent National Corporation for Housing Partnerships and the National Housing Partnership, as required by Section 908(a) of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968.

RONALD REAGAN.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE ARMS CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT AGENCY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 158

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to transmit to you the 1981 Annual Report of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. I believe that this report, the first submitted by my administration and the 21st submitted since the creation of the Agency, marks a real coming of age and maturity in our approach to arms control and disarmament.

In 1981, we began the first in a series of negotiations with the Soviet Union to reduce the threat of nuclear war. The Intermediate-Range Nuclear Force (INF) talks, begun by Ambassador Paul H. Nitze's team in November, are a model for future negotiations with the Soviet Union.

It is our intention to deal with the most potentially destructive and politically destabilizing weapons first. In the INF talks, begun in Geneva, we are seeking to have the Soviet Union dismantle its intermediate-range nuclear weapons in exchange for our pledge not to deploy Pershing II and Cruise missiles as requested by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in December 1979.

Subsequently, in the period to be included in next year's annual report, we have undertaken major new initiatives in the Strategic Arms Reductions Talks (START), and in seeking reductions in conventional arsenals in the negotiations on Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions (MBFR). These and other important arms control initiatives of my administration are reviewed in my address of June 17, 1982, to the United Nations' Special Session on Disarmament, provided for your further information in an annex to the attached annual report.

Rather than seeking upper limits in arms control treaties, we seek to bring about real arms control through negotiated reductions. We are dedicated to reducing the threat of nuclear war by gradually reducing nuclear arsenals so that only those weapons which can reasonably guarantee mutual deterrence remain.

I am firmly convinced that the road we are following is both rational and realistic. We have analyzed the Soviet approach to military strategy and the threat posed by Soviet forces. We have concluded that arms control must play a vital role in the conduct of our foreign policy and as a complement to our policy of deterrence.

We are committed to deterrence. We shall stand by our Allies and friends, and we shall consult with them regularly as we go about the business of reestablishing our conventional and nuclear deterrent forces. Deterrence has worked in Europe for more than 35 years.

As you read through this 1981 Annual Report, I hope you will find, as I did, that the measured and considered approach to arms control, made possible by an exhaustive review and analysis, has, for the first time, resulted in a well considered program to reverse the trends of the past and bring about lasting peace.

We intend to pursue arms control and disarmament through agreements that are understandable, verifiable, and equitable. I am certain that I shall be able to call your attention to similar progress in future annual reports.

RONALD REAGAN.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 11:36 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Gregory, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bill, without amendment:

S. 2706. An act to amend title 28, United States Code, to modify the bar membership requirements for United States magistrates.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bill, with amendments, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 2317. An act to recognize the organization known as the National Federation of Music Clubs.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4441) to amend title 17 of the United States Code with respect to the fees of the Copyright Office, and for other purposes; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. KASTENMEIER, Mr. BROOKS, Mrs. SCHROEDER, Mr. FRANK, Mr. RAILSBACK, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. SAWYER as managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bill, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 5228. An act to amend title 18 of the United States Code to implement the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House has agreed to the following concurrent resolutions, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H. Con. Res. 278. Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that funding for community service employment programs for senior citizens for fiscal year 1983 and subsequent fiscal years should be provided at levels sufficient to maintain or increase the number of employment positions provided under such programs; and

H. Con. Res. 310. Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress that the President should consider and undertake certain efforts to help promote a settlement of the Cyprus conflict.

At 1:25 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Gregory, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the following bill:

H.R. 2160. An act to amend the Potato Research and Promotion Act.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bills, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 2329. An act conferring jurisdiction on certain courts of the United States to hear and render judgment in connection with certain claims of the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma; and

H.R. 6663. An act to delay the effective date of proposed amendments to rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

H.R. 2329. An act conferring jurisdiction on certain courts of the United States to hear and render judgment in connection with certain claims of the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 5228. An act to amend title 18 of the United States Code to implement the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED

The following concurrent resolutions were read, and referred as indicated:

H. Con. Res. 278. Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that funding for community service employment programs for senior citizens for fiscal year 1983 and subsequent fiscal years should be provided at levels sufficient to maintain or increase the number of employment positions provided under such programs; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

H. Con. Res. 310. Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress that the President should consider and undertake certain efforts to help promote a settlement of the Cyprus conflict; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOUSE BILL HELD AT DESK

The following bill was ordered held at the desk until the close of business on Tuesday, July 27, 1982, by unanimous consent:

H.R. 6663. An act to delay the effective date of proposed amendments to rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-1066. A petition from a citizen of San Francisco, Calif., urging the U.S. Senate to support Senate bill 6 to return America's currency to the gold standard; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

POM-1067. A resolution adopted by the City Council of Baltimore, Md., urging Congress to reject the cuts in domestic spending which are proposed in the President's 1982-83 budget; to the Committee on the Budget.

POM-1068. A joint resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 64

"Whereas, the growth of water hyacinth in the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta and the Suisun Marsh has recently occurred at an unprecedented level; and

"Whereas, the resulting accumulations of water hyacinth obstruct navigation, impair other recreational uses of waterways, and have the potential for damaging manmade facilities in the delta and the marsh; and

"Whereas, the public interest requires that both state and federal agencies cooperate in undertaking an aggressive program for the effective control of water hyacinth; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully requests the United States Army Corps of Engineers to cooperate with the state and local agencies in California in undertaking an aggressive program for the effective control of water hyacinth in the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta and the Suisun Marsh; and be it further

Resolved, that the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the United States Army Corps of Engineers, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senate and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-1069. A joint resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

"Whereas, the deposition of acid chemical compounds in rain, snow, fog, and dry particles has been recorded in many parts of California, including environmentally sensitive regions such as the Sierra Nevada Mountains; and

"Whereas, the acid deposition problem in California is substantially different in nature from the acid deposition problem experienced in the Eastern United States; and

"Whereas, California continues to experience levels of air pollution which are adverse to public health and agriculture, and as a result there is a continuing need for improved scientific knowledge of the causes and effects of air pollution, and of advanced technologies to reduce harmful emission; and

"Whereas, the Congress has recognized the significance of the problem of acid deposition by enacting the Acid Precipitation Act of 1980, which established the Federal Interagency Task Force on Acid Precipitation and mandated the preparation of a National Acid Precipitation Assessment Plan to identify the causes, sources, and effects of acid precipitation; and

"Whereas, since 1981, the level of federal support for independent scientific research related to the causes, effects, and control of air pollution and acid deposition has been significantly reduced, and drastic cuts in research spending are proposed, by the federal administration for the 1983 fiscal year; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, that the Legislature of the State of California hereby memorializes the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States to provide for a detailed study and evaluation of the problem of acid deposition in the Western United States in the development and implementation of the National Acid Precipitation Assessment Plan; and be it further

Resolved, that the Legislature memorializes the President of the United States, the Congress, and the Environmental Protection Agency to reverse the policy of reduced federal support for independent scientific research into the causes, effects, and control of air pollution and acid deposition; and be it further

Resolved, that the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-1070. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 88

"Whereas, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia has held that the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) must issue regulations covering dams as a point source category under Section 402 of the Clean Water Act (Public Law 92-500); and

"Whereas, in the case of National Wildlife Federation vs. Gorsuch issued on January 29, 1982, United States District Court Judge Joyce Hens Green ruled that certain water quality conditions associated with dams and reservoirs should be dealth with as a "discharge" of pollutants prohibited by Section 301 of Public Law 92-500; and

"Whereas, Judge Green has rejected EPA's long-held position that the National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System (NPDES) does not apply to releases from reservoirs and the Court has held that the EPA has violated a nondiscretionary duty in failing to regulate dams with NPDES permits; now therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, that Public Law 92-500 be amended to eliminate the application of National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System permits to releases from reservoirs; and, be it further Resolved, that the Chief Clerk of the Assembly is directed to forward ckpies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, to the Chairman of the House Committee on Transportation and Public Works, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-1071. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 106.

"Whereas, It is important that consumers be assured of buying only sweet, ripe table grapes, and this assurance is provided with respect to domestic grapes by the application of state and federal quality standards; and

"Whereas, The federal quality standards do not apply to imported table grapes, and there is no assurance that these grapes meet the same sweetness and quality requirements that domestic grapes must meet; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and Congress of the United States to enact appropriate legislation to require that imported table grapes comply with the same federal requirements applicable to domestic table grapes regarding grade, size, quality, and maturity; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator tnd Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-1072. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 55

"Whereas, The United States Congress has currently under its consideration a number of legislative proposals which provide for the creation of enterprise zones; and

"Whereas, The California Legislature is also considering legislation which may result in the creation of some form of enterprise zones; and

"Whereas, It is deemed to be desirable that any legislation approved by the California Legislature with respect to enterprise zones should, to the extent feasible, be consistent with and complementary to the federal program; and

"Whereas, The proposed enterprise zone legislation currently before the Congress sets forth certain criteria and conditions required for the designation of enterprise zones such as population decline, chronic abandonment of housing or commercial buildings, and substantial tax arrearage in an area; and

"Whereas, There exists in certain regions of the country, areas of severe economic distress which are often characterized by conditions other than those described above; and

"Whereas, Certain of these characteristics which are prevalent in California and other western and southern states should be considered by the Congress as appropriate criteria or conditions for the designation of enterprise zones, such as a high refugee or immigrant population, economic dislocation as a result of boomtown phenomena associated with resource development projects, and areas substantially impacted by closure of major employers; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorialize the President and the Congress of the United States to consider conditions of economic distress which exist in the western region of the United States when determining the criteria which will be used in designating an area a federal enterprise zone; and be it further

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-1073. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Alabama; to the Committee on Finance:

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas, H.R. 5868 and S. 2376, introduced respectively in the United States House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate, are companion bills designed to initiate the most significant change in our Federal Tax System since the first Income Tax Law was adopted almost seven decades ago; and

"Whereas, the aforementioned bills call upon the Treasury Department to conduct a study detailing the economic and administrative consequences of adopting a flat rate Gross Income Tax System; and

"Whereas, preliminary studies by a prominent Washington economist indicate that the GIT rates would not exceed 7½ percent for any class of taxpayers, a far cry from the tremendous burden now heaped upon the shoulders of the American taxpayer; and

"Whereas, the legislation also would serve to drastically reduce or eliminate the complicated tax paperwork now required of individuals, business and government as well; and

"Whereas, following completion of the Treasury Department's study, a comprehensive bill to change from our present net income tax system to the new GIT system would be introduced in the 98th Congress (1982-83) to provide for a fair and simple income tax system for all Americans; now therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of Alabama, both houses thereof concurring, That we strongly urge the Alabama Congressional Delegation and the entire Congress to support legislation for the Gross Income Tax System and direct that copies of this resolution be dispatched to each member of the Alabama Delegation, and to the presiding officers of each House of Congress, with a further request that this resolution be placed in the Congressional Record evidencing Alabama's support of a fair and equitable system of taxation."

POM-1074. A joint resolution adopted by the city council of the city of Plainfield, N.J. urging Congress to initiate and enter into a mutual nuclear weapons freeze with the Soviet Union; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-1075. A resolution adopted by the city council of the city of Parama, Ohio, urging Congress to establish a permanent, international nuclear weapons ban; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-1076. A resolution adopted by the Penn Central Conference of the United Church of Christ urging the United States and the Soviet Union to stop the nuclear arms race; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-1077. A resolution adopted by the Penn Central Conference of the United Church of Christ supporting the efforts leading to nuclear freeze between all nations with nuclear weapons or nuclear weapon capability; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-1078. A resolution adopted by the Penn Central Conference of the Church of Christ urging the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to freeze the production and deployment of nuclear weapons as an initial step toward nuclear disarmament; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-1079. A resolution adopted by the Jewish War Veterans, U.S.A., Department of New York, supporting the decision of the State of Israel in its determination and resolve to remove the constant threat to the lives of the population living in northern Israel; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-1080. A resolution adopted by the Associated Students of Western Washington University, Bellingham, Wash., urging Congress to pass laws redistricting the existing telephone companies' boundaries to correspond to State borders; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-1081. A resolution adopted by the Associated Students of Western Washington University, Bellingham, Wash., urging Congress to adopt any and all laws and/or regulations necessary to prevent the further deaths of any handicapped children such as "infant Doe" who died of starvation in Bloomington, Ind., on April 15, 1982; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-1082. A resolution adopted by the Associated Students of Western Washington University, Bellingham, Wash., urging Congress to pass the Human Life Amendment presently under consideration; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-1083. A resolution adopted by the Associated Students of Western Washington University, Bellingham, Wash., urging Congress to adopt a constitutional amendment that will make an automobile, or any method of personal transportation, an extension of one's personal residence; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-1084. A resolution adopted by the Associated Students of Western Washington University, Bellingham, Wash., urging Congress to reevaluate rules and regulations concerning foreign immigrations; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-1085. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 68

"Whereas, The current regulations of the United States Parole Commission and the Bureau of Federal Prisons prohibit the notification of local law enforcement agencies of the presence of prisoners and parolees in the community except under prescribed circumstances; and

"Whereas, Adequate identification and information relating to federal prerelease prisoners and parolees residing in or temporarily domiciled in the state is not being released to the local law enforcement agencies and this effectively impedes the efforts of such agencies to protect the public; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation giving the United States Parole Commission and the Bureau of Federal Prisons the authority to release all relevant information concerning persons under their respective jurisdictions who are or may be residing or temporarily domiciled while on parole, or who are or may be housed in a halfway house, residential community treatment center, or other prerelease facility, or who are or may be released from an institution on a furlough or other form of release prior to parole or discharge, in the State of California, and who have been convicted of a federal crime which could have been prosecuted as a felony under the penal provisions of this state, to local law enforcement agencies; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully requests the United States Parole Commission and the Bureau of Federal Prisons to promulgate the necessary regulations as soon as possible to facilitate the speedy ongoing exchange of relevant information between the commission and the bureau and affected local law enforcement agencies regarding federal prerelease prisoners and parolees who are or will be housed or paroled in their local communities and who have been convicted of a federal crime which could have been prosecuted as a felony under the penal provisions of this state.

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, to the United States Parole Commission, the Bureau of Federal Prisons, and to the United States Department of Justice."

POM-1086. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 94

"Whereas, The number of elderly Americans has been growing rapidly as evidenced by a daily net increase of 1,600 persons over the age of 65 in the United States; and

"Whereas, By the year 2030, older Americans are expected to comprise nearly 20 percent of this nation's total population, up dramatically from the current figure of 11.3 percent; and

"Whereas, Currently 1.5 million Americans, including 5 percent of persons over age 65, are confined to nursing homes or similar institutions, and this number is expected to grow to approximately 2 million people by the year 2000 unless present policies toward long-term care are reversed; and

"Whereas, In 1979 alone, nursing home care expenditures amounted to $17.8 billion in the United States, with 56.7 percent paid by the federal government; and

"Whereas, The need for long-term care is rapidly escalating and federal and state governments' ability to raise the revenues necessary to provide such care is limited, requiring a thorough reevaluation of programs that finance long-term care to avoid the prospects of a costly buildup of nursing home facilities; and

"Whereas, One alternative to institutionalization is increased use of home health care services; and

"Whereas, Movement in this direction has been retarded by federal Medicaid and Medicare policies that create financial incentives which favor care for the chronically ill elderly in nursing homes; and

"Whereas, Medicare's home health care coverage is aimed primarily at serving the elderly with acute care needs and, as a result, it largely excludes those who require extended care, with particularly restrictive requirements that recipients be homebound and services be performed by skilled professionals; and

"Whereas, Legislation in the form of S. 234 (Hatch, R-Utah) has been introduced in Congress to encourage establishment of home health programs, to provide expanded coverage of home health services under Medicare and Medicaid, and to encourage individuals to provide for the care of elderly dependents in the home, thereby deemphasizing premature and unnecessary institutionalization; and

"Whereas, S. 234 would amend the Public Health Service Act to provide grants to public and nonprofit private entities and loans to proprietary home health entities for the specific purpose of meeting the initial costs of establishing and operating home health programs, and for the training of professional and paraprofessional home health personnel; and

"Whereas, S. 234 would broaden eligibility standards for those needing home health care under Medicare to include skilled nursing care, the services of a homemaker home health aide on a part-time or intermittent basis, or physical, speech, occupational, or respiratory therapy; and

"Whereas, S. 234 requests the United States Department of Health and Human Services to assemble and study all available information on alternative reimbursement mechanisms for home health agencies in order to determine the most cost-effective and efficient ways of providing home health services; and

"Whereas, S. 234 provides a major incentive for development of home health care in the form of a five hundred dollar ($500) income tax credit available to individuals who support a dependent person in their home who would otherwise require institutionalization if adequate care at the home were unavailable; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, Respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to enact the Community Home Health Services Act of 1981 in order to encourage the establishment of home health programs, to expand the coverage of home health services for the elderly and disabled under Medicare and Medicaid programs, and to encourage individuals to provide care for qualified dependents in the home; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Chairman of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, to the Chairman of the House Energy and Labor Committee—Subcommittee on Health, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-1088. A resolution adopted by the Associated Students of Western Washington University, Bellingham, Wash., urging Congress to pass laws insuring that nationwide election results will not be broadcast until all polls are closed so as not to affect voting patterns in most Western States; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

POM-1089. A resolution adopted by the General Synod of the Reformed Church in America opposing the redistribution of our national resources to increased military spending at the expense of spending for social programs that meet essential human needs; ordered to lie on the table.

ENFORCEMENT OF ANTITRUST LAWS

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing, on behalf of myself and Senators RUDMAN, DANFORTH, and STAFFORD, legislation which would partially overturn, in a carefully confined manner, a 1977 Supreme Court ruling which has caused severe economic consequences to the States and their citizens. The case is Illinois Brick Co. against Illinois, 431 U.S. 720 (1977), in which the Court held that those who deal directly with an antitrust violator—direct purchasers—are entitled to sue that violator to recover damages for price fixing.

The States and their citizens normally are not direct purchasers—they purchase goods through independent retailers and other intermediaries. Frequently, these intermediaries pass on to the ultimate consumers the higher prices caused by illegal price fixing by the intermediaries' suppliers. Not only have the intermediaries not injured in such case, but they are reluctant to bring suit because they are dependent on a good relationship with their suppliers for future business success.

The States and their citizens, who pay the higher prices to intermediaries for the goods, are the true injured parties; but the Illinois Brick decision unfairly precludes these victims of this particularly blatant and costly form of antitrust violation from any means of redress. This has seriously eroded the fair and effective enforcement of the Nation's antitrust laws. Especially in these difficult economic times, it is essential that States be given the effective ability to fight price fixing which substantially increases the cost of goods to their citizens—as taxpayers and as consumers.

The Illinois Brick Court did recognize that the decision might conflict with the intent of the Federal antitrust statutes. It, therefore, invited the Congress, if it disagreed with the result in the case, to provide "clear directions * * * to the contrary." S. 1874 in the 95th Congress and S. 300 in the 96th were the Senate Judiciary Committee's responses to the Court's invitation. Although placed on the calendar, neither bill was considered on the floor of the Senate.

The bill we are today proposing also responds to the Supreme Court's invitation, but unlike the previous expansive and controversial proposals, it would take a more limited approach. It would overturn Illinois Brick (in part), but would limit prosecution on behalf of indirect purchasers to the U.S. Attorney General and the State attorneys general. The attorneys general would be able to prosecute on behalf of the States, and on behalf of the citizens of their States—parens patriae. In this manner, our proposal would permit indirect purchasers their day in court, but, by limiting prosecution to a set group of law enforcement officers, it would dispel any fear that reversing Illinois Brick might open the floodgates of private litigation and class actions.

This bill also would insure that defendants would not suffer multiple liability arising out of actions by both direct and indirect purchasers. Defendants would be allowed to prove as a partial or complete defense that the purchaser passed on additional costs in higher prices to subsequent purchasers. This would permit apportionment of any damage award to victims according to their actual losses. The proposal further would provide for attorneys' fees to defendants in the case of bad faith or vexatious prosecution. It would apply prospectively only. The bill, in fact, is identical in substance to amendment No. 1893, which the same Senators have proposed to S. 995, the Antitrust Equal Enforcement Act.

I believe this legislation is a responsible, carefully confined approach to the problem of restoring to our Federal and State governments the opportunity to initiate suit to recover dollars illegally appropriated from their taxpayers and citizens by price fixers and bid riggers. Both equity and current economic conditions demand that we not further delay taking this limited, but much-needed and overdue, step.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of our proposed legislation and a copy of a recent resolution of the National Association of Attorneys General strongly supporting this proposal.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2772

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Clayton Act is amended by inserting after section 4H, the following:

"INDIRECT ACTIONS

"SEC. 4I. (a) In any action under section 4 of the Clayton Act, the fact that a State or any political subdivision thereof, and in any action under section 4A of the Clayton Act, the fact that the United States, has not purchased goods or services directly from a defendant shall not bar or otherwise limit recovery; and in any action under section 4C of the Clayton Act to secure monetary relief for injury sustained by natural persons to their property by reason of having purchased goods or services with respect to which there was an agreement by the defendant to fix prices in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act, the fact that a natural person has not purchased goods or services directly from a defendant shall not bar or otherwise limit recovery.

"(b) In any action under section 4 of the Clayton Act, the defendant shall be entitled to prove as a partial or complete defense to a damage claim, in order to avoid duplicative liability to it, that the plaintiff has passed on to others, who are themselves entitled to recover under sections 4, 4A, or 4C of this Act, some or all of what otherwise would constitute plaintiff's damage.

SEC. 2. The amendments made by this Act shall not apply to any injury sustained prior to the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 3. Section 4 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. 15) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The court may, in its discretion, award a reasonable attorney's fee to a prevailing defendant upon finding that the plaintiff has acted in bad faith, vexatiously, wantonly, or for oppressive reasons.".

SEC. 3. Section 1407(h) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking out "section 4C of".

RESOLUTION: ILLINOIS BRICK

Whereas, proposed legislation pending in the United States Congress that would have the effect of overruling the United States Supreme Court decision in Illinois Brick Company v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720 (1977), is vitally important to the treasuries of state, federal, and local governments; the pocketbooks of all taxpayers and citizens; and the integrity of the free enterprise economy of this nation; Now therefore, be it

Resolved, that the National Association of Attorneys General:

1. Reaffirms its strong support for federal legislation to reverse the effects of Illinois Brick v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720 (1977), so that state Attorneys General may pursue fully price fixing and bid rigging cases under the Sherman Act; and

2. Commends United States Senators Slade Gorton, Warren Rudman, John Danforth, and Robert Stafford for their efforts to bring such legislation to the floor of the Senate for consideration by the entire Senate; and

3. Authorizes the General Counsel of this Association to transmit these views to the Administration, the Congress and other interested individuals.●

By Mr. HAYAKAWA:

S. 2773. A bill to amend the Export Administration Act of 1979; to the Committee on Finance.

OIL EXPORT LEGISLATION

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, today I am introducting legislation which could help the United States improve its relations with Mexico and Japan. Discussions with the Departments of Defense, Energy and Commerce have convinced me that my proposal to give the President the authority to export Alaskan oil to Japan in exchange for a similar amount of oil from Mexico makes sense. Although oil from Mexico is not the solution to our energy problems, it will help us reduce our dependence on Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC).

When the Congress debated this subject in 1979, many of my colleagues argued that because the Jones Act requires that products shipped from one American port to another must be carried in American-flagships, the Maritime Administration would suffer an undue hardship if we shipped oil to Japan in foreign-flag ships. Addressing this concern, my bill requires that Amercian-flag ships be used to transport the oil.

Presently about one-third of the approximately 1.6 million barrels of oil per day produced in Alaska is shipped through the Panama Canal to the Gulf of Mexico and Eastern States, at a cost of approximately $5 per barrel compared to $3 per barrel to ship oil from the Port of Valdez to the Far East. Not only would my proposal reduce the present transportation costs but it would also alleviate some of the problems which the President's eibargo of technology to the Soviets has placed on our allies, the Japanese.

Last month, the President prohibited the American firm, Schlumberger Ltd., from exporting its logging equipment to a consortium of Japanese companies for completion of the Sakhalin project. Under the Sakhalin project, the Japanese agreed 7 years ago to provide the necessary technology for exploring a Soviet gas field in the Sea of Okhotsk in exchange for 3 million metric tons of gas for 20 years from the Soviet Union. Although the Sakhalin project is almost complete, the Japanese desperately need American technology. The President banned the sale of this technology because the Sakhalin project is in the Soviet Union's Sea of Okhotsk. Meanwhile the Japanese have already spent $160 million and are not too pleased with the effects of our embargo. The Japanese are 88 percent dependent on imports to meet their primary energy needs. Japan needs a stable source of oil. We could supply them with some of this oil. If the President determined that oil exports were not in the national interest, he or she would have the authority to abandon our contract with Japan.

Mr. President, many people may wonder how I can even contemplate this subject at a time when we are so desperately trying to reduce our dependence on foreign countries for oil. Simply put, the United States would not lose any oil if my proposal were enacted. In exchange for the oil that we exported to Japan, we would receive the same amount of oil from Mexico, which has expressed an interest in this proposal. Every barrel of imports from Mexico is a barrel less of imports from the Eastern hemisphere; both our national security and our balance of payment positions are thereby improved. At a time when our relations with Latin America are deteriorating, this proposed action speaks louder than words simply calling for improved ties between Mexico and the United States. Revenues which Mexico received from trade with the United States could be used to support revitalization and development projects in which our neighbor to the south has expressed an interest. As a key country in Latin America, Mexico could set an example to its neighboring countries in Central America, thereby encouraging them to develop their oil resources for export. Our new ties with Mexico could demonstrate that we are truly interested in improving our trade relations with Latin America.

Let me remind my colleagues that there is a glut of Alaskan oil on the west coast primarily because most of California's refineries cannot handle the heavy high-sulfur Alaskan crude. Consequently, we ship oil through the Panama Canal to the East and Gulf States which are capable of refining the heavy crude. Not only is the process costly but it is also cumbersome. Under the present plan, oil goes from Alaska's Port of Valdez on a large tanker to the Panama Canal. Since the tanker cannot fit through the canal, the oil is removed and placed on smaller vessels headed for the Gulf and Eastern States. The Panama pipeline scheduled to operate this winter will partially alleviate the complicated process.

However, Japan's refineries are also capable of handling the Alaskan crude. While Alaskan oil exports will not substantially reduce the amount of oil presently going through Panama, they will encourage production of Alaskan oil. Presently about 85 percent of Alaska's oil is produced in the Prudoe Bay. By 1986, the Kuparuk Field's present production of 50,000 barrels per day of oil is expected to increase by 250,000 barrels per day, Why not ship some of this oil to Japan? While we will not reduce our present oil supply because we will swap oil exported for oil imported, we shall reduce the trade deficit between Japan and the United States. At the same time we would strengthen our ties with Mexico and Japan. The United States would not lose one drop of oil. In fact, we could obtain a sweeter grade crude from Mexico. In addition, we would save approximately $2 per barrel in transportation expense, and generate higher Federal tax revenues.

Mr. President, I encourage my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2773

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (d)(3) of section 7 of the Export Administration Act of 1979 (50 U.S.C. App. 2406), is amended to read as follows:

"(3)(A) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section or of any other law, including subsection (u) of section 28 of the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920 (30 U.S.C. 185), the President is authorized, subject to the provisions of subparagraph (B), to enter into a bilateral interntional oil supply agreement, with any country pursuant to the International Emergency Oil Sharing Plan of the International Energy Agency, pursuant to which the United States would export to such country crude oil from whatever source in exchange for an equal amount of crude oil from supplies owned or otherwise controlled by that country.

"(B) The President shall have no authority to enter into a bilateral agreement pursuant to subparagraph (A), unless he has first determined and published expressed findings to the effect that the exporting of such crude oil from the United States to such country (i) will result through convenience or increased efficiency of transportation in lower prices for consumers of petroleum products in the United States, and (ii) will be helpful to the United States in connection with its balance of payments.

"(C) In no case shall the President enter into any bilateral agreement pursuant to this paragraph unless such agreement contains provisions sufficient—

"(i) to assure that all oil exported pursuant to such agreement shall be shipped in United States-flagships, if such ships are available; and

"(ii) to enable the President to terminate or suspend any such agreement if the President determines that crude oil supplies of the United States are interrupted, threatened, or diminished, or such termination or suspension is otherwise essential to the national interests of the United States.".

By Mr. DENTON (by request):

S. 2775. A bill to amend the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Act of 1981 to include emergency assistance generally, to remove certain burdensome and unnecessary Federal administrative requirements on State programs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

THE LOW-INCOME HOME ENERGY ASSISTANCE ACT

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I am introducing today, at the administration's request, a bill that amends the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Act to allow program funds to be used to provide emergency assistance to low-income families, and to remove certain restrictions found in the current statute. The title of the block grant would be changed to the low-income home energy and emergency assistance block grant, and funding would be authorized at a level of $1.3 billion for both fiscal years 1983 and 1984.

The bill is particularly important in light of recent action taken by the Finance Committee to repeal the program for emergency assistance for needy families with children. Under this program, which was part of AFDC, States could provide emergency financial assistance to families with dependent children who faced such crises as eviction, illness, loss of employment, desertion, severe accident, natural disaster or wage garnishment.

With repeal of the emergency assistance program by the Finance Committee, there is no Federal program that contains authorizing language permitting financial assistance to victims of crises such as those mentioned above. This bill provides the necessary authorizing language and allows State officials, if they so choose, to provide emergency financial assistance services to any low-income households, not just those with dependent children.

In addition, the bill removes many unnecessary Federal requirements contained in the current low-income home energy assistance block grant statute. Although the block grant approved last year removed many of the most cumbersome requirements, this bill goes further and removes restrictions that were found, during the block grant's initial year of operation, to be ineffectual or duplicative.

The new bill simplifies the application process, requiring only that a State submit a report on the intended use of the block grant funds. The report need cover no more than the goals and objectives of the program, the activities to be funded to accomplish the goals, the types of households that will be served, the areas within the State where the program will be operated, and a description of the criteria and administrative methods for disbursing block grant funds.

The bill also simplifies State auditing requirements, removes the 15 percent ceiling on the amount of funds a State may spend for weatherization, gives State officials greater flexibility in choosing local agencies to carry out portions of the program and eliminates language specifying how States make payments to energy suppliers. The result of this streamlining will be increased State flexibility in the use of Federal block grant money.

This proposal is wholly consistent with the administration's goal of giving the States maximum discretion in the use of Federal money. Local officials are in the best position to determine who in their jurisdictions are most in need, and to determine how the funds can best be used to help these people. No highly detailed Federal program can hope to address the widely varying needs of 50 disparate populations. A far better approach is to give funds to the States with as few strings attached as possible, and to allow them to formulate a program that meets their individual needs. This bill is a further step toward that goal. It returns substantial decisionmaking responsibility to the States, and allows them to use their funds to address a wider spectrum of problems than could be dealt with under current law.

I commend the administration for proposing this legislation, which will allow people who are victims of emergency circumstances often beyond their control to remain eligible for much needed assistance, and which broadens substantially the range of services that can be provided under this program.

As chairman of the Aging, Family and Human Services Subcommittee, which has jurisdiction over the low-income home energy assistance block grant, I can assure the Senate that the subcommittee will consider this proposal carefully and thoroughly.●

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. METZENBAUM):

S. 2776. A bill to provide that disability benefits under title II of the Social Security Act may not be terminated without evidence of medical improvement, to limit the number of periodic reviews, and to provide that benefits continue to be paid through a determination by an administrative law judge; to the Committee on Finance.

EMERGENCY SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY AMENDMENTS OF 1982

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation designed to address the unnecessary and unintended suffering and hardship experienced by hundreds of thousands of social security disability insurance (SSDI) beneficiaries. As a result of the Social Security Disability Amendments of 1980, all nonpermanent disability cases must be reviewed at least once every 3 years and all permanent cases every 7 years. These reviews, called continuing disability investigations (CDI's), have resulted in hundreds of thousands of disabled persons facing the abrupt termination of their disability benefits only to have benefits reinstated after many months of reconsiderations and appeals. The bill I am introducing today for myself, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) and the Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) addresses the unanticipated problems created by the disability reviews.

Mr. President, the problems created by the CDI's has generated a great deal of anxiety and indignation among individuals concerned with the welfare of disabled Americans. The purpose of the 1980 amendments was to assure that individuals who were no longer disabled were removed from the disability rolls thereby helping to provide adequate funds for individuals truly in need of assistance. The rapid expansion of the social security disability insurance program during the 1970's together with the projected shortfalls in the disability insurance trust fund, led to the enactment of the review requirement. The 1980 amendments were never intended as a means of reopening hundreds of thousands of disability cases but rather were designed to improve the administration of the program and to remove individuals from the disability rolls who had medically recovered or who had returned to substantial employment.

Mr. President, what has happened instead is that the implementation of the 1980 amendments, which the administration voluntarily launched 9 months earlier than required by law, has resulted in the severe hardship of hundreds of thousands of disability beneficiaries who are forced to go without benefits for many months, and who must demonstrate at several different levels within the appeals process, that their disabilities continue and that they remain legally eligible for benefits. This would not be so troublesome if the majority of individuals who were forced to go through this process were individuals who were no longer disabled and, therefore, no longer eligible for benefits. However, this is not the case. About two-thirds of the terminations of current beneficiaries by the administration were reinstated after appeal.

Current data indicates that of all beneficiaries who are reviewed about 50 percent are initially terminated from the rolls. Of those 50 percent who appeal the decision, about 67 percent are later proven eligible for disability benefits in front of an administrative law judge. All of those individuals who are later shown to be eilgible must find alternative funds for basic sustenance, perhaps by selling their homes or other essential possessions, during the sometimes lengthy appeals process. Some beneficiaries have had to wait 6 to 12 months to get a hearing. Even though individuals who prove the continued existence of their disability will receive retroactive payments covering the period when their benefits were terminated, their previous financial status is often irretrievable. In addition, many of these beneficaries will lose up to 25 percent of their wrongfully terminated benefits in attorney's fees.

Mr. President, this is a situation that has not gone unnoticed by the Congress. The Subcommittee on Social Security of the Committee on Ways and Means first held hearings at which I testified in March of this year. The Select Committee on Aging in the House also held several days of hearings on this unfortunate and unnecessary situation. In the Senate, the Subcommittee on General Oversight and Government Management of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, under the leadership of Senators LEVIN and COHEN, held an indepth hearing on CDI's receiving testimony from aggrieved beneficiaries as well as from the Social Security Administration.

Numerous bills have been introduced that either attempt to enact comprehensive modifications in the review process or provide a series of short-term emergejcy measures designed to mollify some of the more onerous consequences of current practice until a more comprehensive and long-term response can be devised. A comprehensive approach—H.R. 6181—introduced by Representatives PICKLE and ARCHER in the House was ordered reported by the Committee on Ways and Means but pulled back after a controversy developed over certain key provisions. Although there appears to be a broad base of support for action on this matter in the Congress, as the history surrounding H.R. 6181 indicates, successful enactment of legislation remains in jeopardy until we can achieve a consensus on a single course of action. The bill I am introducing today is designed to provide that needed consensus.

The legislation which I am introducing today was developed by a broad-based coalition of groups concerned with the needs of disabled Americans. The proposal contains selected provisions taken from several other bills necessary to halt the wrongful termination of hundreds of thousands of disability beneficiaries until Congress is able to develop a more comprehensive solution. While all of the provisions contained in the bill I am introducing today are in other pieces of legislation, no single bill contains only these three essential provisions necessary for alleviating the needless suffering of disabled persons.

Section 1 of the bill requires evidence of medical improvement or instances of a clearly erroneous initial decision for purposes of terminating benefits. Section 2 of the bill slows down the number of disability reviews made at the discretion of the Secretary by limiting the number of reviews of current beneficiaries to the total number of new beneficiaries within the preceding calendar year. The review requirement for all new beneficiaries would be limited to an initial review after 3 years with all additional reviews at the discretion of the Secretary. Section 3 of the bill provides for continued benefits until a final determination has been made by an administrative law judge subject to the overpayment provisions in determinations not in favor of the beneficiary.

Mr. President, it is my hope that all of us who are deeply concerned about the needless suffering of innocent Americans can agree on the carefully balanced approach developed by this coalition of disability groups. It is absolutely essential that we continue to strengthen and develop the bipartisan support that has emerged in response to this national tragedy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that immediately following the conclusion of my remarks there be printed the following material: A copy of a letter I received on July 23, 1982, signed by Jay B. Cutler, on behalf of the national organizations and disability groups that participated in the development of S. 2776, and the full text of S. 2776.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Dirksen Senate Office Building,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR RIEGLE: On behalf of the undersigned national organizations and their membership, representing disability groups as well as medical and other professional organizations, I wanted to express our deep appreciation for your leadership in efforts to ameliorate the tragic situation now confronting disabled individuals under the Social Security Disability Insurance Program.

As you are aware, we are extremely concerned that the Senate act promptly to protect those individuals whose benefits are being unjustly terminated due to the Social Security Administration's continuing disability investigations. We believe that the following three legislative provisions are critical to that effort:

(1) There must be evidence of medical improvement or that the original decision granting benefits was clearly erroneous before SSA may terminate disability benefits;

(2) The Continuing Disability Investigation (CDI) process be slowed down to assure that the reviews are being accomplished fairly and accurately;

(3) Benefits should be continued through the Administrative Law Judge level.

Draft language for each of these three provisions is attached.

Thank you for your continued concern, and we look forward to working further with you and your staff as we seek a mutual solution to this critical problem.

Sincerely,

JAY B. CUTLER,
Special Counsel and Director, Division of Government Relations, American Psychiatric Association.

S. 2776

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a)(1) section 223(d) of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(7)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), in order for a benefit under this section, or a child's, widow's, or widower's benefit based upon disability, to be terminated on the grounds that the physical or mental impairment or impairments on the basis of which such benefit was payable have ceased, did not exist, or are no longer disabling, the Secretary must determine and document that, based upon current medical evidence and such individual's medical history, there has been a medical improvement in the case of the individual's impairment or impairments of such a degree that such individual is no longer disabled under the criteria for evaluation of disability in effect at the time of such prior determination, or that the prior determination that such individual was under a disability was clearly erroneous under the criteria for evaluation of disability in effect at the time of such prior determination.

"(B) Subparagraph (A) shall not apply in the case of a termination of benefits based upon a finding made in accordance with paragraph (4) that services performed or earnings derived from services demonstrate an individual's ability to engage in substantial gainful activity.".

(2) The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply with respect to determinations (that individuals are not entitled to benefits) made on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b)(1) Section 221 (i) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows: "(i) In any case where an individual is determined to be under a disability, such determination shall be reviewed by the applicable State agency or the Secretary (as may be appropriate), for purposes of continuing eligibility, within three years after the date of the determination; except that where a finding has been made that the disability is permanent, such review (if any) may be conducted at such time as the Secretary determines to be appropriate. Where the review of a determination under the preceding sentence results in a finding that the individual continues to be under a disability, any subsequent review of the same determination shall be at the discretion of the State agency or Secretary (as the case may be); and at the completion of any review under the preceding sentence which results in such a finding the State agency or Secretary shall determine whether any such subsequent review appears to be appropriate and, if so, when it is likely to be conducted. In notifying any individual that he or she is entitled to benefits based on disability at the time of the initial determination of such disability, or that he or she continues to be entitled to such benefits as a result of a finding made upon a review under this subsection, the Secretary shall include a notice of whether a review or subsequent review under this section will be scheduled and, if so, the expected date of that review.".

(2)(A) The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply only with respect to reviews of disability determinations made in the case of individuals whose initial month of entitlement to benefits (based on the determination involved) is a month after September 1982.

(B) In the case of individuals whose initial month of entitlement to benefits based on disability was a month before October 1982, reviews of disability determinations for purposes of continuing eligibility shall (notwithstanding the provisions of section 221(i) of the Social Security Act as in effect prior to the amendment made by paragraph (1)) be made at the discretion of the Secretary but shall be limited in any calendar year to a number of cases which, when added to the number of cases (other than those involving disabilities found to be permanent) that are reviewed for the first time in such year under section 221(i) of the Social Security Act, does not exceed the total number of cases in which entitlement to disability insurance benefits under section 223 of such Act began in the preceding calendar year.

(c)(1) Section 223 of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"CONTINUATION OF BENEFITS DURING APPEALS PROCESS

"(g)(1) IN ANY CASE WHERE—

"(A) an individual is a recipient of disability insurance benefits, or a child's, widow's, or widower's insurance benefits based on disability; and

"(B) the physical or mental impairment or impairments on the basis of which such benefits are payable are found to have ceased, not to have existed, or to no longer be disabling, and as a consequence such individual is determined not to be entitled to such benefits, such individual may elect (in such manner and form and within such time as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe) to continue to have payment of such benefits and the payment of any other benefits under this Act based on such individual's wages and self-employment income (including benefits under title XVIII of this Act) continued until such time as the determination to terminate such benefits is affirmed by a final determination of the Secretary after a hearing pursuant to section 221(d), or if such individual does not request a hearing, until the time for requesting such a hearing has expired.

"(2)(A) Any benefits paid under this title by reason of paragraph (1) shall be considered overpayments if the decision after a hearing affirms that such individual is not entitled to such benefits, or if such individual fails to request a hearing.

"(B) Any benefits paid under this Act (including benefits under title XVIII), other than under this title, by reason of paragraph (1) shall not be considered overpayments solely on the grounds that entitlement to benefits under this title would have ceased but for the provisions of this subsection.".

(2) The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply with respect to determinations (that individuals are not entitled to benefits) made on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator RIEGLE in introducing emergency legislation to correct the hardship that has been unintentionally inflicted on thousands of Americans receiving benefits under the social security disability insurance program.

I have heard from men and women all across this country who have written out of desperation and fear that their disability checks will stop and they will be left with nothing. These individuals worked hard, often holding down two jobs, to provide for their families until they were forced to quite their jobs because of illness or injury. All would prefer to work but their physical condition makes it impossible. Their disability checks are often the only income coming in for their families. Now the Government, in the name of eliminating fraud and abuse, is unjustly terminating the benefits of these deserving Americans.

I would like to share some of their stories.

Mrs. Carol O'Connell Wood wrote me about her husband, Arthur who is so disabled he cannot write. He has suffered from a number of disabilities for approximately 18 years and has been receiving social security benefits since 1976, after undergoing surgery for a brain tumor a year earlier. He was notified last Februray 22 by the Social Security Administration that he was able to work, even though he had just been hospitalized on two separate occasions for major seizures related to his illness.

The Social Security Administration decided Mr. Woods fate based on the recommendation of a physician who spent less than half an hour with Mr. Woods. No tests were ordered, no specialists were called in.

In Mrs. Woods words—

My husband's disabilities have not gone away or improved. They have gotten worse—he gave 4 years of his life to defend this country and subsequently worked for the next 28 years—sometimes two jobs at a time—until he became totally unable to work. He has paid into the system and supported it for a long time. He should not have to be subjected to this kind of shabby treatment at a time in his life when he cannot handle it physically or mentally. It is a sad reflection on the people involved and on the administration now in office.

Clint Woodcock from Gulfport, Miss. also asked his wife to write me because he is paralyzed as a result of an accident he suffered in 1977. He has also been reevaluated by the Social Security Administration. If his benefits are cut off as Mr. Woods were, he and his family would lose their only means of support until they can complete the lengthy appeals process. Chances are he would win his case, but in the meantime he could lose everything he and his family still have.

Sandra Green from Foreman, Ark., also wrote about the plight facing her and her husband Donald who worked as a first-class carpenter until 4 years ago when he first developed rheumatoid arthritis. Donald Green is just 40 years old; is totally disabled, and was trying to support a wife and two daughters on his disability check until last November when social security cut him off. I would like Mrs. Green's letter to be printed in full along with the report filed by Donald Green's personal physician. Her words eloquently tell the story.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print the letter and report in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR MR. KENNEDY:

I am writing this letter in behalf of my husband, who was cut off of his Social Security Disability in Nov. 1981. I have been frantic trying to think of someone who really cares about the less fortunate in this country. I have been keeping up with the news and from what I can see, you are fighting Mr. Reagan's cold indifference proposals concerning the poor and sick more than anyone else so I am writing you. I don't know if you can help, but right now I am grasping at straws.

I know there are a lot of freeloaders drawing Social Security, I agree that those people should be cut off, but in my part of the country the one's that are able to work are still drawing their checks, and the one's that are really disabled have been cut off.

My husband has rheumatoid arthritis, he is 40 years old, he came down with this 4 years ago, until then he was a first class carpenter working for Brura & Root Const. Co. He had an excellent work record, did his job, showed up for work everyday, and was not lazy. Even after he came down with arthritis he still tried to work but could not, his doctor advised him to file for Social Security Disability because he would probably never be able to work again, so he did.

In Sept. of 1981 he was told to report to Dr. Larry Messer in Texarkana, Texas for a reevaluation examination which he did. Dr. Messer didn't tell him anything about his condition, he did a very poor examination, he mostly asked him about his condition. Evidently his diagnosis was that Donald was able to work. I know he is not, his doctor knows it, so does everyone that knows him. Mr. Kennedy, we haven't got a check in three months, this is all we have to live on, we have two girls 14 & 7 who have to be provided for. Donald is facing a grim future, he is in constant pain all the time, he can't work, no one would hire him if he tried, and believe me if he was able to work, he would make a lot more than he draws on Social Security. Here he is in the prime of his life, in pain all the time, and no money to care for his family.

Most of the people in this area were sent to Dr. Messer, I know a man personally that went to him and Dr. Messer told him right then that he would continue drawing his Social Security, and this man works every day he can as long as he can get paid in cash, he makes twice as much money as he draws on Social Security. Just this morning, I met a lady in the Social Security office who was there to file an appeal on her disability, she had been cut off and she went to the same doctor as Donald.

This lady was in tears and trembling like a leaf, she was a widow, lives by herself, no family at all and was unable to work and had been cut off her Social Security. Mr. Kennedy it was heartbreaking, she has had two operations on her spine, and could barely walk, I was so caught up with her sorrow and trying to cheer her up for a while. I forgot about my own misery. People in this area are not being judged by their medical records alone. I am sending a statement from Donald's doctor so you can judge for yourself and not just take my word for it.

I filed an appeal on Dec. 1, 1981, we hadn't heard a word up 'til now, I went to the Social Security office this morning to see what the hold up was, I was told that Donald's files were in Baltimore now and we should be hearing something in a few weeks.

Mr. Kennedy if there is any way at all you can help us it would be greatly appreciated. My husband is so desperate he says now that he is just a burden to his family. He can't take care of them and we would be better off if he were dead, at least the children would draw his Social Security then. I promised him that he would get it back; he needs it, and he's entitled to it. He worked for it and if it's the last thing I do I intend to see that he gets it back. We have to have it to live on, it's all we have.

Mr. Kennedy I've never begged for anything in my life, but I am begging you to help us. Since Mr. Reagan has become president everything has been turned upside down. I heard him speak about the economic help he was going to give to the countries in the Caribbean Basin. If we have the money to get other countries up on their feet, why do we take away from the poor and sick in our own country. I believe charity begins at home. I say this, Mr. Reagan had better do his worse in the next three years because he will never be elected by the people of this country again.

He has forgotten the people that put him there. I didn't, I am straight Democrat, so is my entire family. I hope you run again in the next election, you will win by a landslide. I'm telling you what I hear. I live with the kind of people that are suffering now; I know how they feel; there are people lined up at the food stamp office that I have talked to when I get my food stamps. They say they are ashamed to admit it but they voted for Ronald Reagan but they would never do it again. They say when Mr. Carter was President they did have a job.

I'm sorry I've written such a long letter but once I got started I couldn't stop. I want someone to know what's happening to people like us. I will give you my husband's name and S.S. No. in case there is something you may be able to do—Donald R. Green, [redacted].

Sincerely,

MRS. DONALD R. GREEN.

DRS. SHORT, TOWNSEND, BROWN, BAILES & JONES,
Texarkana, Tex., November 23, 1981.

Re Donald Green, A/N 80332091.

To whom it may concern:

Donald Green was reevaluated today because of severe rheumatoid arthritis. His disease is active in his neck, elbows, ankles and both hands. His motion range of his neck is 40 percent of expected normal range. He has swelling of the matacarpo-phalanges of joints of both hands. Both ankles are swelled, making fist only with great difficulty, grasp is poor quality. RA test positive on this date, Sed Rate 65. Impression: he is totally disabled for any type of work.

Sincerely,

HAROLD H. SHORT, M.D.

Mr. President, the legislation Senator RIEGLE and I are introducing is designed to meet the crisis facing these and hundreds of thousands of other deserving Americans. Our bill, which has the support of 18 national organizations who serve the handicapped and disabled, includes 3 essential provisions. It would require that:

First, there be evidence of medical improvement or that disability benefits were granted in error before benefits are terminated.

Second, the disability reviews conducted by the Social Security Administration be slowed down to insure that adequate time and attention is devoted to the review process.

Third, no claimant's disability benefits be terminated until the appeals process is completed and an administrative law judge decides against the beneficiary.

This legislation does not address all of the problems facing the social security disability system. it is an emergency measure. I hope my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will give it careful consideration. In the name of fairness and equity and compassion we must act now.●

By Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD:

S. 2777. A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to designate May 30 as Memorial Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MEMORIAL DAY BILL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to remove Memorial Day from the "Monday holiday law," and to restore the holiday to May 30.

Sadly, the 3-day weekend we have come to enjoy at the end of May has tended to obscure the intent of the holiday. The sentiment of the day has been lost in the waves of the beaches, on the greens of the golf courses, in the shops on the malls, or in other leisurely pursuits.

Honoring the dead has been a practice of many civilizations since time immemorial. The Druids, Greeks, and Romans decorated the graves of their loved ones with garlands of flowers. Today, Asians, Orientals, and Europeans of all races and nationalities perform ancient rituals in honoring the dead.

In America, the Civil War brought national recognition to the custom of decorating the graves of our fallen soldiers. Women, mourning the losses of their loved ones in the conflict, began the practice of placing flowers on the graves of the soldiers, Confederate and Federal alike. Services and ceremonies followed, and days were set aside for the special tribute.

Memorial Day was designated by the Congress to pay tribute to those who lost their lives in service to this Nation. The first Memorial Day, 100 years ago, honored those who fell in the War Between the States. Since that time well over 640,000 service men and women have lost their lives in battle. On Memorial Day our Nation pays tribute to all of those who have laid down their lives for our country.

Many States and towns, in the South and in the North, lay claim to the origin of Memorial Day. Altogether, their fervor encouraged the Commander in Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, an organization of Union veterans, to set an official date for the observance. On May 5, 1868, Gen. John A. Logan issued an order to the local posts of the Grand Army whereby May 30, 1968, was to be observed:

* * * for the purposes of strewing with flowers or otherwise decorating the graves of the Comrades who died in defense of their country during the late rebellion and whose bodies lie in almost every city, village, or hamlet churchyard in the land. It is the purpose of the Commander-in-Chief to inaugurate this observance with the hope that it will be kept from year to year while a survivor of the war remains to honor the memory of the departed * * *.

My bill asks, in effect, that Memorial Day be allowed to stand alone, to return the attention of the Nation to the meaning of the holiday. Let us, as a people, remember, on that day, that others have died for our country that we may live in peace.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this measure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2777

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 6103(a) of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking out the item relating to Memorial Day and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Memorial Day, May 30.".

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S.J. Res. 217. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to construct a National Law Enforcement Heroes Memorial; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

NATIONAL LAW ENFORCEMENT HEROES MEMORIAL

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that would authorize the construction of a national monument in honor of all police officers killed in the line of duty.

Such a memorial is long overdue. In the past we have paid tribute to the many individuals who have lost their lives in war. And with good reason I propose we honor the many men and women who have sacrificed their lives in the war against crime.

This legislation, which is identical to a bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman BIAGGI, himself a much decorated former police officer, would authorize the National Law Enforcement Heroes Memorial to be built on Federal grounds near the FBI building here in Washington. The memorial would be funded solely by private contributions. No Federal expenditures would be required.

An advisory panel, composed primarily of active or retired police officers, would be appointed to develop recommendations on the precise location and design for the monument. The Secretary of the Interior would be in charge of constructing the memorial once plans have been completed and adequate funds raised.

In the past decade nearly 1,200 police officers were killed in the line of duty. While this memorial would serve as a special tribute to this supreme sacrifice, it would also serve as a constant reminder of our need to better protect those who continue to protect us. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation. These heroes must not be forgotten.

By Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD:

S.J. Res. 218. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the week of August 29, 1982, through September 4, 1982, as "National Railroad Week" and September 4, 1982, as "National Railroad Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RAILROADS: PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, today I am introducing a joint resolution to designate the week of August 30 through September 4 as "National Railroad Week" and September 4 as "National Railroad Day."

We Americans have long owed it to ourselves to set aside a time:

To recognize an industry which has done so much to build our Nation.

To recall its place in our history and in our folklore.

To acknowledge its vital role today.

And to examine its important prospects in our national future.

To a remarkable degree, our country owes its greatness and its strength to our railroads.

Reflect that only a century and a half ago we were a pastoral, small republic. Our people traveled, when they traveled at all, over dirt roads, on foot, by horseback or by carriage or wagon. We moved our goods by oxcart, canal barge or riverboat. Our young industries were restricted to the waterways and ports of the Eastern seaboard. The railroads changed all this.

They started small, led by backyard inventors and a few visionary entrepreneurs. A short coal-carrying line operated briefly in 1829, in Pennsylvania. In 1830, the single-horsepower Tom Thumb raced a rail car drawn by a single horse in a demonstration in Maryland. A few months later successful, if primitive, service started on a 137-mile track laid in South Carolina.

These were the beginnings. They spawned 90 years of explosive growth. Within only 5 years 200 rail lines were being built or planned, more than a thousand miles of track had been laid, and the U.S. mail had been carried by rail for the first time, Andrew Jackson had become our first President to ride a train, and when the Baltimore Ohio Railroad Co. ran its tracks over the mountains to Wheeling and the Ohio River, the West was opened to development (1828–50).

There followed one of the most dramatic movements of people commerce and agriculture in world history. Vast reaches of virtually uninhabited land were occupied by settlers, cities sprang up and were linked by rail, factories, smelters and packing plants grew up at new industrial centers. Track reached the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, and on May 10, 1869, at a Gold Spike ceremony at Promonotory in the Utah Territory the rails of the West were joined with those of the East to form the first continuous link of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. By early in this century, in the space of a single lifetime, rail lines interlaced the Nation coast to coast. The railroads not only had hauled us swiftly and literally into the "Industrial Age," they also had brought in and helped to settle millions of the immigrants who changed and invigorated the diverse society which has become America. And, in the course of it, created a legend which forms an indelible part of our national heritage.

Railroad passenger stations—they are being restored in some cities—gave us a new form of architecture. The names of railroad builders, men of vision and robber barons alike, look large in our financial history. Stories of the fabulous private cars in which these and other rich traveled in the style of Eastern potentates, punctuate the annals of high society.

The railroads gave us Casey Jones, John Henry, Diamond Jim Brady. They gave us Westinghouse, Pullman, Chessie and Phoebe Snow—household names without number—as well as famous trains, the "Twentieth Century and Overland Limiteds," and the "Super Chief," to name only three.

In war times, railroads have played essential roles. The North's preponderance of rail lines to move troops and supplies helped to decide the outcome of the Civil War. In World War I virtually all troops and material moved across the Nation by rail, and in World War II, despite developing airlines and highway transportation, 90 percent of military shipments and 97 percent of troop movements within the country went by rail. In 1944, a record year, passenger travel by train reached 95.6 billion passenger miles. Even today, our military men put heavy reliance on the railroads in their planning for the contingencies of war.

At the peak, in 1916, railroad lines in the United States totaled 254,000 miles. The figure today is 185,000. Railroads in recent years have lost some of their glamour. No longer does nearly every American boy want to grow up to become a locomotive engineer. No longer do trains move every kind of freight—airplanes and motor vehicles have made large inroads on this as on passenger travel.

And yet, the railroads continue to be vital to the Nation. They haul commuters to and from work in the hundreds of thousands. Although we have fallen far behind Europe and Japan, our longhaul and overnight passenger trains—those that are left—remain popular. And, tonnages are greater than they have ever been in freight transport—the essential movement of bulky, heavy or specialized materials which make up the sinews of our economy, of finished products of all descriptions—often packed in truck trailers and moved piggy-back from city to city, or in containers and moved from port to port.

Our railroads are constantly evolving. Railroad planners are engaged heavily in research to meet the needs of the future. Perhaps the most significant challenge lies in the fact that trains can haul people and cargo using less energy than other forms of transport, with less air pollution. One senses a feeling of vitality in the industry, and a resolve to continue to grow and change to meet our needs as the 21st century approaches. Our railroads no longer monopolize the Nation's transportation, but they are now and will continue to be its backbone.

This year the citizens of the city of Grafton, W. Va., are planning the First Annual West Virginia Railroad Heritage Festival to celebrate the role the railroad played in the city, the State, and the Nation.

It is meet and right that West Virginia should honor the railroad; it was the first to benefit from interstate rail service. In the future, West Virginia stands to gain even more as coal is hauled from its hills in increasing quantities to the valley and ports for delivery nationally and abroad.

By introducing legislation to commemorate the railroads, I hope that railroad companies, railroad men and all of our people, will take note of the dates, join in a national tribute to the Iron Horse as it was in years gone by, and toast the Railroad Age to come.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 218

Whereas railroads were vital to American territorial expansion and industrial development in the nineteenth century;

Whereas railroads have contributed a rich and colorful culture to America in the form of art, literature, song, and architecture;

Whereas railroads have provided Americans with unexcelled luxury in travel;

Whereas historically, railroads have been the leaders in American freight and passenger traffic;

Whereas railroads are destined to lead the Nation in sophisticated, rapid freight and passenger transportation in the future; and

Whereas the important role of railroads in the development and future of the Nation deserves to be recognized: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of August 29, 1982, through September 4, 1982, as "National Railroad Week" and September 4, 1982, as "National Railroad Day" and calling upon all Government agencies and the people of the United States to observe the week and day with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

AMENDMENT NO. 1956

At the request of Mr. KENNEDY, the name of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) was added as a cosponsor of amendment No. 1956 intended to be proposed to S. 2222, a bill to revise and reform the Immigration and Nationality Act, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

IMMIGRATION REFORM AND CONTROL ACT

AMENDMENT NOS. 1997 THROUGH 1999

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. KENNEDY submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2222) to revise and reform the Immigration and Nationality Act, and for other purposes.

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, last week I submitted a series of amendments to S. 2222, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1982. Regrettably, there were technical errors in two of the amendments as drafted—amendments Nos. 1950 and 1952.

I am therefore resubmitting the corrected language as new amendments, and ask unanimous consent that their texts be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENTMENT No. 1997

On page 121, line 25, strike out "three hundred and fifty thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "two hundred and fifty thousand".

On page 122, beginning on line 1 with "(i)", strike out all through "residence," on line 5.

On page 122, line 6, strike out "(ii)" and insert in lieu thereof "(i)".

On page 122, line 8, strike out "such".

On page 122, line 9, strike out "(iii)" and insert in lieu thereof "(ii)".

On page 122, line 11, strike out "(iv)" and insert in lieu thereof "(iii)".

On page 124, lines 12 and 13, strike out "immediate relatives specified in section 201(b),".

On page 124, line 15, strike out "such".

On page 130, lines 19 and 20, strike out "immediate relatives specified in section 201(b),".

Beginning on page 126 with line 22, strike out all through line 6 on page 127 insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(4) Unmarried brothers and sisters of citizens and previous fifth preference.—

"(A) Qualified immigrants who are the unmarried brothers or sisters of citizens of the United States, if such citizens are at least twenty-one years of age, and

"(B) Qualified immigrants who (i) as of the date of enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1982 had received approval of a petition made on their behalf for preference status by reason of the relationship described in paragraph (5) of section 203(a) of this Act as in effect on the day before such date, and (ii) continue to qualify under the terms of this Act as in effect on the day before such date, shall be allocated visas in a number not to exceed 10 per centum of such numerical limitation, plus any visas not required for the classes specified in paragraphs (1) through (3).

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in addition, I am offering another amendment to restore judicial review to aliens who may be deported on the grounds of exclusion under section 212(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

As everyone who follows immigration law knows, section 212(a) as now written, is hopelessly vague and out of date. In fact,the Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy voted to throw it out and completely rewrite it—which is the intention, I know, of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy.

However, until that is accomplished, I believe there must be some recourse to judicial review for persons caught in the vague and arbitrary exclusion provisions of existing law.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT No. 1999

On page 104, line 7, insert "or (C)" after "subparagraph (B)".

On page 104, between lines 15 afd 16, insert the following:

"(C) Any alien held in custody pursuant to an order of deportation on the grounds of exclusion under section 212(a) may obtain judicial review thereof by habeas corpus proceedings.●

AMENDMENT NO. 2000

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. BAKER (for Mr. PRESSLER) submitted the following amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2222) supra.

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I am submitting an amendment to S. 2222, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1982. Section 213 of this bill contains a provision which would authorize the implementation of a limited, nonimmigrant visa waiver system. The goal of such a system is to facilitate international travel by waiving the visa requirement for foreign travelers to the United States from "low risk" countries.

However, in my opinion, the visa waiver system currently provided in S. 2222 is much too narrow to accomplish the goal of effectively facilitating foreign travel to the United States. My amendment would broaden the applicability of the visa waiver program so that it would cover most of our traditional political allies, trading partners, and sources of tourism revenue, which amounted to $12 billion in foreign trade receipts in 1881.

Under my amendment, the visa requirement would be waived for those nations having a traditionally low visa application refusal rate—under 2.5 percent annually. In addition, the plan specifies numerous safeguards to insure that there is no increase in the number of undesirable aliens entering the country. The program, designed by the State of Department, is both balanced and workable.

The problem with the plan currently in S. 2222 is that its terms are so restrictive that it wold apply to only approximately half a dozen countries. Under my amendment, approximately 28 nations would be covered, inlcuding many of our major allies and trading partners.

The long-standing need for a visa waiver system has been well-documented. The system is outmoded and its burdensome aspects far outweigh any possible benefits. However, in the last few years the need has become more pressing due to the sharp increase in foreign visitors coming to the United States. Our embassies, whose staffs are already overtaxed, face increasing backlogs of visa applications and the situation shows no sign of improving any time soon.

The United States is one of the very few nations which still requires foreign travelers to carry a visa in addition to a passport. This means, for instance, that we are forcing British, French, and other Western Euopean travelers to obtain clearance from the American Embassy in their country before they can travel to the United States. The time consuming and cumbersome application process is not only an annoyance, but also discourages travel and therefore reduces our foreign trade income from tourism. For instance, would someone from Western Europe go to the trouble of waiting up to 12 weeks to obtain a visa for discretionary travel to the United States when they could travel virtually anywhere else in the world simply on a valid passport? Commonsense tells us that we are losing thousands of potential visitors every year.

This suspicion was confirmed during hearings I chaired last September on the visa waiver issue. As chairman of the Business, Trade and Tourism Subcommittee, I heard testimony from a variety of administration and industry witnesses. Estimates documented in this testimony indicated that the visa waiver program contained in my amendment would generate several hundred million dollars in additional trade revenue annually. If we can reduce the scope of this obstacle to travel, we will increase travel and tourism-related business, create jobs and increase tax revenues.

Because of the many benefits I have outlined, the visa waiver program contained in my amendment has attracted substantial support througout Government and industry. Some of the groups which have endorsed the plan include: Department of State, Department of Justice, Department of Commerce, Office of Management and Budget, Air Transport Association, Travel Industry Association, American Hotel and Motel Association, American Express, American Society of Travel Agents, National Tour Brokers Association, and National Council of State Travel Directors.

Let me again emphasize the economic importance of this subject as part of a unified congressional effort to improve the U.S. balance of payments. For instance, my home State of South Dakota had nearly 5 million tourists this past year to visit Mount Rushmore, the Black Hills, and other South Dakota communities, and to hunt, fish, and participate in many types of recreational activities. That is eight times the population of our State. Obviously, the economic impact of the travel and tourism industry on a national and international basis is enormous.

Increasingly, foreign tourists are coming to the United States to visit destinations and engage in activities which are uniquely American. This country faces stiff competition for the international tourist dollar. We must compete vigorously if we are going to attract a major share of the international travel market. An important first step in this direction is the elimination of a useless and burdensome requirement imposed on nations which have demonstrated no security threat to the United States.

Tourism is a vitally important part of U.S. trade in international markets. This industry created one-third of all new jobs in 1980. In fact, the tourism industry is now the second largest retail industry in the Nation, having surpassed the automobile industry. This expanding segment of our economy is not asking for a Government handout. It is simply trying to do business in the face of arbitrary and meaningless Government regulations. My amendment would modify one of the more onerous of these obstacles and would encourage the continued growth of a strong component of the U.S. economy.

Mr. President, I encourage my colleagues to support this amendment to S. 2222. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Strike all of section 213 of the committee amendment beginning on page 147, line 21 and ending on page 154, line 14 and substitute the following:

VISA WAIVER FOR CERTAIN VISITORS

SEC. 213. (a) Section 212(d) (8 U.S.C. 1183(d)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(12)(A) The requirement of paragraph 26(B) of subsection (a) may be waived by the Attorney General and the Secretary of State, acting jointly, in the case of an alien who—

"(i) is applying for admission as a nonimmigrant visitor for business or pleasure for a period not exceeding ninety days:

"(ii) is a national of a country which extends, or is prepared to extend, reciprocal privileges to citizens and nationals of the United States;

"(iii) before such admission completes such immigration forms as the Attorney General shall by regulation prescribe;

"(iv) has a round-trip, nonrefundable, nontransferable, transportation ticket issued by a person who has entered into an agreement with the Attorney General guaranteeing transport of the alien out of the United States at the end of the alien's visit; and

"(v) has been determined not to represent a threat to the welfare, safety, or security of the United States.

"(B)(i) For the period beginning on the effective date of this paragraph and ending on the last day of the first fiscal year which begins after the effective date of this paragraph, a country shall be considered to be within the purview of subparagraph (A)(ii) of this paragraph only if, in the last two full fiscal years preceding the effective date of this paragraph, such country had an average nonimmigrant visa refusal rate, as determined by the Secretary of State, of less than 2 per centum (and no higher than 2.5 per centum in any one of those two years). For the purposes of this subparagraph, the term "average nonimmigrant visa refusal rate" means the number of nonimmigrant visas refused under section 212(a) and 214(b) for applicants of the nationality of such country at consular offices in said country as a percentage of the total number of such visa applications actually filed.

"(ii) For each fiscal year following the period specified in subparagraph (B)(i), a country considered to be within the purview of subparagraph (A)(ii) during such period shall not be considered to remain within the purview of subparagraph (A)(ii) unless, in the two fiscal years immediately preceding such fiscal year, it had either an average rate of exclusion and withdrawal of application for admission or an average rate of violation of nonimmigrant status, as determined in either case by the Attorney General which exceeded 1 per centum of the persons admitted to the United States in waiver of visa cases under this paragraph (or which exceeded 1.5 per centum of such persons in any one of those two years): Provided, That in determining the rate of violation of nonimmigrant status the Attorney General shall exclude from consideration those persons who remained for more than ninety days in the United States for reasons beyond their control or for trivial overstays (less than fifteen days), if there was no intention to remain permanently in the United States. Determinations required by this subparagraph shall be made as soon as practicable after the end of each fiscal year.

"(iii) If, at the end of any fiscal year following the period specified in subparagraph (B)(i), a country not previously considered within the purview of subparagraph (A)(ii) shall have a nonimmigrant visa refusal rate, as determined in the manner provided for in subparagraph (B)(i), of less than 2 per centum, such country shall be considered to be within the purview of subparagraph (A)(ii) for the next following fiscal year and shall thereafter be treated in the manner specified in subparagraph (B)(ii).

"(iv) If, at the end of any fiscal year following the period specified in (B)(i), a country previously considered within the purview of subparagraph (A)(ii) but which lost that status under the provisions of subparagraph (B)(ii) but which again shall have nonimmigrant visa refusal rate, as determined in the manner provided for is subparagraph (B)(i), of less than 2 per centum, such country shall be considered to be within the purview of subparagraph (A)(ii) for the next following fiscal year and shall thereafter be treated in the manner specified in subparagraph (B)(ii).

"(C) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraphs (A) and (B) of this paragraph, no alien shall be admitted without a visa pursuant to this paragraph if he has previously been so admitted and failed to comply with the conditions of his previous admission.

"(D) Notwithstanding any of the other provisions of this paragraph the Attorney General and the Secretary of State, acting jointly, may, for whatever reason, including the national security, refrain from waiving the visa requirement in respect of nationals of any country which may qualify therefor under this paragraph or may, at any time, rescind any waiver previously granted under this paragraph.".

(b) Section 214(a) (8 U.S.C. 1184(a)) is amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a colon and by adding thereto the following: "Provided, That no alien admitted to the United States without a visa pursuant to section 212(d)(12), shall be authorized to remain in the United States as a nonimmigrant alien for a period exceeding ninety days from the date of this admission.".

(c) Section 245(c) (8 U.S.C. 1255(c)) is amended to read as follows:

"(c) The provisions of this section shall not be applicable to (1) an alien crewman; (2) an alien (other than an immediate relative as defined in section 210(b)) who hereafter continued in or accepts unauthorized employment prior to filing an application for adjustment of status; (3) an alien admitted in transit without visa under section 212(d)(4)(C); or (4) an alien admitted as a temporary visitor for business or pleasure without a visa under section 212(d)(12).".

(d) Section 248 (8 U.S.C. 1258) is amended by inserting after the word "except" the following: "an alien admitted as a temporary visitor for business or pleasure under section 212(d)(12).".

(e) Title II is amended by adding immediately following the heading "CHAPTER 8—GENERAL PENALTY PROVISIONS" a new section above which will be set forth a heading reading: "FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH CONTRACT GUARANTEES", and which shall read as follows:

"SEC. 270. (a) Every person transporting nonimmigrant aliens pursuant to section 212(d)(12) shall enter into a contract with the Attorney General guaranteeing that (1) such person shall issue aliens covered by that section round-trip, nonrefundable, nontransferable, transportation tickets; (2) such person shall not refund the cost of the return part of the ticket; (3) such person shall not cancel the return part of the ticket; and (4) such person shall be responsible for insuring transportation of such alien back to the country to which the return trip ticket was issued.

"(b) If it appears to the satisfaction of the Attorney General that such person has defaulted on any of the guarantees in paragraph (a) such person shall pay to the collector of customs for the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each and every default.

"(c) As used in this section the term 'person' includes, but is not limited to, the owner, master, agent, commanding officer, charterer, or consignee of any vessel or aircraft.".

(f) The table of contents for chapter 8 of title II is amended by inserting immediately after the chapter heading the following new item: "Sec. 270. Failure to comply with contract guarantees.".

On page 120 of the Committee amendment strike lines 9 through 24.

On page 147 of the Committee amendment strike lines 7 through 14 and 18 through 20.

On page 147, line 15 of the Committee amendment strike "(c)(1)" and substitute "(b)".

On page 153 of the Committee amendment strike all of the matter beginning on line 24 and ending on page 154, line 4.

On page 154, line 5 of the Committee amendment strike "(c)" and substitute "(b)".

On page 154 of the Committee amendment strike lines 8 through 14.

On page 165 of the Committee amendment, strike lines 8 through 22.

On page 165, line 23 of the Committee amendment, strike "(e)" and substitute "(d)".●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE REGISTRY OF INTERPRETERS FOR THE DEAF

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, the Registry Of Interpreters For The Deaf will be holding its National Convention in the capital of my home State, Hartford, Conn. on July 24. The 5,000 members of this professional association of interpreters for the deaf from across the country deserve not only the recognition and support of the Senate but also Americans for their outstanding efforts in bridging the communication gap between the deaf and hearing worlds. Whether in the school, work place or place of worship, sign language interpreters do an invaluable service for this country and its nearly 14 million hearing impaired citizens. As a direct result of their diligent work in translating the spoken word to sign, in fact, deaf and other hearing impaired Americans have been able to enter the mainstream of our society.

In recognition of their continuing contribution in providing such access to the hearing impaired, my distinguished colleague from my home State of Connecticut, Senator DODD, introduced, Senate Joint Resolution 211 calling on the President to designate July 27, 1982 as "National Recognition Day For The Registry Of Interpreters For The Deaf." As a cosponsor of the resolution, I would like to take this opportunity to urge my colleagues to support this measure. Founded in 1964 to improve the quality of interpretative services to the deaf nationwide, the Registry has a solid and impressive record of service to this particular special needs community. The agenda for this year's national convention demonstrates well the breadth and depth of this organization's commitment to enabling deaf persons to participate in every facet of American life. Workshops will be held on a wide range of issues and concerns from improving interpreting services in the public schools to the ethical dimensions of interpreting in mental health settings.

It is particularly fitting that this year's convention of the Registry should be held in Connecticut. The American School For The Deaf, the first institution of its kind to be established in the Nation, was founded in Hartford, Conn. in the early 19th century and remains a vital part of the community to this day. The Connecticut State Commission On The Deaf And Hearing Impaired, one of a number of State agencies serving the special needs of Connecticut's disabled citizens, also has been in the forefront in expanding advocacy and interpreting services in response to several State legislative initiatives.

Mr. President, The Registry Of Interpreters For The Deaf have contributed significantly to Connecticut's achievements on behalf of its hearing disabled citizens. These Connecticut activities add luster to this organization's distinguished 18-year record of assuring the highest standards for interpreters who make accurate communication possible between deaf persons and hearing persons. I congratulate The Registry Of Interpreters For The Deaf on their fine achievements as advocates for the disabled and wish them a pleasant and productive convention.●

IMMIGRANTS AND REFUGEES

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Senate may soon be considering S. 2222, the Immigration Reform and Control Act—legislation that will have a major impact upon our country's treatment and admission of immigrants and refugees.

Following the recommendation of the Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy—and reflecting the findings of every administration's task force on immigration policies, including President Ford's, President Carter's, and President Reagan—the bill sponsored by our distinguished colleague from Wyoming (Mr. SIMPSON), treats the admission of immigrants and refugees separately.

This is a wise public policy and I strongly endorse this approach toward setting immigration limits. We should treat immigrants and refugees differently, because they are different—for a variety of important reasons.

This important point, Mr. President, has been forcefully made in a recent letter I have received from Roger Winter, Director of the United States Committee for Refugees. He thoughtfully reviews the reasons why we have historically treated refugees and immigrants differently, and why we should continue to do so.

I would like to share the complete text of his letter with my colleagues, and I ask that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

UNITED STATES COMMITTEE FOR REFUGEES,
New York, N.Y. July 20, 1982.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: When the Simpson/Mazzoli bill (S. 2222) to reform U.S. immigration policy reaches the floor of the Senate this month, it is expected that an amendment with major negative implications for international refugee protection will be offered by Senator Walter D. Huddleston of Kentucky. The anticipated amendment would include refugees who may be resettled in the U.S. along with all other immigrants to the U.S. under a single numerical limitation.

Traditionally immigrant and refugee admissions procedures have been separated because their underlying bases have been recognized as distinct. The concept of a single ceiling is seductively simple, but its implications hold serious threats. The combined approach to admissions has been considered and rejected by the Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy and all other responsible authorities who have studied the matter in recent years.

This letter does not concern any particular level of refugee admissions, but rather the way the U.S. makes its decisions regarding admissions. The U.S Committee for Refugees, with its programs historically focused on international refugee concerns, feels that the impact of the Huddleston amendment will so affect U.S. refugee resettlement policy that the protection of refugees overseas is threatened.

Of course, resettlement has clear immigration impact which must be acknowledged directly and dealt with constructively. But the purposes, implications, and international outcomes of the two admissions processes are completely distinct. Whereas general immigration largely relates to family reunion, the rescue and resettlement of refugees is a human rights effort. Its base is ideological, seeking to uphold certain humanitarian principles and valuing the right of individuals to be free from persecution based on particular inherited or chosen distinctions.

Refugee resettlement has been kept separate from other immigration processes because of this intimate relationship with foreign policy and humanitarian concerns.

When the Refugee Act of 1980 was enacted, Congress chose to include what USCR believes is a sound procedure for determining the number of refugees to be admitted to the U.S. each year. To the extent there have been problems regarding refugee admissions in the 27 months since the "consultation" procedure was enacted, they are not attributable to the letter or intent of the law.

Senator Huddleston seeks to change the existing refugee admissions notwithstanding the fact that refugee admissions ceilings and actual admissions themselves have declined steadily since 1980. We believe his interest is to limit total admissions. There are serious questions about this objective; but even if the end were justified, the proposed approach is not. If a single numerical ceiling for immigrant and refugee admissions becomes law, USCR feels there would be four major unacceptable results:

1. Enactment would significantly limit the flexibility needed by the President to respond promptly to foreign policy matters in which refugees are a factor.

2. This restricted ability ceiling would be devisive domestically. Limited and undifferentiated numbers would pit those seeking to respond to refugee needs against nationality groups and those seeking to reunify families. Congress must be responsive to both groups, but through separate processes.

4. USCR believes enactment of a single numerical ceiling would send a chilling message to the world. The important principles of refugee protection are under assault in many areas. In some cases the actions and inaction of our government have directly contributed to this troubling phenomenon. Enactment now of such a restrictive amendment would further compromise the remaining moral leverage the U.S. has with the rest of the world in matters of refugee protection. In specific situations, such as that of Cambodians in Thailand, first asylum is so fragile that this enactment could cause the provision of haven there to be lost.

As citizens we all daily face the task of responding to many issues. So, of course, do members of Congress. With respect to the particular issue of a single numerical limitation on refugee and immigrant admissions, we believe many members of the Senate do not have a clear understanding of the potential results as set forth in this letter. You may wish to consider contacting them promptly to share your own thoughts.

Sincerely,

ROGER P. WINTER,

S. 881—SMALL BUSINESS INNOVATION RESEARCH

● Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I would like to congratulate my colleagues, Senators RUDMAN and WEICKER, for the outstanding leadership which they have shown in securing passage of S. 881, the small business innovation research bill. As the original cosponsors of this legislation, these Senators correctly recognized the exceptional contributions which small businesses make to innovation and productivity and crafted a bill to more fully capitalize on these contributions. The overwhelming support which this legislation drew in the Congress and from the administration is testimony to their insight and leadership.

During the Senate debate on S. 881 last December, I expressed two reservations about the legislation as it was presented to the Senate. First, I was concerned that funds to establish the small business innovation research (SBIR) programs not be taken disproportionately from federally supported basic research. Budgets for basic research, while comparatively small, are the critical sources of fundamental discoveries about ourselves and the world around us from which later ideas for invention spring. Second, I was concerned that the research and development programs of our Government-owned, contractor-operated (GOCO) laboratories, like the Los Alamos National Laboratory and the Sandia National Laboratory, not be adversely compromised in the process of establishing SBIR programs.

For these reasons, I offered an amendment to S. 881 which limited the amount of funds which could be taken from Federal budgets for basic research and for research and development in GOCO laboratories. The Senate accepted both of these provisions. As Senator RUDMAN graciously noted at the time:

I believe it (the amendment) strengthens the bill, and I am very thankful that his (Senator Schmitt's) help has been forthcoming to make this bill even stronger than it was.

I was pleased to note that the legislation as passed by the Senate on June 29 retains intact my provision regarding basic research. Also, atomic energy defense research and development are exempted from the requirements for SBIR programs, thus accomplishing much of my original provision for GOCO laboratories.

Mr. President, this legislation will be important to the entire Nation and nowhere more so than in my State of New Mexico. Our exceptional concentration of high technology industries, both large and small, as well as universities and Government laboratories, provides the type of environment in which will thrive the innovation and productivity which S. 881 seeks to foster.●

SPEECH BY SECRETARY OF NAVY JOHN LEHMAN

● Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I have the pleasure of sharing with the Senate a very timely speech by the Secretary of the Navy, the Honorable John Lehman.

I am pleased to find that the Secretary gives proper recognition to the importance of the role of the naval oceanography program in supporting naval operations. I am confident that you share my sense of urgency for having a Navy that is capable of responding to threat in any form—at all times.

Our modern Navy employs weapons systems which are highly sensitive to the ocean environment in which they operate and the Navy oceanography program provides our fleet commanders with precise information they need, to use the environment to advantage—or to overcome its negative influences on modern weapons.

The Secretary also demonstrates how the national oceanography effort is closely linked to Navy programs and points out our need to give serious thought to moving forward with gaining greater rewards from the oceans to augment our dwindling land-based resources—living and nonliving.

Mr. President, I submit this speech for the RECORD.

The speech follows:

REMARKS BY HON. JOHN LEHMAN

GOING FOR THE HIGH GROUND IF THE DEEP SEAS

Much has been written since November of 1980 to interpret the "mandate" of the electorate. One interpretation that appeals to me is that, among many other things, that mandate embodied a firm bipartisan with to reject the pessimistic and Spenglerian vision of a declining American future. The trendy view of the post-Vietnam period that American power had peaked, that the American economy and standards of living would inevitably decline, and that Americans must readjust their sights and goals downward, was never accepted by the majority of Americans. World events that followed Watergate and the fall of Saigon—runaway inflation, the decline of the dollar abroad, the fall of the Shah and the failed rescue mission, all were interpreted by the reigning elites reduced expectations. Our President during those years lectured Americans that they, the American people, were the problem. They did not believe him. His advisors warned, and I quote, "Even if the U.S. could attain strategic superiority, it would not be desirable because I suspect we would occasionally use it as a way of throwing our weight around in some very risky ways . . . It is in the U.S. interest to allow the few remaining areas of strategic advantage to fade away."These were jarring words to Americans.

"The shining city on the hill" which President Reagan compaigned to achieve symbolized a deep and uniquely American optimism that has now been returned to American politics—an optimism genuinely bipartisan in nature.

Optimism is indeed a necessary precondition for us to undertake the two major national tasks before us. First, to reconstruct a national security equilibrium in which free institutions can flourish in the world and the enemies of freedom be deterred; and second, to reestablish the vitality and productivity of our economy.

To pursue simultaneously these two enormous national undertakings will tax the optimism of even the most uplifted spirits. It will require sustained and unswerving national leadership—private and public—and it will require much hard work and honest sacrifice. I believe, however, that it will be done. I believe deeply that the grand economic and security accomplishments of America over the last 200 years can truly be a mere prelude to the accomplishments of the future.

Today, in a most unique way, the defense and economic challenges of the future are at once combined and tested by man's last and greatest frontiers—the vast reaches of outer space, and the deep ocean areas of "inner space." Each represents staggering—and quite limitless—potential for providing solutions to our current security and economic difficulties. Each, after centuries of thought and inquiry—and decades of effort—has hardly been touched. It is said that more has been learned of both frontiers in the last 20 years than in the entire recorded history of man before that time. But much more is unknown than is known. 2,000 years ago, Seneca said, "The time will come when diligent research . . . will bring to life things which now lie hidden. Nature does not reveal her mysteries once and for all."

"Do you know the ordinances of the heavens?" asks the Book of Job. "Can you establish their rule on earth?"

To a considerable degree, the sureness and confidence with which our nation responds to that question—and seizes the opportunities in these two vitally important vastnesses—will provide the answer to the future of our economy, the quality of life of our people, their security, and indeed their very survival. Of the two we may well learn that—in our time at least—the deep ocean frontier is both the more challenging, and the more promising to us.

As Secretary of the Navy you will, I trust, indulge me in this parochialism and allow me to dwell upon some specific concerns. Today the value of the oceans to America stands out as one of our most important, ill-attended, and least-known priorities.

By now many of you may have heard a version of the litany to which I normally address myself in public remarks—the nature of our nation's long maritime heritage—our increasing dependency upon the seas for our allies, our energy, our resources and our trade—our treaty-bound national commitments to some forty nations across those seas—and, of course, the major and ambitious naval recovery program upon which we are now embarked to achieve a 600-ship Navy and clear maritime superiority within the decade.

The focus in a discussion of the purely military dimensions of our oceans is necessarily constrained to that two-dimensional interface between air and water—the surface of the seas—the air above the sea in which our tactical aircraft operate—and the relatively shallow depth wherein our submarines now deploy beneath the seas. This military focus, therefore, tends to distract us and draw our attention away from the true dimensions of the ocean's promise. For these dimensions extend from far beneath and deep ocean floor, where man's future hopes for energy and mineral resources may ultimately lie—to the complete ocean volumes which may one day feed an ever-hungrier world—through the ocean surface, where navies will become ever more prominent as instruments of national power and physical symbols of sovereignty—and beyond, into the vast regions of outer space above the seas.

As on any frontier, there is little separation between that which is militarily useful and that which serves fundamental human enterprise. Mapping, charting, deep ocean and coastal surveys, hydrographic analyses, study and forecasting of weather and acoustic conditions throughout ocean areas, and systems to monitor the characteristics and quality of the ocean ecosystem all benefit everyone—the military planner, the transoceanic supertanker, the deep ocean fishermen, and the weekend boater.

Oceanography is the key to the discovery of all that the seas now have hidden. Future success in, on, and above the oceans will be closely tied to our successes in oceanography. But militarily, we are becoming more aware that a favorable outcome in future conflicts grows daily more dependent on new knowledge from the seas. Today's naval weapons must perform at greater speeds and over greater distances than ever before. As we are being daily reminded in the exchanges in the Falkland Islands, war at sea is utterly unforgiving of any negligence, incapacity, or neglect. The difference between a ship being on the surface of the ocean—or on the bottom—can often lie in very narrow margins of performance sensitivity to environmental factors. Weapons designers must know intimately and design carefully for the environmental conditions in which a weapon may be used. And the naval commander at sea must know how to use environmental conditions to best advantage to obtain a winning edge. Development of this knowledge is the principal focus of the United States Navy's oceanography program. In a military balance where the navy of our principal adversary is superior in numbers and near in comparable technology, it is likely that the navy with the better knowledge of the environment will have the war end on his terms.

Not long ago, the United States Navy held a virtual monopoly on the development of knowledge and experience in the deep ocean. Naval operations in World War II, and thereafter, had established the awareness in the Navy that oceanography was of the utmost importance. Today, while Navy programs and institutions dedicated to expansion of our ocean knowledge continue to flourish, our monopoly on advancement of knowledge does not. Private industry, marine oil exploration and ocean mining firms, and scientific societies, have eclipsed the Navy in many areas. Far more disturbing, other nations—including those not inclined to share information—have developed considerable knowledge and expertise in the deep ocean. The Soviet Union has undertaken an enormous effort in deep ocean exploration, yet little knowledge from their efforts has found its way into the scientific community.

While Soviet efforts provide virtually nothing to the growth of world knowledge and technology, the opposite is anything but true. Free world research and technology in the oceans has been consistently and ominously exploited by the Soviet Union. This is but one aspect of a much wider problem—the considerable hemorrhage of Western technology to the East—much of it military, and most of it willingly sold by Western companies. A current example of this is the new advanced technology sonar system being manufactured by the General Instrument Corporation in Massachusetts. Called SEABEAM, it is a civilian replica of the Navy's version and most capable. The Soviets want very much to obtain this sonar technology, and are endeavoring to purchase it directly or through intermediaries.

As we have recently seen in exhaustive testimony before Congress, the inability of the West to stem the niagara of technology to the East has given the Soviet Union an enormous leverage in their military buildup. We have saved them literally hundreds of billions of dollars in development costs in computers, microelectronics deep submersible technology, and—unfortunately—much more. The Reagan Administration has undertaken major initiatives to stem this flow and I believe they will be successful. In direct contradiction of the universality of knowledge and enlightenment, I am indeed advocating that—particularly on the frontiers of knowledge, in the deep oceans and outer space—we must not share militarily-applicable technologies with the East, and we must make tough efforts—not lip service—to keep a close hold on every advantage we develop.

Another of the several litanies that I generally give before public audiences is a catalogue of the many dramatic shortages that we have developed in our Navy over the last 20 years of steady budget cuts—a Navy half the size of the thousand ships we had then, with half the number of aircraft, and alarming shortages in missiles, ammunition, spare parts and equipment. These are the more visible manifestations of military weakness that President Reagan addressed in his campaign. But what should be much more alarming to thoughtful men is the equally drastic decline in basic research funding over those years. In the Navy, oceanography has been a direct casualty of that decline in funding. Twenty years ago, in the Kennedy Administration, we were devoting nearly 9% of our GNP to defense, and the Navy was devoting .76% of its budget to basic research including oceanography. Today, those percentages have declined from 9% of the GNP to 6%, and basic research from .76% of the Navy's budget to .4%—or about half. As a result, our Navy has—to a great extent—lost the basic pioneering leadership in the inquiry into ocean sciences that it has historically provided our nation. While there are some who would applaud this demilitarization of research, they would be shortsighted indeed to do so. Just as the pioneering leadership of our government space program has provided enormous spinoffs of technology to industry—and to the consumer—so too has naval oceanographic research been an engine of development and productivity for the oceans industry and for consumers everywhere in the world.

An example of what I mean was demonstrated recently off Southern California by scientists from Scripps, MIT, and Woods Hole. Termed acoustic tomography, this technique is patterned after the medical CATSCAN technique. A matrix of sound generating devices and acoustic receivers is emplanted over a large ocean area. Through complex mathematical inversion techniques, variations in acoustic travel times are translated into a "picture" of ocean structure. Here is a technique that holds great promise for synoptic mapping of ocean structure over large areas—a direct result of the combination of existing technology and innovative thinking.

Without question, the oceans will be the source for meeting many of mankind's future needs. While we may take some amusement from efforts by the American fishing industry to rename and hence to rehabilitate such tasty but unappealingly-named fish as the mudsucker, the ratfish, the tilefish, and the toadfish, that very effort points to the enormous, untapped food resources of the seas which lie fallow—while seven tenths of the world's people go to bed hungry.

As nation-states in the world declare and prepare their readiness for war over the sources of scarce energy and mineral supplies, we must take far more seriously the potential resource treasure in the deep seabed. While much of the debate has focused on the manganese and cobalt now readily available, we must realize that of the nearly two dozen strategic minerals on which America is now virtually wholly dependent on overseas sources, the existing evidence leads us to conclude that nearly all of these needs could be provided from the seabottom, and that sufficient quantities are available to meet the needs of not only America—but the rest of the world as well. The discovery of polymetallic sulphides escaping directly through fissures in the earth's crust on the ocean floor suggests mining prospects vastly more exciting than anything dreamed of just a few short years ago. And still we have not even scratched the surface of the bottom of the seas. As Seneca said, "Many discoveries are reserved for ages still to come, when memory of us will have been effaced." But we do have an obligation—to ourselves and mankind—to get on with those discoveries that lie within our reach today.

Because of this enlightened and visionary awareness of the promise within the deep oceans, the United States earlier this month had the courage and wisdom to vote against the acceptance of the current draft of the Law of the Sea Treaty. I have addressed the shortcomings of this deeply-flawed treaty before other audiences, and I shall not dwell upon them here. The effort that this Treaty Draft embodies was, I believe, ill-fated from the start. It was based on a fundamentally false ideological premise that the seas are somehow owned by all mankind, and that therefore a creation of the United Nations should assume the property rights and administer them. This is a clear example of how the abstract ideology of "mankind" so prevalent in recent years—and so dangerously incorrect—would operate to prevent all mankind from benefiting from the world's resources.

Instead of this flawed approach towards establishing a productive ocean's regime, I see instead a continued development of a pragmatic "common law" of the seas. Based upon the long-established principles of customary international law, I see the development of a web of bilateral and multilateral agreements based on national interests that will bring forth the benefits of the deep oceans to the world economy. The United States should—and I believe will—be the world leader in this vital development effort.

Happily for us there is a new vigor in the field of oceanography. Some of the best minds in the country have become involved—men of vision. One of these—not surprisingly a former naval person—Dr. Robert Ballard of the Oceanographic Institute at Woods Hole, has, I believe, provided us with the theme for the next decade and beyond. The United States undersea efforts should go for the "high ground" of the deep oceans. In the unfamiliar terrain of mountains, ridges, and seamounts, Dr. Ballard has already made sufficient discoveries to convince us that we are on the verge of an entirely new era of mountain exploration deep in the seas. With his pioneering exploration and research along the Atlantic Ridge—which splits the Atlantic basin north to south—he has begun to explore what we may come eventually to term "new continents." He has provided us sufficient evidence to know that here we must begin.

He reminds us that the average depth of the ocean is less than the distance from the Pentagon to the Oval Office. Yet, to date, our Navy has all but ignored these volumes of opportunity. No longer. The technology is now in hand to operate regularly to these depths, to master them, and to use them to enhance our national security—even as we open new worlds of mineral development.

Quite literally, it is indeed time for our nation to go for the high ground in the deep seas. As T. H. Huxley once said, "The known is finite, the unknown infinite; intellectually we stand on an islet in the midst of an illimitable ocean of inexplicability. Our business in every generation is to reclaim a little more land."

And so, I believe, we stand.●

VISTA SHOULD NOT BE ELIMINATED

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, since it took office, the Reagan administration has been attempting to eliminate VISTA programs. I have never understood the administration's opposition to a program that engenders self-sufficiency among the poor and disadvantaged in our country. I am proud to say that I have fought those attempts. And I am pleased that enough Senators and Congressmen have agreed with me to keep VISTA alive.

Nevertheless VISTA suffered deep funding cuts in the last 2 years. As a result, the number of volunteers available has been drastically reduced. This program can simphy not survive further cuts.

As we near the time when the administration asks us to eliminate VISTA through the appropriation process, I would like to remind the Senate of some of the important jobs performed by VISTA volunteers. I submit a letter I received recently from a sponsor of a VISTA volunteer, the Mental Health Association of Boise, Idaho, and ask it be in printed the RECORD. I urge my colleagues to study this eloquent testimony to the value of this important program.

The letter follows:

MENTAL HEALTH ASSOCIATION,
Boise, Idaho, July 8, 1982.

Senator EDWARD KENNEDY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: In April of 1982 the Mental Health Association in Idaho received a grant from the VISTA program to fund a full-time VISTA volunteer for one year. The volunteer is funded to coordinate a Mental Health Association-sponsored project for emotionally disturbed children. The objectives of the project are three-fold: (1) to develop and conduct a public awareness/education campaign regarding the needs of and services to Idaho's emotionally disturbed youth; (2) to institutionalize the effort by developing a volunteer organization of parents, teachers, legislators, mental health professionals and others which will, in turn, address long term goals; (3) and to establish a "Sponsor An Idaho Child" fund/program that would provide a non-profit mechanism for soliciting contributions from the private sector specifically for the care and treatment of Idaho's disturbed children. This fund would be created for those children and families that require financial assistance for their care, thus shifting some financial burden from the public system.

The Mental Health Association in Idaho has only two paid staff: the Executive Director and a part-time Administrative Assistant. The Director's role is purely administrative, dealing primarily with community relations and fund-raising. The Association relies heavily on volunteers to implement and carry through its programs. Because of the focus and scope of this particular project, normal volunteer participation simply would not be adequate. For this reason, a VISTA volunteer was requested. The volunteer has worked on the project since April 19, enlisting the aid of many local mental health professionals in volunteer capacities. The Association has contributed office space, resources, and supplies, as well as the time and energy of the Executive Director, who has lent much of her expertise to the publicizing of the program.

The Association project, now in its third month, has accomplished its first aim of assessing the needs of emotionally disturbed children and has begun to fucus on a specific program of public education. The Assocation, in conjunction with private and public mental health agencies, other agencies involved with children, (i.e. Department of Child Protection, Department of Youth Rehabilitation) the school system, parents and foster parents, has decided to concentrate on early identification of children at risk of becoming seriously emotionally disturbed, and on providing referrals to available treatment resources. The short term goals include the distribution of a brochure entitled: "Stress—It's Not Just For Grown-Ups" which lists observable behaviors by children that may indicate emotional disturbance and also gives alternatives for seeking possible treatment. In addition, a television spot is planned using a similar format. The long term goals include the sponsorship of educational work-shops on topics related to the mental health of children. The Association's State Annual Meeting in October will revolve around this issue; funding is being sought to allow day care providers and teachers to attend the conference free of charge.

The VISTA project is incredibly cost effective, if allowed to run its full year. According to our estimates, for the cost of the funding ($5,256 for one year), approximately 400 families will be directly impacted. These families are the ones who we expect will actually seek treatment from mental health professionals. Another several hundred will be effected through their participation in work-shops, support groups, and by seeking help through alternatives other than mental health professionals, such as their minister or pediatrician. By distributing brochures to day care providers and offering free or low-cost workshops for them on identification of disturbed young children and communication with the families, we expect to impact a sizable portion of that population.

However, the three months of funding that already has been provided will amount to wasted money if the VISTA program is ended in September. We understand that there is an attempt being made to limit VISTA's fiscal year 1983 budget to only $230,000. If this occurs, VISTA will be forced to close as of September 30. Over 2000 new VISTA volunteers, placed at projects from March 1 through April 15, 1982, will have to leave their projects. Since VISTA volunteers typically work in agencies similar to the Mental Health Association, which have no extra man-power, the projects will be left unfinished.

The results of closing VISTA ahead of schedule will be counter-productive in other ways as well. The impact on the VISTA volunteers, the sponsoring agencies, and the people served by VISTA will be enormous. As an example, the MHAI has been able to clearly identify a need for early identification of emotionally disturbance in young children. But, except for our proposed program, no other agency is making a concerted effort to reach parents and day care providers.

In a time when volunteerism and self-help is being promoted by the administration, the closing of VISTA, an agency devoted to both, can only be negative.

A minimum of $12 million is needed for VISTA in fiscal year 1983. This represents a budget reduction of well over 65 percent from last year. With a $12 million budget, VISTA can be kept alive and volunteers at projects until April of 1983.

This letter is being sent to you as a representative who can really make a difference. VISTA needs your support to continue and the Mental Health Association in Idaho needs VISTA's support to complete our goals. We would be pleased to share more details of our project if you are interested. We feel it is a worth while, low cost, highly efficient use of federal money and one that will better the quality of life for many families.

Sincerely,

BETSY GABEL,
Executive Director.●

STATEMENT OF PAUL OLIVER, PRESIDENT OF ELECTRONIC DATA SYSTEMS WORLD CORP., S. 708, BUSINESS ACCOUNTING AND FOREIGN TRADE SIMPLIFICATION ACT

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, the most compelling evidence of the need to eliminate the ambiguities in the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act comes from the U.S. companies who are involved in legitimate overseas business transactions. One of those companies, Electronic Data Systems World Corp., which does business in Europe, Latin America, the Middle East, and the Far East, submitted a statement to the Senate Banking Committee on June 1, 1981, listing the kinds of problems that it had encountered as a result of the lack of clarity in the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. Mr. President, I ask that the statement of Mr. Paul Oliver, president of EDS World Corp., be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF PAUL OLIVER

The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977, as written, constitutes a formidable disincentive to U.S. companies wishing to export products and services abroad. This position has been stated widely; among its most recent advocates are U.S. Trade Representative Bill Brock and Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldridge, both of whom have commented as such since taking office in the Reagan Administration.

Statements in this vein are not difficult to substantiate. In a General Accounting Office survey of 250 of the 1,000 largest international U.S. corporations, 60 percent of the companies replied they could not compete successfully against foreign companies that reportedly are bribing foreign officials, according to a March 4, 1981 GAO report to Congress. The report elaborated on the findings, stating that, due to the sensitive nature of the overseas bribery issue, U.S. sales losses cannot be quantified easily.

A government interagency task force on export disincentives, established by the Carter Administration, estimated that the FCPA is responsible for a minimum loss of $1 billion in U.S. export income.

Other sources provide similar disturbing statistics. According to Engineering News-

Record (December 19, 1979), the total value of U.S. foreign contracts declined from $21.3 billion in 1975 (two years before passage of the FCPA) to $18.3 billion in 1978. In 1957, the United States boasted 21 percent of the world's export market; by 1979, the U.S. share was a mere 12 percent (Arab News, June 18, 1980). One year before the FCPA became law, the United States ranked first in the overseas construction market; a year following the passage of the act, the U.S. occupied fifth place in market share, behind Japan, Korea, West Germany, and Italy (Wall Street Journal, August 3, 1979). Of this phenomenon, a West Coast construction executive commented, "A good part of the reason for this is the 1977 law. The commissions we used to pay are still a social or business custom in some countries, but now they're crimes as far as we're concerned."

The Saudi Arabian construction market provides a closer analysis of the commercial decline of the United States abroad. As the largest current market for construction and other contracted services, it is probably also the world's most competitive market for these labor-intensive services. According to Saudi Report (November 12, 1979), U.S. contractors won 9 percent of all Saudi Arabian construction projects in 1975; the U.S. market share had fallen to 6 percent by 1978, and by 1979 was only 3 percent. More disastrous than these figures is the decline in the U.S. share of Saudi Arabian civil and military construction projects awarded by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. In 1975, 35 percent of the contracts were assigned to U.S. companies; this percentage dropped alarmingly to 5 percent in 1978. By 1979, U.S. contractors were winning barely 2 percent of these construction projects.

Consensus with the opinions of Brock and Baldridge was nearly unanimous in an "informed poll of more than a dozen British and European trade officials." The overall feeling of those questioned was that the United States indeed had lost overseas business as a result of FCPA restrictions (Wall Street Journal, August 3, 1979).

In addition to losses in overseas sales revenues, increased accounting costs instigated by FCPA accountability clauses have been of economic concern to U.S. companies. According to the March 4 GAO report, 72 percent of the survey's participants estimated an increase in corporate accounting costs of at least 11 percent as a result of perceived FCPA requirements. Some 22 percent of the responding companies said their accounting costs had risen more than 35 percent. In response to the GAO report, the Commerce Department noted that accounting cost increases would be much greater proportionately for small and medium-sized companies than for the large multinationals.

Staff increases created by corporate attempts to comply with FCPA standards comprise a large portion of the additional accounting expenses. According to Time magazine (March 16, 1981), one Wall Street entrepreneur dubbed the FCPA the "Accountants' Full Employment Act of 1977," noting that the law not only has forced companies "to beef up their internal audit staff," but to "double-check the propriety of even the most inconsequential payments." As an example, the article cites Xerox staff members in Cairo, Egypt having to obtain executive-level clearance to pay telex and telephone repairmen monthly tips totaling $8.00.

At a spring 1981 conference of the Institute of Internal Auditors (IIA) and the National Association of Corporate Directors (NACD), some attendees challenged the Federal Government to "put its own house in order" in light of the push toward increased corporate accountability brought on by the FCPA.

Speaking at the conference, former U.S. Treasurer Francine Neff received an ovation for her suggestion that "the public sector be no less accountable than the private sector." Following her speech, she commented to the press, "I just loved hearing Senator Metzenbaum talk about corporate governance, and then when I asked him if the Senate did not feel it had oversight responsibility regarding the accounting of government, he told me it would be too expensive." ("Accountable For What? Executives Push Changes in Corrupt Practices Act," Shirley Hobbs Scheibla).

An officer of EDS World Corporation, the international subsidiary of Electronic Data Systems Corporation (EDS), stated that accounting costs have increased as a result of complying with FCPA accounting standards. Although the total increase in costs has never been computed, he cited additional personnel requirements in the company's internal audit staff, added responsibilities for branch office accountants, and FCPA educational seminars for branch office general and financial managers as some of measures taken in response to the enactment of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

The 1977 act was created in partial response to the public revulsion brought on by the events of Watergate. In a statement of policy issued August 28, 1980, the Securities and Exchange Commission acknowledged that the Senate committee studying the FCPA had recommended that the act be passed in order "to bring these corrupt practices to a halt and restore public confidence in the integrity of the American business system." EDS agrees with this line of reasoning, and with the following comments made by the House and the Senate during hearings on the FCPA, citing the adverse effects of bribery on both domestic and foreign policy:

"[Revelations of corporate bribery] shook the Government of Japan to its political foundations and gave opponents of close ties between the United States and Japan an effective weapon with which to drive a wedge between the two nations. In another instance, Prince Bernhardt of the Netherlands was forced to resign from his official position. . . . In Italy, alleged payments to officials of the Italian Government eroded public support for that Government and jeopardized U.S. foreign policy, not only with respect to Italy and the Mediterranean area, but with respect to the entire NATO alliance as well." (H-R Rep. 95-640, supra note 3, at 4-5).

And from the Senate:

"Corporate bribery of foreign officials. . . . affects the very stability of overseas business. . . . [and] is fundamentally destructive." (S. Rep. 95-114, supra note 3, at 4).

As represented by his bill S. 708 presently before the Senate, Mr. Chafee also is in agreement with the necessity of condemning the unethical and corrupt practices prohibited by the FCPA.

It is the way in which the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act was written, however, that has caused problems for U.S. companies operating overseas: both the antibribery and the accounting provisions are riddled with ambiguities that make any interpretation of the act uncertain at best, and the lack of a materiality standard in the accounting provisions prevents any corporate assurance that a particular set of internal controls is adequate. Moreover, U.S. companies are competing with foreign companies, not bound by U.S. law, for international business; under these circumstances, an international business; under these circumstances, an international approach to the control of corrupt payments is more logical. Mr. Chafee's bill presents some workable amendments to provisions included in the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977.

The March 4 GAP report points out that the ambiguities present in the FCPA antibribery statutes have made U.S. companies hesitant to pursue international contracts—a position that creates the likelihood of the loss of legitimate business. Among the ambiguities cited by the GAO survey participants are the infamous "reason to know" clause, intended to qualify the responsibility a company must take for actions performed by its foreign agents; the fine distinction between a bribe and a facilitating payment; and a form of "double jeapardy", a result of dual enforcement opportunities by the Department of Justice and the SEC.

Since passage of the FCPA, the public and private sector have debated the proper interpretation of the reason to know clause. Even the SEC hierarchy conflicts over this point. At the recent IIA-NACD conference, SEC Commissioner Philip A. Loomis, Jr. observed that on the question of corporate liability for a FCPA violation, there exists "a considerable difference of opinion in the Commission" in a case where the U.S. firm does not have controlling interest and does not involve itself in the daily management activities of its foreign corporation. In discussing an SEC statement of policy, outgoing SEC Chairman Harold M. Williams stated that the SEC uses percentage of ownership guidelines in enforcing the FCPA. However, the GAO survey report points out that policy statements, on which the SEC bases many of its arguments defending the present form of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, are always subject to change. Not bound by law, these statements offer little comfort to U.S. companies risking hefty fines or criminal prosecution.

In some countries, operating through local agents is essential for expatrite firms that wish to do business, required either by law or custom. Several U.S. companies hit hard by the FCPA agree that "it is impossible even to get on the bidding lists without paying what amounts to an 'entry fee' to a local agent who has good connections with the government in power." (Wall Street Journal, August 3, 1979).

In the same article, an executive of an engineering consulting firm headquartered in Beaver, Pennsylvania discusses the problems with dealing through a commission agent. "It is difficult to determine whether their services are legitimate and yet we're criminally liable if it turns out their services aren't legitimate," he observes, adding that his company has withdrawn from the pursuit of Middle East business since enactment of the FCPA.

According to a Time magazine article, "Big Profits in Big Bribery" (March 16, 1981), in order to operate in Saudi Arabia, a U.S. or other foreign firm must "be connected, via an agent or middleman, to a member of the royal family;" in other words, every expatriate company must have its own Saudi prince.

While EDS' personal experience has not found the princely requirement as vital as the Time article represents, an EDS World manager says that, under Saudi Arabian law, any foreign company doing business with the Saudi Arabian Government must operate through a local agent. A company also may be restricted legally from accessing their agent's books, making it virtually impossible to know how the agent utilizes a commission once it is in his hands. According to the EDS World manager, EDS requires its Saudi Arabian agents to sign a statement certifying that any commission paid to them by the company will not be used for corrupt purposes. The EDS World representative went on to say that "agents are paid a commission on actual revenue we receive from customers. Presently, we pay their commissions as we receive monthly client payments," meaning that the agent does not receive a questionably large lumpsum payment, and he is responsible for seeing that EDS is paid by the customer before he can expect to collect his commission. However, the EDS World manager continues, saying that some foreign agents are pushing hard for a "large commission paid up front since our contracts usually involve a large down payment for start-up costs." While EDS has been successful to date in deterring such requests, the representative notes that other companies have agreed to agents' terms, and "it is becoming increasingly difficult not to meet their demands."

An EDS World manager who has worked extensively in the Far East agrees that EDS cannot examine the books of the Company's foreign partners or agents. "Our partner in Malaysia, however, has such an impeccable reputation, that I am confident all his dealings are above-board." Bribery is verboten in Singapore, which is rife with anti-corruption forces.

Mr. Chafee has recommended that payments made by foreign subsidiaries or agents be excluded from prosecution under FCPA unless the payment was authorized or directed by a U.S. representative of the company. Previous examples have shown the difficulty in "knowing" under the reason to know clause. The substitution of the clause with Mr. Chafee's amendment would constitute an invaluable step toward eliminating the act's ambiguity.

The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act defines a corrupt payment as any payment or gift made or promised "for the purpose of influencing any act, decision, or failure to act of a foreign official, foreign political party or official thereof, or candidate for foreign political office, or inducing such a person or party to influence any act or decision of such foreign government or instrumentality in order to assist a reporting company in obtaining, retaining, or directing business to any person." The problem with this definition arises in attempting to distinguish between a corrupt payment, forbidden by the act, and a facilitating payment, explicitly permitted by the act—in order to determine what constitutes a bribe according to the FCPA. The Time magazine article of March 16 notes that facilitating payments, or "so-called grease payments, such as fees to get low-level civil servants to perform their bureaucratic duties. . . . are specifically permitted on the grounds that petty corruption is unavoidable almost anywhere." The article goes on to state that allowing these payments creates a gray area "between that sort of bureaucratic paper shuffling and the discretionary authority of local officials to withhold approval for a project or license, and thereby extort not $50 or $100, but perhaps $10,000 or even $500,000 from a victimized company."

The lack of a standard of materiality, detailed later in this document, provides a partial explanation for the confusion over the point at which a payment becomes a bribe. Mr. Chafee's request that the term "facilitating payment" be redefined should answer definitively many uncertainties arising from this portion of the FCPA.

Attendees of the IAA-NACD conference voiced complaints citing and difficulties arising from the vagueness of the FCPA in outlining the terms of compliance with the act. The act is approximately four years old; compliance guidelines by the courts and SEC are few and far between.

The FCPA establishes a Department of Justice business review procedure through which companies may request an opinion as to whether or not a specific action is in line with the law. To date, approximately one year after establishment of the review procedure, only five companies have requested opinions. Of these requests, Justice has responded to four. Several reasons exist for the seeming unpopularity of the procedure. The interagency task force on export disincentives, established during the Carter Administration, has named as justification for not utilizing the procedure unfavorable publicity arising from the use of the review procedure, the indefinite delay that is inevitable in awaiting a decision by the Justice Department, and the risk of the disclosure of confidential statements provided to Justice.

Probably the major reason more companies do not take advantage of the Department of Justice review procedure centers around the SEC's refusal to participate in the review, and to be bound by the opinion ultimately issued by the Justice Department.

In a statement of policy dated August 28, 1980, the SEC states it is "aware of no difference of substance between the Commission and the Department of Justice with respect to interpretation of the bribery prohibitions."

The SEC explains the necessity of its noncooperative stance, because determinations involving Section 30A of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 must consider motivation and intent as well as subject matter.

As the FCPA currently stands, a company requesting and receiving clearance for a proposed action under the Justice Department review procedure may not be prosecuted by Justice for the action involved. However, the company may be prosecuted by the SEC. In defense of its position, notes the SEC, "this policy statement elminates the possibility that the commission would commence an enforcement action with respect to transactions that are the subject of a favorable letter, issued prior to May 31, 1981, as part of the Department's FCPA Review Procedure."

The May 31 expiration date is now imminent, and, as mentioned earlier, policy statements are not legally binding and are subject to change. Obviously, if the review procedure is to succeed in its intent, revisions are required.

Mr. Chafee's bill requires formalization of the review procedure, requiring a response, binding on both Justice and the SEC, within 30 days of the submission of the request. Confidential information contained in a review letter would be exempt from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act. These actions are necessary to allow the review procedure to fulfill the purpose for which it was intended. Additionally, Mr. Chafee's proposed bill would require that the Department of Justice issue guidelines describing specific conduct associated with export sales agreements and international transactions that are in compliance with the FCPA. Under the bill, the FCPA would constitute the sole substantive prohibition on international bribery, thus eliminating the possibility of prosecution under various laws pertaining to mail and wire fraud. The incorporation of these provisions into the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act is essential if the ambiguities contained in the antibribery clauses are to be eliminated.

"The Reagan Administration has already signaled its dissatisfaction with the act," states the March 16 Time magazine article, "and particularly its tendency through loose wording to cast a chill over the willingness of U.S. businessmen to push into foreign markets and thereby help boost U.S. exports. . . . The Administration seems to be indicating, whether intentionally or otherwise, that it is prepared to let enforcement of the act languish."

Any stance by a branch of the Federal Government that, in essence, ignores the existence of the FCPA is bound to be detrimental. By neither enforcing the act as written nor changing the provisions as needed, the Administration would only demonstrate disrespect for a Federal law, corrupting in itself. In addition, such a position would do nothing to alleviate the ambiguities in interpretation that are the principal cause for consternation.

Even the Justice Department appears to be having interpretive problems with enforcement of the FCPA. In an address on the Justice Department's program to provide foreign payments advice to U.S. businesses, See Heymann outlined a list of FCPA enforcement priorities. In other words, in the eyes of the Justice Department, some brides are more corrupt than others. For instance, according to the list of priorities, a company corruptly paying a foreign cabinet officer is more likely to face prosecution than a company that bribes an offical of lower rank.

The apparent difficulties related to enforcing the act as it is written demonstrate the necessity of changing the law in order to make it more enforceable. Clearing up the ambiguities included in the antibribery provisions is vital if U.S. companies are to understand the limitations within which they must operate internationally.

Since inception, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act has been the United States' unilateral attempt to put a halt to international bribery. When corrupt payments are accepted as a fact of life throughout many parts of the world, so one-sided an attempt must fail.

That bribery constitutes the formidable norm in many countries is well supported. The Wall Street Journal article of August 3, 1979, discusses a number of foreign governments that "either look the other way when overseas bribery occurs," or worse yet, "surreptitiously encourage the practice in order to increase their exports and improve their balance of payments." The acceptance of corrupt money is common in the major portion of the globe: the developing African nations, the Far East, Central and South America, and the wealthy kingdoms of the Middle East.

International bribery takes many forms—often the method of payment is far more sophisticated than the cash-filled envelope passed across an empty chair. A popular method in the African nations is the creation of a cushiony job within the contracted project—a job that, of course, is given to a friend or relative of some high-level official. In Mexico, weekend jaunts to Acapulco or Cancun are popular, with all accouterments, provided by the bidder. Corruption in Indonesia "is so family-oriented that in the early 1970s, President Suharto's wife Tien was known as 'Mrs. Ten Percent.'"

A recent Indonesian incident involved a $9,000-a-year government employee; upon his death, an estate totaling nearly $35 million was discovered, money allegedly paid to him by two German companies in connection with the construction of a Djakarta steel mill. (Time magazine, March 16, 1981).

The actions of the two German companies involved are not a rarity among European entities. "Bribery by West German companies to obtain foreign contracts isn't illegal. . . ." Moreover, it is tax deductible as a business expense (Wall Street Journal, August 3, 1979). The West German Federal Office for Foreign Trade Information, in a confidential memorandum, has warned corporations that they must be prepared to pay bribes that may run as high as 20 percent of the contract price (Time magazine, March 16, 1981).

Just last year, the Italian Government passed a law stating the legality of bribes paid by Italian companies to foreign officials. One Italian construction firm is developing an exclusive deluxe resort in Uruguay; so far none of the land has been offered for sale to the public. Instead parcels of land have been passed out to Latin American officials when a big deal has needed an impetus to close (Time Magazine, March 16, 1981).

Sir Frederick Catherwood, former chairman of the British Overseas Trade Board, expresses little doubt that a law similar to the FCPA would not receive popular support in the United Kingdom. Exports account for 30 percent of the U.K.'s GNP, as opposed to 8.5 percent of the GNP of the United States. "We who are much more valuable, would be killed," concludes Sir Frederick (Wall Street Journal, August 3, 1979).

The non-existence of a French law on bribery is explained by the head of a French company dealing in the Middle East, "The French authority know quite well that you cannot deal in those countries without payoffs." (Time magazine, March 16, 1981).

In 1979, a Belgian company was forced into bankruptcy after paying a $282 million "commission" for procurement of a $1.2 billion Saudi hospital contract (Wall Street Journal, August 3, 1979).

The Far East appears to be a hotbed for the paying of bribes as well as the receiving of them. The Japanese Government makes it a policy not to investigate the international business activities of Japanese companies; no agency similar to the SEC exists in Japan, although a short-lived one was created following World War II. In Tokyo, "the man-on-the-street reaction to questions about payoffs is that they are an established way of transacting business." (Wall Street Journal, August 3, 1979).

The Saudi Arabian Government recently banned the largest construction conglomerate in South Korea for two years, indefinitely imprisoning the company's resident manager, in response to a bribery attempt. The Korean firm had been the most successful construction contractor in Saudi Arabia prior to being barred from the country. (American Businessmen's Group of Riyadh).

Representatives of numerous U.S. companies have stated publicly that they believe they have lost international business over the issue of bribery. The Time magazine article of March 16 describes the typical contract in which the bribery question will arise—"a large project in an industry that is highly competitive but with little significant difference among the products," for example, a telecommunications or construction project.

Several corporate executives related their tales to the Wall Street Journal. For instance, a senior vice president in an Oak Brook, Illinois company felt that bribery at least partially was responsible for the loss of over $100 million in sales over a three-year period. Similarly, a firm based in Cleveland, Ohio refused to compete on a West African project upon learning they would be expected to pay some 13 percent of the contract value to the country's president and an aide.

The aviation market long has been known as a hotbed of loose payments. Stated one Lockheed Corp. official, "In many countries, rewarding the decision makers is still the way that things are done in the business community. It's pretty obvious that we now have less ability to get an audience or even the attention of the decision makers when they know we're restricted in paying fees."

The restrictions seemingly are working to the advantage of Lockheed's foreign competitors. Since the enactment of the FCPA, the European aviation consortium Airbus Industrie has been tremendously successful in marketing its A300 airliner to the government-owned airlines of Singapore, Indonesia, Thailand, Malaysia, and the Philippines. The sales all were accomplished within an 18-month period "at a time when U.S. companies were restrained from employing their past sales practices." (Wall Street Journal, August 3, 1979).

In the meantime, "Lockheed Corp., whose very name was synonymous with payoffs and freebies for foreign officials in the 1970's . . . no longer picks up even hotel bills for customers visiting its California headquarters for contract talks." (Time magazine, March 16, 1981).

Perhaps most familiar with corrupt payments stories are members of the U.S. Foreign Service working overseas. In 1979, the U.S. Embassy in Zaire sent a cable to the State Department, warning that the FCPA placed U.S. companies "at a distinct disadvantage." (Wall Street Journal, August 3, 1979).

An EDS World executive admits that he is certain the company has lost revenues over the question of bribes, but he could not cite the amount nor could he give specific incidents, A corporate manager, formerly in the Middle East, agreed that EDS had lost business when bribery became an issue, but declined to elaborate on the topic.

Another EDS World representative commented that he does not believe EDS has as large a problem as some companies with situations in which corrupt payments are expected. "We're selling an intangible product. It is too confusing to skew the results of a data processing plan." He agreed with a Wall Street Journal reporter's comment that companies offering a tangible competitive product in which differences are minute and difficult to differentiate are most likely to be the victims of bribery requests.

Because bribery is an international problem, it requires an international solution. Without an effective universal ban on corrupt payments, U.S. companies face the inherent disadvantage of competing against companies that can provide a little added incentive—and will, if that's what is necessary to win the contract.

According to the March 4 GAO report, over 50 percent of the survey participants agreed that a strong international agreement would increase the competitive ability of U.S. companies abroad. Since efforts to effect a universal anti-commercial bribery treaty have not been fruitful, the GAO report recommends that Congress monitor future efforts closely.

In light of the attitude toward bribery held by foreign competitors, and considering the fact that in many parts of the world corruption is considered a fact of life—often perfectly legal according to local law—it is imperative that the U.S. lead the push toward a worldwide moratorium on bribery. EDS is in complete agreement with Mr. Chafee's request, in his proposed bill to amend the FCPA, that the President of the United States should pursue negotiations of the treaties necessary to establish international standards of business conduct.

The accounting provisions of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act are burdened with ambiguities similar to the uncertainties existing in the antibribery provisions. Terms like "reasonable assurance" and "reasonable detail" and SEC references to "state of mind" have clouded a definitive interpretation of the act and raised questions that elude positive answers.

Over 50 percent of the participants in the recent GAO survey termed the reasonable assurance rules for accounting controls and recordkeeping procedures as inadequate.

The SEC counters their agrument, stating that the reasonable assurance concept is consistent with the Commission's policy of allowing companies to set up their own standards.

The inexplicit nature of the reasonable detail concept has generated some frustrated discussion among members of the U.S. accounting profession. At the recent IIA-NACD conference, Donald L. Scantleberry, director of the GAO's Financial and General Management Studies Division, commented that he preferred "precise laws so that guessing isn't necessary." Under the FCPA, a company could be challenged on its decision to review all checks over $10,000; theoretically, the courts could decide that a review of all expenditures over $2,500 would constitute reasonable detail for that company.

What is missing in the accounting provisions set forth in the FCPA is a standard of materiality, a meaure favored by 70 percent of the GAO survey participants.

One IIA-NACD conference speaker warned that neither independent CPA reports nor internal accounting controls constitue FCPA compliance because these methods apply only to material items. Consequently, the best that corporate accounting staffs can hope to do is successfully second-guess the courts and the SEC.

When questioned about the adequacy of EDS World's accounting procedures in meeting FCPA requirements, a company official said he was satisfied the methods employed were effective and reasonable. When asked whether he was confident that the SEC would find EDS World's review and control procedures in compliance with FCPA, he admitted he could not guarantee such a ruling because of the loosely defined regulations. He added that he favored a standard of materiality but felt the minimum material requirement should be low enough that the smaller companies would not suffer at the expense of the multinational conglomerates.

Policy statements issued by the SEC have argued strongly against a standard of materiality. SEC Commissioner Stephen J. Friedman, in a recent address to University of Kentucky students, commented that the absence of a materiality qualification was not a cause for alarm because although it complicates a company's position, it "does not give the SEC free rein." In an elaboration of the SEC's January 13, 1981 statement of policy, Chairman Harold M. Williams stated, "Internal accounting controls are concerned with misconduct that is material to investors, but also with a great deal of misconduct which is not." He added that he believes materiality is an inadequate control standard.

Mr. Chafee has made several recommendations in an effort to clear up these ambiguities. His proposed bill would define "reasonable assurance," "reasonable detail," and "in all material respects," as these terms now appear in Section 102 of the FCPA. The definition would make explicit the cost/benefit evaluation followed by the SEC in designing internal accounting controls. Said the SEC's Williams, "Thousands of dollars ordinarily should not be spent conserving hundreds."

To assure U.S. companies of the rules by which they are playing, it is time the SEC's policy statements and policy interpretations be consolidated into the law. Mr. Chafee's bill further advocates that the FCPA incorporate a materiality standard, and that the link between materiality and the preparation of financial statements in conformity with generally accepted accounting principles be reinforced. In light of the definitive guidelines these recommendations will create, the EDS World official commented that their adoption would certify compliance with FCPA standards.

Further confusion within the FCPA's accounting provisions arises out of the SEC's references to state of mind. Stephen J. Friedman said, in his recent speech, that the likelihood of a reoccurrence of a violation of the FCPA's accuracy requirements must be present before the SEC may obtain an injunction, and that the state of mind needed for criminal conviction would be absent in the case of an inadertent violation.

Harold M. Williams reinforced this opinion, stressing that the SEC would not take action against unintentional recordkeeping violations. He added that U.S. companies will not be prosecuted for falsification of records of which management "broadly defined" was unaware and "reasonably should not have known."

Mr. Chafee recommends that the FCPA incorporate provisions requiring the knowing falsification of books, a knowingly wrongful attempt to circumvent an internal accounting control system, or the deliberate maintenance of an inadequate control system to constitute a violation of the act's accounting provisions.

It appears Mr. Chafee is requesting simply that the SEC stand behind its statements. To clarify and solidify past policy statements by writing them into law would simplify enforcement and compliance with the act.

Even the SEC's Williams has admitted that it is time the SEC gave private industry a clearer idea of what is expected under the FCPA, adding that the act "can have a debilitating effect on activities of those who seek to comply with the law. . . . business resources may have been diverted from more productive uses to overly burdensome compliance systems which extend beyond the requirements. . . . The public, however, is not well served by such reactions."

No, the public is not well served when the law raises more questions than it answers. As outlined above, the accounting and antibribery provisions recommended by Mr. Chafee would go a long way in resolving many of the current questions and would minimize the loss by U.S. companies of legitimate overseas business.●

SMALL BUSINESS INNOVATION ACT

(Mr. BAKER submitted the following statement for Mr. PRESSLER.)

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of the Small Business Innovation Act, I am particularly pleased that it has been signed into law.

This act, which will set aside a percentage of Federal agencies' research and development—R. & D.—budgets for small businesses, recognizes the important role that America's small businesses have played in our technological advances.

It is estimated that small businesses produce 24 times more innovations than larger businesses per R. & D. dollar. Yet today, these small businesses are facing difficult economic times which threaten their ability to continue their pioneering efforts. We also run the very real risk of losing the creativity and productive genius of a large segment of our population.

By insuring that small businesses have access to Federal R. & D. dollars, we are making a vital contribution to their efforts. In addition, we have done this without spending one additional taxpayer dollar.

It is my hope that the small business set-aside program will serve as a model of what a Government program should be—worthwhile, efficient and, ultimately, an energizing force in the American economy.●

ORDER FOR RECORD TO REMAIN OPEN UNTIL 6 P.M. TODAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I anticipate that the Senate will recess shortly. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that Members may have until 6 p.m. today in which to introduce statements, bills, and resolutions into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF TIME TO REPORT RESOLUTION REQUIRED UNDER SENATE RESOLUTION 20

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules and Administration have until the close of business Tuesday, July 27 to report the resolution required under Senate Resolution 20, the so-called TV-in-the-Senate resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, let me say to begin with that I think all of these requests have been cleared with the minority leader. I state them now for his consideration and that of other Members.

ORDER FOR BILL TO BE HELD AT DESK—H.R. 6663

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 6663 be held at the desk until the close of business on Tuesday, July 27.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see the Senator from California is in the Chamber. May I inquire if it is his plan to speak at this time?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I do plan to speak, Mr. President.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I know of no other Senator who is seeking recognition or plans to seek recognition in this period for the transaction of routine morning business. I have three routine requests to make.

Before I do so, I ask unanimous consent that when the distinguished Senator from California completes his remarks, the Chair place the Senate in recess according to the order previously entered, until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the remarks—

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BAKER. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I wonder if the majority leader would yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the recognition of the Senator from California, the Senator from Mississippi be recognized, and at the conclusion of the remarks by the Senator from Mississippi, the Chair place the Senate in recess, according to the order previously entered, until 9:30 a.m. on tomorrow.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from California.

(The remarks of Mr. HAYAKAWA in connection with the introduction of legislation are printed under Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.)

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BONDS

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, last week, during the consideration of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, I joined the distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO) and others in proposing an amendment easing some of the restrictions which the committee recommendations had placed on the industrial development bond program. I highly commend the Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO) and others who worked on this program, which has brought much good to the Nation as a whole.

This amendment was adopted by the Senate. I hope, however, that the House of Representatives will not take any action which will eliminate or unduly restrict this program.

I have long been a strong supporter of industrial development bonds. In fact, Mississippi originated this program and has used it to great advantage since 1936, while still in the heart of the Great Depression. During this period, industrial revenue bonds have been an important economic tool not only in my State but also in many other States. It has spread now to at least 48 of the 50 States, as I understand it.

These bonds have helped create jobs in industry where none existed before, and they are still producing jobs to this day, highly important jobs, because they are in small units and are the only source for any kind of industrial work in many of those communities.

I think it is a grave mistake, in the passage of a large revenue bill, to hastily and totally eliminate a program which is the only program in its field that is a going concern.

We are trying to get up other programs. We had the Lugar bill, and it fell by the wayside. We are trying to get up other programs that meet this situation at least in part. However, as the bill now stands, it will be entirely eliminated after a few years.

A particularly dramatic instance of the use of such industrial revenue bonds is found in the July 26, 1982, issue of Business Week magazine. This article, entitled "Luring Jobs to the Reservation," narrates how the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians used a $26 million industrial revenue bond to persuade American Greetings Corp. to open a 350-person card-finishing and packaging facility on its reservation near Philadelphia, Miss.

This is a significant and important step. It stimulates development and brings steady employment to members of the tribe, many of whom had never before experienced it. An executive of American Greetings stated that without the bond issue "we probably would not have looked at this deal very seriously."

The creation of jobs is very important to this country. It is particularly important to the Choctaw Indians since it creates jobs where none existed before. I am emphasizing this about this small tribe of Indians. It is a remnant of the original, fine—numerous for that time—group of Indians that sold out most of their land there and moved to what is now Oklahoma. With unemployment running at a 9.5-percent rate nationally and 11.6 percent in Mississippi, we cannot afford to pass up any opportunity to find and establish job possibilities.

Resort to the industrial development bond program by the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians is a significant and heartening development. It shows how important this program is, particularly at a time when Government training funds and other Federal work incentives are drying up. I believe it would be a serious mistake if Congress were to seriously restrict or kill this program, and I hope that this will not happen.

Mr. President, in order that there may be further circulation of this fine article, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LURING JOBS TO THE RESERVATION

With federal funds for Indians cut to the bone and the Reagan Administration committed to making Indian tribes self-sufficient, tribal governments are developing a new sophistication in attracting industry to the reservation. The Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, for instance, used a $2.6 million industrial revenue bond to persuade American Greetings Corp. to open a 350-person card-finishing and packaging facility on its reservation near Philadelphia, Miss. Other tribes are experimenting with joint-venture agreements to develop reservation energy resources or are using revenue from grazing leases to modernize reservation facilities.

In the case of the Choctaws, the industrial revenue bond built and equipped the American Greetings plant, reducing the cost of financing the project by 2 percent to 3 percent and bringing steady employment to tribe members—many of whom had never before experienced it. Without the bond, says a company executive, "we probably would not have looked at this deal very seriously."

UNEMPLOYMENT

Indians efforts to woo private industry may mean the difference between stark poverty and hope for the future on many reservations. Of the 750,000 Indians who live on reservations, 75 percent earn less than $7,500 a year, according to the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs. Among the Mississippi Choctaws, unemployment runs 25 percent to 30 percent—and ran 35 percent to 40 percent before the recent opening of the American Greetings facility and another, smaller plant. And the figure is even higher at some other reservations.

"To deal with unemployment, you have to find job possibilities," says Phillip Martin, chief of the Mississippi Choctaws and president of the National Tribal Chairmen's Assn. "It's not easy. Doing business with the private sector is very competitive, very complicated. It takes a lot of preparation." Says Kenneth L. Smith, Assistant Interior Secretary of Indian affairs and a member of the Wasco tribe of Oregon: "We have to learn to depend on our own economies instead of the federal dollar."

Neither the tribes nor their white advisers expect the Indian-private industry partnership to flourish quickly or easily. "Indians have been wards of the government since treaty days, and they have to overcome generations of being dependent on the federal government," says Conley Ricker, chief executive officer of the American Indian National Bank (AINB) in Washington. But Ricker notes that this spring some 300 Indians representing 65 tribes—twice the number expected—attended an AINB seminar in Denver to hear details of what the Choctaws and other tribes have done to attract industry.

Indian interest in drawing industry to their reservations is not new. General Dynamics Corp., for instance, has operated an assembly plant on the Navajo reservation in Arizona since 1967, currently employing 100 Indians. But in the past, government training funds and other federal incentives were a major inducement, and under Reagan those funds are drying up.

SECURING LOANS

Now tribes are looking into sources of private financing for industry. Some are exploring ways of securing loans that would be used to make improvements on their reservations, then paying them off with revenues from tribal land leases or with income derived from tribal investments. One North Central tribe, for instance, borrowed $300,000 from AINB for debt consolidation and working capital and is currently repaying it with grazing revenues obtained from the lease of tribal land.

Other tribes are luring private investment by putting up their own resources or money. Resource-rich tribes, such as the Jicarilla Apaches of New Mexico (who have signed joint-venture agreements with two oil companies to develop oil and gas reserves on their reservation), are exploring partnership agreements for development of energy and timber resources. Such arrangements would make resource exploitation more profitable for Indians who, in the past, merely collected royalties or lease fees.

Some well-heeled tribes are spending their own money on facilities to attract industry. Last year the Salt River Pima-Maricopa tribes, which own land adjacent to upper-income Scottsdale, Ariz., put up nearly $1 million to build a high-security warehouse for Motorola Inc. "If you rent land, you're not doing as well as if you rent out a turnkey facility like the warehouse," says tribal attorney Richard B. Wilks.

SETTING UP INCENTIVES

But many tribes have neither resources nor money, and they are the ones most interested in attracting private-sector jobs. Indian Affairs' Smith believes that Administration-backed legislation to set up enterprise zones in areas of high unemployment, offering tax incentives to companies that locate in such zones, would help several reservations.

Some Indians feel, however, that their most effective instrument could be the industrial revenue bond. It is an essential tool for tribes without natural resources, tribes whose only resources are their people, argues the Choctaws' Martin. But Indians cannot legally issue such bonds. The Choctaws had to persuade nearby Philadelphia, Miss., to issue bonds for the American Greetings plant. Many tribal leaders are pinning their hopes on a bill sponsored by Senator Malcolm Wallop (Wyo.), now pending in Congress, that would allow Indian tribes to issue bonds. "It would put reservations on an equal status with counties and cities," says Charles E. Trimble, a member of the Oglala Sioux tribe and a consultant both to tribes and to private companies.

In addition to winning legal help, Indians must live down the effects of some of their past actions, such as the occupation of a Fairchild Camera & Instrument Corp. plant on the Navajo reservation in Shiprock, N.M., by a band of militant Indians in 1975. Those days are over, says Smith. "We have a lot more sophisticated tribal governments out there than a few years ago," he says.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). Under the previous order, the Senate will now stand in recess.

Thereupon, at 2:04 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Tuesday, July 27, 1982, at 9:30 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 26, 1982:

VETERANS ADMINISTRATION

Everett Alvarez, Jr., of Maryland, to be Deputy Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, vice Charles Timothy Hagel, resigned.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Charles L. Dunahue, of Colorado, to be U.S. Marshal for the district of Colorado for the term of 4 years vice Rafael E. Juarez, resigned.

Clinton T. Peoples, of Texas, to be U.S. Marshal for the Northern District of Texas for the term of 4 years. (reappointment).

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SOVIET ATTEMPTS TO DESTROY UKRAINIAN CHURCHES

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the Senate version of House Concurrent Resolution 123, which seeks the resurrection of the National Churches in the Ukraine, was recently passed by the Senate. This version, Senate Concurrent Resolution 18, will be considered by the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations of the Foreign Affairs Committee tomorrow afternoon. For the benefit of the Members and especially those on the Foreign Affairs Committee, I wish to insert an article by Dr. Lev E. Dobriansky, chairman of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, which effectively discusses the attempts by the Soviet authorities to destroy the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic Churches in the Ukraine:

THE UKRAINIAN QUARTERLY—A JOURNAL OF EAST EUROPEAN AND ASIAN AFFAIRS

(By Lev. E. Dobriansky)

RELIGION, ECONOMICS AND POLITICS

Once again in the United States citizens are being confronted and challenged by an increasing intermixture of religion, economics and politics. To be sure, that isn't the first time this type of interaction has occurred. In this generation alone, the mix operated in connection with the Kennedy presidency, Vietnam and the conservative shift in 1980. The left-wing religionists held sway in the latter part of the 60's and through the 70's, right down to Iran and the issue of the American hostages. Now a new Moral Majority has upsurged with essentially the same characteristics of religious value imputations into the body politic, reinforced by cumulated, economic power.

This tri-dimensional pattern is, again, being analyzed and criticized by liberals and conservatives alike. Doubtlessly, we shall be going through another period of re-examining the place of the pulpit in society in general, the use of funds attracted by the religious appeal in influencing political campaigns, and the fundamental issue of the basic sphere of religious instruction and influence in a free and democratic society. That religious values and precepts apply absolutely to individual life patterns, there can be little rational question, raised even by atheists and agnostics. There unbridled extension into the body politic over and above the conduct of individuals and issues of social justice and human rights does, however, raise grave questions and endless controversy.

It is not my purpose to engage in this immediate controversy. Rather, the introduction was outlined to show the easy interrelationship of religion, economics and politics—or, if you will, positive scriptured values, economic power to advance them, and with target points in the political arena—as is currently at play on the American scene. Whatever his opinions or biases may be, even an uncritical observer can discern the activist intermixture, whether for better or for worse. The striking aspect of all this, however, is the apparent inability or sheer indifference of most individuals and groups indulging in this interplay to project their religious concerns on a plan which is perfectly legitimate for their efforts and international in scope. Without exaggeration, one of the most genocidal outrages of this century—religious in character—has been almost thoroughly neglected by organized religious bodies, both here and abroad.

There's no need to recount the public speak-outs of religious advocates concerning the supposed immorality of our stake in the Vietnam war, or the conditions surrounding Soviet Jewry, injustices in Brazil, Argentina, Chile and El Salvador and apartheid in South Africa. Any reader of the daily newspaper is aware of these involvements. In many of these and other cases there is much ground of justification and merit. Considerable economic resources, political agitation and religious concerns have been poured into these cases and more. Yet, for some reason (lack of knowledge, an obsessive dialogue with Moscow, over-cautious diplomacy, narrow lobby interests greased with financial contributions) a real act of religious genocide has met largely with silence from our chief organized religious bodies on this plane of unassailable propriety as concern religious values, appropriately channeled economic support, and political impact geared to fundamental national human rights. Needless to say, in God's eyes the plight of mankind is not restricted to any one area of this planet.

The long background

It is strange, to say the least, that the destruction of the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic Churches in Ukraine has not been of major concern to organized religious and human rights groups; concern in the activist sense of supporting and participating in attempts to crystallize this outstanding issue and to rectify it. All the elements for such cooperative support have been ever-present: religious and human rights values, uncontested scholarship on this heinous result of Stalin's genocidal policies, and successive opportunities to pinpoint the issue in public fora. As to why these elements failed to conjoin among those groups which normally display a natural and instinctive interest in such outrages is a question that perhaps can be answered in numerous ways and with varying application.

The background on the issue is long and detailed. Just concentrating here on its presentation in the U.S. Congress over the past three decades should be sufficient to indicate the mystery the surrounds the relative passivity of the organized religious and human rights groups with respect to this outstanding case of Stalinist religious genocide. Many books and pamphlets have been written on the subject, but I believe it serves a constructive purpose to center our attention on the development of official interest in the public forum.

On record, the first opportunity arose with U.S Senate consideration given to the Genocide Convention in 1950. It delivered testimony before a subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee this whole issue of the destroyed Churches was elaborated upon.[1] I had the privilege of working at the time with Dr. Raphael Lemkin on the convention. Dr. Lemkin, a unique person, coined the term genocide and contributed heavily to the convention text. It can be truthfully stated that he sacrificed his life for the ratification of the convention by all governments. Regrettably, to this day the U.S. Senate has not ratified the treaty. It should be stressed, however, that Stalin's liquidation of two churches falls under genocide. Lemkin held this position, and so do I. The concept applies fully, and does not mean, as too many inaccurately think, just mass killings with intent to liquidate various groups and nations. Also, it should be noted that the USSR is a party to the treaty, having ratified it years ago.

The Select Committee on Communist Aggression and Takeover—the famous Kersten committee, under the chairmanship of Representative Charles J. Kersten of Wisconsin—provided another significant opportunity to press the issue of the two Churches. From 1952 to 1955, the committee held hearings across the country and assembled material on the now captive nations, slave labor and Russian concentration camps that far surpass anything that an Alexander Solzhenitsyn from his limited experience could possibly provide. The heavy contributions of this committee remain monumental to this day. As in the case of the first hearings on the Genocide Convention, the output of this congressional committee was widely publicized. And here, too, the genocide of the two Churches in Ukraine was emphasized in the hearings and incorporated in a special committee report prepared at Georgetown university.[2]

On the basis of this cumulative development, practically the next ten years showed references to the two destroyed Churches in one context or another. In discussion about the policy of liberation under President Eisenhower this crime of Stalin received adequate mention. In 1959, Congress passed the Captive Nations Week Resolution (Public Law 86-90) and in every Captive Nations Week observance since, the crime has been brought up. When Congress passed the Shevchenko Memorial resolution in 1960, calling for the erection of Shevchenko's statue in Washington, this religious issue was repeated time and time again, right down to 1964, when the statue was unveiled.

The obvious point is that these significant strides in our general American understanding of the captive nations. Ukraine and the non-Russian nations in the USSR, the Ukrainian poet laureate Shevchenko, and the traditionalized Captive Nations Week furnished occasions of national significance in which the persistent issue of the two Churches inevitably had to be raised, and on the technical plane of genocide. In short, the issue was never dimmed out: in fact, it was frequently reported in this nation's newspapers and periodicals. Many analysts who grasped the significance of the issue, also began to relate it to other dominant facts. As they eventually saw, the two Churches were, after all, de facto national Churches by reason of their respective members in quantity in a non-Russian nation that by population is the largest of all the non-Russian nations both within the USSR and Eastern Europe. When such basic facts are related and seen as a whole, the genocidal nature of the destruction becomes more apparent.

Despite this cumulative development, the mystery for me and others was the relative silence of the organized religious and human rights groups toward the issue. Religion, economics and politics seemed to take diverse roads. In Congress, however, the development continued with hearings in 1965 on the state of religious freedom generally in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.[3] Testimony submitted at the time highlighted again the barbarous liquidation of the Ukrainian Catholic and Orthodox Churches in Ukraine. The thrust then was to generate positive congressional interest in the issue in the hope that some constructive action would be taken. As always in such situations, the political climate was appropriately taken into consideration, and it wasn't too conductive. Our government was becoming progressively involved in Vietnam, and in the years ahead the situation became even worse, complicated by such phenomena as the civil rights movement, campus unrest and riots, and growing confusion and disorientation on the American scene.

However, the issue of the two Churches was by no means buried. Points made in the testimony at this stage serves as guidelines for opportune discussion and consultation with legislators during this turbulent period. Briefly, when occasion afforded, it was a process of continuing education. There were many supporters in both chambers of Congress, but the heavy turnover in legislators certainly made the task more difficult. And the turnover wasn't solely by the electoral medium. For example, one of the most interesting in pressing the issue was the Senate Minority Leader, Everett M. Dirksen. My relations with the prominent leader were very close. Yet, he felt that the issue should be kept in abeyance as other perhaps more urgent issues required our concentrated energies at the time. One, for instance, was the much debated Consular Convention; another was East-West trade. Extensive testimony and counsel were given by this writer on both issues during this period. The Russian rape of Czecho-Slovakia in '68 involved much time and energy, too, in view of its implications for the non-Russian nations in the USSR. Then, the untimely death of this close friend, the unfortunate defeat of Senator Frank Lausche of Ohio, and other setbacks required new courses of action in dealing with the issue of the two Churches.

This brief description of a state of affairs is only to affirm the old and well-established truth that ideas, even the best of them, have to wait their time for fruition. Examples of this truth are endless. I guess the learned technique is simply to keep the ideational pot boiling. For instance, whether one agrees with them or not, the conservative ideas expressed in the '64 Goldwater campaign for the presidency took seventeen years to be accepted and tested with the new Reagan Administration. As will be shown below, I'm of the confident belief that the time has come for positive and constructive action on the issue under discussion. The process of addressing it was unavoidable. As in all such matters, it required patience, perseverance and, of course, deep conviction.

It wasn't until 1970 that the next formal and official opportunity arose to advance the issue of the two Churches. And, as a further, prominent example of what was described above, this was in connection with the broader issue of the Genoicide Convention, which after thirty years still has not been resolved. Additional testimony was given on the Convention, with concentration again on Stalin's genocidal policy toward the two Ukrainian Churches.[4] The position taken in earlier years had to be reinforced in view of the inaccurate and indiscriminate use made of the term genocide by some civil rights agitators and also anti-Vietnam war demonstrators. The testimony demonstrates the conceptual conformance of Stalin's annihilation of the two Ukrainian Churches with the technical definition of genocide as contained in the treaty. Many legislators have been persuaded of this.

The next round on the issue was six years later during further hearings on religious persecution in the Soviet Union.[5] As in previous years, the hearings provided an official occasion once again for a discussion of the issue. A careful analysis and reading of the sources quoted here would show that although the subject matter has been the same, its interpretative treatment differed from hearing to hearing as shaped by the contextual framework of the hearing and the objective circumstances of the period in which the hearings were held. In short, topical repetition was obviously unavoidable—what some foolishly call a single-issue preoccupation—but the relatedness of the issue to numerous others and the potential ramifications it possesses quickly develop into a multi-issue enterprise.

What's more, at this time careful distinctions of thought had to be drawn between religious persecution and religious genocide. Baptists, Pentecostals, Muslims, Jews and other religious groups in the Soviet Union have been severely persecuted, but institutionally, whether to a greater or lesser extent, they have remained in existence, in institutional being. This is not the case regarding the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic Churches in Ukraine. The people are not only being religiously persecuted, but their organized religious institutions have been genocided. The dire effects of this on the unity of a nation, indeed its existence as such, should not be too difficult for one to glean. This and other crucial points of distinction have had to be developed under the ostensible single-issue caption.

Strikingly enough, the heavy interrelationship of religion, economics and politics in the Soviet Union finds its harshest manifestation in the destruction of the two Churches. Regardless of its superficial and nominal constitutional provision on religious freedom, the central Moscow government in this Soviet Russian empire is avowedly atheist and committed to the obliteration of organized and personal religious beliefs anchored in the existence of God. It wields totalitarian economic power that dictates who is to receive resources and who is not for the necessary institutionalization of these respective beliefs held in common. And, for politics, Moscow can find it convenient to utilize its anti-religious stance and economic power to advance its objective of political domination by Russifying and genociding the basic, institutional sinews of a non-Russian nation like Ukraine. In brief, the nexus of religion (negative for Moscow), economics and politics in the Soviet Union is extensive, tight and barbarous.

On this and for subsequent inquiries, the writer extended this theme in an article showing the woven interconnection between imperialism and religious persecution and genocide in the Soviet Union.[6] The outstanding case and example? Naturally, again, the two genocided Churches. For a full, cultural understanding of this outrageous Stalinist crime, any critical observer has to go beyond the crime itself and causally explain its very possibility, the reasons for its execution and the motivations for the executed policy. At risk of repetition, this is scarcely a single-issue enterprise. The realistic approach is necessarily a holistic one, analytically and synthetically combining together all the main, existential factors contributing to the commission of the crime. And these are Soviet Russian imperialism, totalitarian rule, a skewed nationalities policy, and the fear of a powerful and tested expression of non-Russian nationalism.

By 1977 a new context emerged for the steady advancement of the two Church issue. This was the Helsinki Accords. Another official opportunity, another testimony and still another interpretative variation in the handling of the issue.[7] Baskets I and III of the Accords furnished more than adequate room to develop further the two Church issue. The interlocking aspects of all this were concisely and clearly set forth. In addition, an urgent plea was registered for our U.S. delegation to the Belgrade meeting to present the now well-developed case of the two decimated Churches. As somewhat expected, it shied away from it. Regrettably, the same held true for our delegation to the following Madrid meeting.

That year, too, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee reviewed again the prospects of ratifying, finally, the Genocide Convention.[8] And once again a fitting statement was submitted, emphasizing the two Church issue. It reiterated all the previous arguments, but by this time the issue was concretized and formally represented in the form of a congressional resolution aimed at specific Executive action on the subject. For several good reasons, this was not done and furthered in the period before. The spurious detente policy pursued by Nixon, Kissinger and Ford regarded such a venture as "provocative" and not in line with their appeasement inclinations. Frankly, I couldn't understand the logic of their position. To say the least, it was both exasperating and frustrating to witness this spectacle which finally came to an end with the new Carter Administration. There were even attempts to prevent the establishment by Congress of the sound Commission on European Security and Cooperation.

At the Republican national convention in Kansas City in 1976 the ringing cry was for the restoration of morality in our foreign policy. On the Democratic side the cry of human rights in our foreign policy was properly raised. Both really crystallized popular dissatisfaction and disgust with the detente policy pursued by the two administrations. The climate became more conducive for the furtherance of the two Church issue. The justification for a formulated resolution had now a basis. Moreover, as before, a new conceptual framework evolved for another formal presentation of the issue, this being the human rights foreign policy of the Carter Administration.

In September, 1980, the House Committee on Foreign Affairs conducted hearings on human rights in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. Yes, with the matter at hand, the same issue but seen in a different light and setting[9]. This has always been the case, one which has made the development of the issue interesting, engaging the self-enlightening. On philosophical grounds, the testimony presented several, constructive criticisms of the administration's human rights policy, as well as coherently incorporating the two Church issue. Action was not taken on the pending resolutions because of the national election year and all the electoral preoccupations this entails. However, a promise was made publicly and in print that action on resolutions pertaining to the two Church issue will be taken in the new Congress. And at this writing such action has already been taken by the U.S. Senate.

The time has come

As indicated above, resolutional effort on the issue became most practicable in this most recent period. A start was made on March 17, 1977, when Congressman Daniel J. Flood of Pennsylvania submitted for himself and others H.Con. Res. 165, seeking the resurrection of the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic Churches in Ukraine. He was joined in this by Representative Annunzio, Burke of Massachusetts, Delaney, Derwinski, Dodd, Giaimo, Koch, Moakley, Patten, Sarasin, Stratton, Walsh and Wydler. It was referred to the House Committee on International Relations, but no positive action was taken. This, so to speak, was the warmup period on this dimension.

The warmup was extended in the 95th Congress to the Senate side when, on June 14, 1978, Senator Barry Goldwater of Arizona submitted a similar resolution. S.Con. Res. 92 had the same objective. In his well-stated remarks at the time the once presidential contender stated "We must keep the issue alive. We must help the courageous and devout, fellow human beings in Ukraine who are preserving the survival of religion against tremendous odds and at great personal risk." [10]

In the following year Representative Flood re-submitted the resolution under H.Con.Res. 72. New sponsors included Representatives Conte, Philip Crane, Dornan and McDonald. Flood declared on the occasion, "In terms of human rights doctrine, this Stalinist genocide of the two churches is the most outstanding on record and must be redressed if national human rights are to be honored." [11] A variety of difficulties, including the departure of the chief sponsor from Congress and the passage of another resolution on the 20th Anniversary of Captive Nations Week, momentarily delayed progress on the two Church issue in the 96th Congress.[12] That resolution was H.Con.Res. 233.

The early period of the present 97th Congress saw the submission of Senate Concurrent Resolution 18, relating to religious freedom in Ukraine. Senator Goldwater and co-sponsors, such as Senators DeConcini, Dole, Heinz, Humphrey, Jepsen, Lugar, Metzenbaum, Williams, Hatfield, Zorinsky, Moynihan, Sarbanes and Dodd, enthusiastically endorsed it. In his statement Senator Goldwater forthrightly declard, "This fundamental democratic right of all mankind in the case of the Ukrainian nation can be best assured by permitting the resurrection of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church and the Ukrainian Catholic Church, as well as other religious bodies in the largest non-Russian republic in the U.S.S.R." [13]

Several weeks later, appropriately on May 1, Representative Edward J. Derwinski of Illinois submitted in the House H.Con.Res. 123 to seek the resurrection of the national churches in Ukraine. The resolution has 51 co-sponsors. On the occasion Congressman Derwinski observed, "The people of Ukraine continue to be victimized by the repressive internal policies of the Soviet government, which affect their cultural, political and religious freedoms." [14]

Immediately the month after, on June 16, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, which is under the able chairmanship of Senator Charles H. Percy of Illinois, voted out unanimously S. Con. Res. 18. Three days later, June 19, the Senate passed the resolution. Senator Goldwater stated this, "I am delighted that the Senate is about to pass Senate Concurrent Resolution 18. . . . The Soviet policy of massive and deliberate persecution of religious groups in Ukraine is, in my opinion, no less than a policy of genocide." [15] An article in a New York organ captioned the event under the term "genocide" and emphasized the measure "calls for the 'concrete resurrection' of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church and the Catholic Church. . . ." [16]

The next phase and beyond

With S. Con. Res. 18 passed by the Senate, the ball is in the House court. It is expected that promised action will be initiated soon on the Derwinski measure, S. Con. Res. 123. The easy combination of the two could promise a convenient concurrence. Talks and negotiations on both resolutions have been under way. The final passage of the concurrent resolution would conclude this long period of educational and resolutional effort. It would represent the final phase of this story, but by virtue of the content of the resolution it would also be the beginning of virtue of the content of the resolution it would also be the beginning of a new chapter of activity and movement toward its consummate objective. Plainly, the resolution is not mere wordage and rhetoric. It contains suggestive ideas that can lead to numerous imagined results of a most salutary nature. An understanding of these ideas and an imagination regarding their possible impact in diverse areas of human action can suggest numerous scenarios.

Religion, economics and politics in the non-totalitarian world might take a new turn in some measure with this resolution on the two Church issue. Surely, the current neglect and misdirected efforts of the organized groups and councils stand to be nudged a bit in the direction of the resolution's objective. Also, in the area of expanded familiarity with the issue, periodicals such as the Reader's Digest and others might respond more sensitively. The September, 1981 issue of the Digest, for instance, carries an article on "The Kremlin vs. the Church," focusing on the Russian Orthodox Church. One on this two Church issue would be even more fascinating and, doubtless, with greater significance and possible impact.

Or to dwell on another area, the corrective influence of the resolution on broadcasts by Radio Liberty would be felt sharply and in the right direction. Incredibly, a report on one of RL's Russian-language broadcasts has stated "Another broadcast upbraided Pope John Paul II for his support of the Uniate (Catholic Church of the Eastern Rite) clergy in the Ukraine," a clergy in the underground. The congressional resolution would be a virtual guarantee against such an operational absurdity. Simply put, the next phase is here: the beyond is fraught with real possibilities of achievement for American leadership.

LIFE IN THE SPIRIT OF LIBERTY

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1982

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I was in my district during the July 4 recess participating in the myriad events that always attend that national holiday. There were inspirational messages, parades, picnics, and fireworks. It is always an exciting, fun-filled weekend throughout America.

Since the weekend was filled from dawn to dusk, I neglected my reading. Fortunately, a friend did not. He sent me the following article which appeared first in Guideposts magazine and was reprinted in the New York Times as an appropriate Fourth of July piece.

I found the article both moving and inspiring and would like to share it with colleagues who may have missed it, too.

KEEPER OF THE FLAME

(By Charlie DeLeo)

I've known her since the age of 9 when my fourth-grade teacher took our class of Lower East Side kids on a ferry ride to visit "Miss Liberty." I was spellbound, overawed by the 302-foot (including her pedestal) structure towering above us, giddy over the adventure of climbing the narrow, winding 16-story staircase to the crown. A little fearful, our class gathered in front of the 23 windows in her diadem and stared down at the toylike ships in New York Harbor.

I felt a small shiver during that moment. It was the beginning of a beautiful, mystical relationship. Our teacher explained that this 225-ton woman symbolized much of what Americans hold dear—the active pursuit of freedom, a generous spirit and the welcoming of all peoples regardless of their backgrounds or circumstances.

As I grew older, I visited Miss Liberty on my own, or sometimes a friend and I would go on a summer's day to picnic in her shade and follow her gaze out to sea. Her look, I thought, was serene but resolute. There was an expression of strength and courage sculpted into her features.

In my late teens, I left my home and New York and the guardian of its harbor to go to Vietnam. When I returned home in 1969, I went aimlessly from one job to the next. I couldn't discover why.

On a spring day in 1972, I decided to take the ferry out to Miss Liberty's 12-acre island and collect my thoughts. As the boat plowed through the choppy waters, I felt an urging that I'd never experienced before. But there it was, very insistent. Ask for a job here! So, when I stepped off the boat, I walked into the office and did just that, and I was hired on the spot.

As a member of the maintenance crew, I scraped and painted Liberty's spiral staircases, cleaned her windows and replaced them with screens for the warm months, swept her paths and picked up candy wrappers and soda cans left behind by her visitors. Here at last I was caring for something, an intricate part of our heritage. My grandparents were among the throngs standing at a ship's railing, straining to catch the first glimpse of this statue; I feel fortunate to be one of those people responsible for her care.

Sometimes I take a coffee break while perched on one of her eight-foot-long fingers, where I sit in the open air 34 stories above the harbor. What a curious, great sensation to feel the brisk harbor breezes pushing at me and yet all the while feeling secure in that precarious place, secure in the hand of Liberty.

Liberty holds in her left hand a tablet emblazoned with our date of independence, "July IV, MDCCLXXVI." But it is what she holds in her right hand that has consistently fascinated me.

I remember the day, shortly after I began working at the statue, when I unlocked the metal gate leading to her right arm. I slowly climbed the 42-foot ladder—closed to tourists now—leading me through Miss Liberty's arm. The ladder, only 12 inches wide, ended at a trapdoor. I put any shoulder to the hatch and came out to the most glorious view of the Verrazano Bridge, New Jersey flatlands, Brooklyn docks and Manhattan skyscrapers.

There I was, standing just below the torch, its 200 panes of amber glass sending out a 2,000-watt beacon from four high-intensity sodium vapor lamps. I was so drawn to this lofty hideaway with its bird's eye view of God's world that I often took my lunch up there.

My supervisor learned of my frequent trips up to the torch and called me into his office one day. I knew he was going to yell at me because the right arm and torch were off limits.

Instead, he said, "Well, since you're spending so much time up there, I thought we'd just put you in charge of it. You'll have to keep the glass cleaned, check the stairs, maintain the area and see to it that the flame is always burning. What do you say?"

So now I'm the Keeper of the Flame. And I climb up every day to check the lamps and polish the amber panes so that the rays of light will continue to reach as far as possible.

The afternoon sun is high as I look out over the railing—out to the sea and the lands beyond, then over to the mainland with its factories and rows of homes and stiltlike office buildings. I think beyond to the suburbs and to the farms and to the cities and villages beyond them—to all parts of America.

And I say a prayer for all Americans. I pray that we will enjoy the fullness of life in the spirit of liberty; that we will cling to those ideals that have made our country a beacon around the world, and that every man, woman and child will come to know life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness that God intended for us all.●

STATEMENT ON VOTES

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1982

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I am taking this opportunity to indicate my positions on votes taken last Thursday, July 22. On rollcall No. 202, the Bethune amendment to the Zablocki amendment, to prohibit procurement or production of binary chemical munitions, I would have voted "aye." On rollcall No. 203, the Courter substitute to the Zablocki amendment, I would have voted "no." On rollcall No. 204, the Zablocki amendment, as amended, I would have voted "aye." On rollcall No. 206, the Dellums amendment striking funds for the B-1 bomber, I was paired in favor of the amendment and would have voted "aye."●

BANGLADESH: THE OTHER SIDE OF THE STORY

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1982

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, on June 8, 1982, I inserted in the RECORD a piece from the New York Times which was highly critical of the way the nation of Bangladesh uses American foreign aid and food aid. This article came to the attention of my good friend and Illinois colleague, Senator CHUCK PERCY, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He was kind enough to send me his views on the situation in Bangladesh which do not always agree with the rather harsh judgments expressed in the Times article. In the interest of fair play I want to insert the text of Senator PERCY's letter into the RECORD at this time:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D.C., July 16, 1982.

Hon. ROBERT H. MICHEL,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR BOB: I read with interest your recent statements in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD regarding Ann Crittenden's article in the June 5 New York Times. I would like to take this opportunity to comment on some of the points in the article.

The article is somewhat insensitive to the economic, social, and political limitations involved in working in a country as desperately poor as Bangladesh. Perhaps as a result, the article misses much of the real significance of the policy reforms and economic progress the Bangladesh government has achieved since I visited it in the midst of its war for independence from Pakistan that exploited "East Pakistan" to the point where the new Foreign Minister of Pakistan, Yaqub Khan, resigned from the army as a general and was jailed but later vindicated and freed.

Ten years ago, Bangladesh was a state approaching chaos. Governmental efforts and donor assistance by necessity focused on the immediate problem of feeding a hungry population and establishing the basic institutions needed to govern. By the mid-70's, our efforts had evolved into a complex development program which is increasingly concentrating on expanding productive capacity—not just keeping people alive. The challenge now is to sustain this important struggle by using our economic assistance program to encourage the Bangladesh government to continue making the necessary economic reforms.

Ms. Crittenden herself admits that increases in agricultural production "have outpaced population growth and malnutrition has become less prevalent . . . [and] . . . further gains in agriculture can probably be made in the near future." In a country where people live so very close to the margin and where food is the most important of political issues, this is a significant achievement. Since independence a decade ago, Bangladesh has also made measurable progress in other areas—notably a threefold increase in fertilizer distribution, a fifty percent increase in land under irrigation, and a fifty percent increase in real GNP. This is not to say the fundamental problems of under-development are close to being solved, but just that there is a trend and it is positive.

Her specific allegation regarding U.S. food aid to Bangladesh also displays a fundamental misconception of our program. U.S. food aid shipped to Bangladesh is distributed primarily through two programs, Food for Work (Title II of P.L. 480) and Food for Development (Title III of P.L. 480). Under the former, landless laborers sharecroppers, and other members of the rural poor are paid in kind to work on specific development projects. The projects chosen for this program are approved only after consultation with the Bangladesh government and usually involve such public works as building canals, water tanks, and roads. Under Title III, U.S. grain is sold either through the open market to moderate foodgrain prices for the entire population or through a modified ration system directed exclusively to the rural poor. No U.S. food aid is used in a quite separate program, which provides support to the relatively more affluent urban dwellers, civil servants, and military personnel.

Lastly, corruption is a serious problem in many countries, particularly in the developing world. Food aid programs have been designed to overcome the cultural bias toward corruption, and to deliver food only to those qualified to receive it. Despite these efforts, corruption undoubtedly still exists. In cooperation with concerned Bangladeshi officials, as well as private international voluntary agencies, our officials are continually checking how much of our food aid actually reaches the rural poor and devising stronger safeguards which can reduce the loss from corruption even further.

Bangladesh a decade ago was considered an economic disaster. This is no longer the case. The international community, as a whole, contributes significant funds to Bangladesh because it is considered a developmental success. Our participation in the program is greatly appreciated in Bangladesh, and has won us much respect there and elsewhere.

Warm regards,

CHARLES H. PERCY,
Chairman.●

ANALYSIS OF THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

HON. ED BETHUNE

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1982

● Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, as usual, columnist George F. Will has made us search our souls—this time on the balanced budget amendment.

I take this occasion to insert his most recent analysis of the issue:

BALANCED BUDGET HOAX

(By George F. Will)

God, preparing condign punishment for hot air emitted in support of humbug, turned the temperature up to 90 the day the president addressed a rally for a constitutional amendment to require balanced budgets. The rally to make government—that questing beast—obedient to "the people" was for people with tickets. A ticket to a rally for an amendment to "require" balanced budgets calls to mind the invitation a Lady Colfax issued, after the First World War, to a luncheon to "meet the mother of the Unknown Warrior."

But members of the sainted public could get tickets. Red tickets were for employees of the Republican National Committee and high-level employees of the—if you"ll pardon the expression—government. They got to sit smack in front of the president. Blue tickets allowed lesser government employees to sit farther back from Himself. White tickets, handed out on the streets, put plain people, to whose salvation the rally was dedicated, at the rear.

Behind the president, stewing like prunes in their juices, were congress-persons and senators, some of whom sincerely support the amendment for which they were rallying. Legislators who did not feel ill-used obviously were properly used as applauding props.

Washington's air this season is thick with humidity and hoaxes, such as nuclear "freezes" that won't freeze anything, and "flat rate" tax programs without flat rates. So what is one more hoax among friends? This hoax—this trivialization of the Constitution—is, simultaneously, a confession of political in competence and an assertion of intellectual mastery—mastery not noticeable in the results of recent economic policies.

At precisely the moment when economists are especially bewildered by the inability of their theories to encompass events, politicians, running for cover from the electoral consequences of their activities, are proposing to constitutionalize an economic doctrine. They would graft something evanescent onto something fundamental.

Under the amendment, Congress would be required to adopt, prior to each fiscal year, a statement of receipts and outlays, the latter not to exceed the former. But such economic numbers are estimates made of warm taffy, all gooey and stretchable.

Neither clairvoyance nor candor can be counted on in Congress or the Office of Management and Budget. So who will enforce what on whom if—when—the numbers are significantly wrong? Will the president control outlays by impounding appropriated funds? Will courts superintend the appropriations process?

If the latter, will every taxpayer have standing to sue? No one can know until courts speak. And they will speak, because the amendment does not stipulate that controversies under it are not reviewable by courts. Were that stipulation made, the amendment would become a recipe for paralysis and lawlessness.

The amendment says that total receipts in any fiscal year may not be set to increase at a rate faster than the rate of increase of national income in the previous calendar year. The implication of this is that whatever else the government has recently got wrong, the current ratio of federal spending to national income is just about right.

But, then, the amendment would allow Congress to change this ratio by a simple majority vote. And by a three-fifths vote, Congress could authorize a deficit—which is what Congress has been doing for generations. So, to enable current incumbents to strike a pose, some incumbents want to clutter the Constitution with an amendment that might be, in practice, 98 percent loophole. It would be that, unless the political culture and congressional mores changed substantially, in which case the amendment would be beside the point.

The amendment is long, but should be longer. It depends on Congress' making precise projections, so it should contain 1,000 more clauses, four of which are:

Floods, hurricanes and other acts of God that wish to occur during the next fiscal year must register with OMB six months before the fiscal year begins, so Congress can know that relief-spending shall occur.

Agricultural commodities covered by price supports must inform the Agriculture Department if they are planning to materialize in inconvenient quantities in the next fiscal year.

Anyone planning to need unemployment compensation in the coming fiscal year must notify the Labor Department.

Before causing crises, tiresome foreigners must notify the U.S. Defense Department of any effects their crises will have on U.S. defense spending.

And . . . oh, yes: I love lobster, and own elm trees. Could Congress please require lobsters to grow on elm trees?

Sorry; I digress. It must be the heat.●

AN EDITOR SPEAKS!

HON. DOUGLAS K. BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1982

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, the South Sioux City, Nebr., Star recently reminded us of an incident that was handled so well that it has almost been forgotten. The matter is the air traffic controller strike of last summer. President Reagan acted correctly in dismissing the strikers and the transition was so smooth that the Nation hardly noticed. Instead of setting a bad precedent, the President's action served as a warning to other vital public workers who do not have the right to strike. The Star's editorial makes the point well, and I include it in full in the RECORD.

THE PRESIDENT WAS RIGHT

It is has been almost a year since the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization called an illegal strike which led to their firing by President Reagan.

The president warned PATCO members they would be fired if they did not return to work. They didn't and the firing followed.

Public sentiment backed the president. There were warnings from PATCO members that the skies were no longer safe for air travelers but there was never any evidence that safety was affected by the president's action.

A year later it is hardly apparent that new workers for the most part have taken over the air controller jobs. Most people have probably forgotten there was an air controller's strike.

Meanwhile 10,900 controllers have sought to have their firings overturned through Civil Service channels. They have been unsuccessful.

The air controllers incident should serve as a warning to other essential government employees who might be inclined to strike.

A year later it is apparent President Reagan's action in firing the defiant air controllers was correct. His action may have averted strikes in some other areas of government.●

WHY I LIKE ESSEX COUNTY CONTEST

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1982

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, the county of Essex in New Jersey is celebrating its 300th anniversary this year. To observe the occasion, the county government sponsored an essay contest for students in grades one through six. An anniversary is certainly an appropriate time to both reflect upon the past and examine the present, and this was done in some very touching pieces by the youngsters of Essex County.

The essays are centered on the theme, "Why I Like Essex County." Written with an enthusiasm and sincerity which could only be achieved by youth, they remind us of some of the finest qualities of our county. An article about the competition, which appeared in the Newark Star-Ledger on July 19, 1982, includes several of the students' essays. In order to share their thoughts with my colleagues, and to recognize their efforts, I offer it for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the Newark Star-Ledger, July 19, 1982]

EIGHT NEWARK SCHOOL KIDS ARE PRIZEWINNERS IN "I LOVE ESSEX" ESSAY CONTEST

In observation of Essex County's 300th anniversary this year, the county government sponsored an essay contest for students in grades one through six, keyed to the theme, "Why I Like Essex County."

Of the 750 entries, Juan Rivera, a student at Warren Street School, came in third, winning a $75 bond.

Seven other students from Newark recieved certificates from County Executive Peter Shapiro.

Here are the Newark students' essays:

I like Essex County because it is the place where I've been living for eight years. I love Essex County because it is the place where my home is, my friends, my school and my church. That is just part of what I like about Essex County. But there are other things that not only make me like or love Essex County. It makes me feel proud of it, and all the things that surround Essex County like libraries, the museum, parks, colleges, universities, modern buildings and historical places.

The Newark Public Library is one of the best in the United States for their large collection of books. The museum is one of the best for the art collection, their Fossil Program, the Junior Museum, which is the part of the museum that children enjoy most. The Planetarium, which is in Essex County, is my favorite.

When people from my family come to visit us, we make plans to visit the museum. We are also surrounded by very important colleges like the Essex County College, Rutgers University and the Newark Institute of Technology, which is across the street from my school.

We also have in Essex County good schools, high schools and vocational schools. The modern buildings are one of the things that shows the progress of Essex County but the historical places and buildings show me of the knowledge of the people of the past.

When I go out on vacation with my family or I spend a couple of days with my aunts and cousins in Jersey City, I miss Essex County and that's why I've learned to appreciate all the good things that Essex County provides me. Most of my plans for the future are focused somewhere in Essex County, because it is the place that I know I can have a lot of opportunities and I will get to know it better when I grow older.

JUAN RIVERA, Grade 3,
Warren Street School.

I like Essex County because there are a lot of schools, churches, parks and nice houses. I like the libraries because they are good places to read silently and they have good movies in the summertime. I like to go to the parks because there are fun things to do.

Most of all I like the way the men built Essex County College. I like to go downtown and see tall buildings. I also like to go to the malls to shop. We go to Westside Park for track and to Vailsburg Park for softball and May Ray Day. I love to go to Cherry Blossom Park on Sundays to look at the blossoms. Essex County is the best and prettiest county I have seen and been to. That's why I like Essex County.

SHARESE PORTER, Grade 3,
St. Rocco School.

I like Essex County because it is such a wonderful place to live in. Essex County has many interesting places to go to. One day I went to Turtle Back Zoo. The zoo has many kinds of animals. I like all the animals, especially the seals. They would eat the fish in a minute. The parrots were the loveliest parrots I have ever seen. After I saw the parrots I went to see the horses and ponies. I like Turtle Back Zoo very much.

Another day I went to Newark Airport. It is the best airport I have ever been to. The planes were more beautiful than any other airplanes in other airports. When somebody in my family has to go far so that they have to take a plane, they always go to Newark Airport. When they have to come back they take the plane to Newark Airport. I love living in such a wonderful place. More people should come to Essex County.

LILLIAN VENDRELL, Grade 3,
St. Columba School.

I like Essex County because there are many places that children can visit. Some of those places are museums, libraries, Turtle Back Zoo and parks.

I like to go to the parks in Essex County, especially Weequahic Park, because it is right down the street from my house. There are many activities for young people. I can go to the playground, or I can play baseball or basketball. Also, I can fish or play tennis. I like Essex County because there are lots of activities for children. These activities give young people something to do and help them to stay out of trouble.

I like Essex County because it is a nice place to live. There are several hospitals in case that someone gets sick. The county keeps certain streets clean. This is important, especially in the winter when snow is on the ground. The people in the county can still go where they want to go in all kinds of weather. There are shopping malls located in Essex County where people can shop for bargains.

A lot of famous people have lived in Essex County, for instance, Seth Boyden, Grover Cleveland, and Lucy B. Stone. Seth Boyden discovered the process of making patent leather. There is a housing project right down the street from my house that is named after Seth Boyden. Grover Cleveland was president of the United States. Lucy B. Stone led the fight for women's rights. All of these people helped to make Essex County a better place to live and I am glad that they lived here.

When I graduate from high school and think about continuing my education, there are many colleges and universities that I can go to, such as Essex County College, Rutgers University and Seton Hall University. I'm sure I'll have a hard time trying to decide which school to attend because many important people have graduated from these schools.

I really love living in Essex County and I want to stay here all my life.

MARTHA HODGES, Grade 6,
Dayton Street School.

I really cannot speak or write about all of Essex County, but I can write about the place I live, Newark, and places that I have occasionally seen.

The schools in Newark that I have been to have been educationally rewarding. I have also met a lot of nice teachers and friends in the school system. Boylan Street School, where I attend now, has been responsible for my seeing a lot of historical sites and it has taught me some history. For instance, we went on a trip to City Hall. There I saw and learned a lot. I saw different court rooms. We saw the set-up of the important people. The City Council sits around a table. I saw the Fire Department.

I have visited Vailsburg Park several times with my family and friends. I like the trees, the grass and the swings. The students of Boylan Street School went on a trip to the circus and Morristown, N.J.

I enjoyed it very much. We saw the clowns, and all sorts of animals. It was colorful and amazing to see the different tricks and acts. Every summer my sisters and brothers and I go to the Vailsburg Library. There they have arts and crafts, movies, puzzles, disco, picnics and so many other things. We enjoy them every year.

My father is a minister. We have visited many churches in Newark. My family and I enjoy going to the beautiful churches and the ones that are not so beautiful.

I said at the beginning that I haven't been to too many cities in Essex County but what I have seen I have enjoyed and I really enjoy and I really love Essex County.

DIONNE BAXTER, Grade 6,
Boylan Street School.

In the first place, I like Essex County because this is where I have lived a long time. I like its beautiful pools, parks and museums. I like the clean, fresh, foods in the supermarkets and grocery stores. It doesn't have very polluted air. Also, the people that live in Essex County keep the county clean and looking good.

We are kind to people who come from foreign countries. There are a lot of big hospitals. We have religious freedom to worship God any way we wish to. We also have a cathedral. There are big roller skating rinks, too. We have big, clean grammar schools, colleges, high schools and universities. The county has a lot of theaters and stadiums for you to watch your favorite shows. It has big, beautiful playgrounds. There are all kinds of restaurants, too. Big banks will loan you money any time. Well we also sell perfect furniture for your house.

There is also good transportation like buses, cars, subways, and trains. We have tall buildings to look at, big ice skating rinks for you to have a good time, and many fine clothes stores.

We have a lot of discos for you to spend a fun time. There are all kinds of fields that you can play any sport you like, for example, baseball, basketball, football, kickball, tennis and soccer. Our county is really a great one. We also have many places to go and visit. There are many beautiful sights for you to see. Many tourists like to spend their vacations here because of the beautiful hotels we have. One of the biggest hotels we have is the Hilton Hotel.

EXCLUDE TIPS FROM GROSS INCOME

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1982

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, the treatment of tips under our Federal income tax is a source of problems for both taxpayers and tax collectors. Although a tip is a voluntary and gratuitous gift, it is currently required to be reported as part of the gross income of the recipient. The law requiring tax on these voluntary gifts has created an administrative nightmare. The reporting and filing requirements for tip income are overwhelming small businesses. It is economically impossible for an employer to act as a surrogate auditor—attempting to record and force tax payment on small tip amounts collected daily by their employees.

The Internal Revenue Service has been burdened with an unfeasible legal requirement. Wary of massive tax avoidance due to the failure of many workers to report their tip income, the IRS is spurred to delve further and further into the personal records of taxpaying employers and employees. The result is a poorly administered tax, inviting IRS encroachment into the lives of citizens, taxpayer nonconformance, and resentment of our voluntary tax reporting system.

The treatment of tips as a part of an individual's gross income is incongruous with the treatment of tip income under our unemployment compensation laws. When a worker is paying his taxes, the money he collects as tips is defined as "income." Yet should he suddenly find himself unemployed he will discover that his tips are now not considered income and will not count toward his unemployment compensation. Excluding tips from gross income will bring the income tax in conformity with the unemployment compensation laws.

Most people realize that the tax on tips is administratively impossible to collect. A congressional mandate was made which could not be fulfilled, rendering the law an hypocrisy. Because compliance cost is economically prohibitive, the law-abiding employer cannot be effectively law abiding. This paradox forces honest men and women outside of the law, while decreasing the credibility and force of law. The result has been a broadening of the underground economy, estimated to be over $90 billion in 1981. Enactment of this bill would account for a significant portion of the underground economy, releasing the Government's frustration over tax avoidance.

Equity requires that tips be given tax-free status. Since gifts are deductible to the donor and tax free to the recipient, tips should be treated the same way. Tips are today deductible as a business expense. The recipient of a tip should receive the full tax-free value of the services he or she renders.

Tip income should not be considered equal to a salary-earned income. Salary income is secure, consistent, and contractually guaranteed. Tips are voluntary, gratuitous, and subject to the sole discretion of the customer. Those employees receiving them lack certainty and security in their take home pay. Their income is subject to daily fluctuations. Providing them with a tax benefit compensates for this insecurity, so as to equalize their position with the secure wage earner.

Removing tips from gross income is another prolabor proposal targeted at the "little guy." Cab drivers, bartenders, bellhops, waitresses, porters, and others collecting tips, would have tax-free available cash for savings and investment. While workers who fail to report their tip income are forced to spend the money on consumption, rather than show unreported additions to their income, tax-free tips would allow workers to save and invest this money without fear of IRS investigations.

The service industry as a whole would improve if tips were given tax-free status. Tax-free tips would provide an important incentive and would enhance the quality of work in the service industry. The minimum wage laws would be unaffected by this bill, and employers would still be in compliance with the law.

In summation, excluding tips from gross income would simplify the Tax Code, remove many compliance and administrative problems, promote conformity between the income tax and the unemployment compensation laws, ease the frustration over the underground economy, promote tax equity, and provide an important tax benefit to the bottom of the labor class.●

FULL FUNDING NEEDED TO MEET THREAT OF TOXIC WASTES AND HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1982

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, the Maryland Conservation Council, a group of environmental, conservation, and sportmen's organizations, has written to me urging full funding for programs designed to protect the public's health and safety against the threat of toxic substances in our environment.

I strongly support the view of this organization, and I have written to the distinguished chairman of the HUD-Independent Agencies Subcommittee, Representative EDWARD BOLAND, expressing my hope that the level of appropriations to EPA for this purpose will reflect the urgency of the situation.

For the RECORD, I would like to include the letter and resolution which the Maryland Conservation Council sent to me:

MARYLAND CONSERVATION COUNCIL.

Hon. MICHAEL D. BARNES,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE BARNES: The Maryland Conservation Council delegate members unanimously passed a resolution urging substantial funding for U.S. Environmental Protection Agency implementation of legislation to control and reduce toxic substances and hazardous wastes.

I have attached a copy of the resolution for your consideration. A copy has also been sent to the other Maryland Senators and Congressmen and Congresswomen.

The Maryland Conservation Council is dedicated to preservation and wise use of "Maryland's natural and historic resources, as related to the total environment, through a program of cooperative action for the benefit and well-being of our citizens and our visitors". MCC in a council of Maryland environmental, conservation, and sportsmen's organizations representing about 30,000 members. (See attached roster.)

We appreciate any support you can offer to bring about adequate funding for EPA's toxic substances and hazardous waste control program. An unrecognized need five years ago, safe management and disposition of the toxic by-products of our industry must now have our highest priority in order to assure human, economic, and environmental well being into the next generation. The peril is real and of great urgency. Please act on our resolution to provide the EPA with adequate financial resources to carry out their mandated responsibilities, and urge your colleagues to do the same.

Yours truly,

BARBARA YEAMAN, President.

RESOLUTION OF THE MARYLAND CONSERVATION COUNCIL REGARDING EPA BUDGET INCREASE FOR TOXIC SUBSTANCES MANAGEMENT PASSED UNANIMOUSLY, JUNE 19, 1982

Whereas, the American public has become intensely concerned about toxic substances pollution; and

Whereas, Toxic substances are known to have severe environmental and public health effects. They have become pervasive in the food, environment, and in some cases the drinking water of the American people; and

Whereas, programs for controlling and reducing toxic substances and hazardous wastes in the envoronment by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) such as the Toxic Substances Control Act (TOSCA); the Resource Recovery and Conservation Act (RCRA); and the Safe Drinking Water Act have received inadequate budgets to permit effective implementation; and

Whereas, estimates based upon experience with PCB's and other programs and the workloads associated with these programs clearly indicate that the EPA requires a 1983 toxic substances management budget of $500 million to carry out existing legislative requirements; and

Whereas, this cost (inlcuding an addition for inflation) is les than $3.00 per capita per year; and

Whereas, the Maryland Conservation Council expresses its firm belief that a $3.00 per capita expenditure by the EPA to control and reduce the hazard of toxic substances and hazardous wastes in the nation would be desired and supported by a vast majority of Americans to protect the public health and environment today and in the future: Therefore, be it

Resolved, that the Maryland Conservation Council supports an additional $500 million to be added to the 1983 budget of the EPA to permit the implementation of existing legislation for controlling and reducing toxic substances and hazardous wastes in the environment; and that. . .

The Maryland Conservation Council requests that the Maryland Senators and Representatives to the United States Congress promote expenditure in the $500 million range (or $3 per capita) to implement present toxic substances legislation and hopes they will be joined in this endeavor by representatives of other States.●

THE REPORT OF THE U.S. ADVISORY COMMISSION ON PUBLIC DIPLOMACY

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1982

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy recently published its 1982 report to the Congress and to the President of the United States. As you know, the bipartisan Commission is made up of distinguished Americans from various backgrounds who serve as public trustees for the International Communication Agency, our overseas information agency. The Commission is enjoined to assist the policies and programs of the agency and to report its findings to the President, the Congress, the Secretary of State, and the Director of the Agency.

At this time I am inserting in the RECORD the summary of the recommendations of this valuable report:

I. SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

PUBLIC DIPLOMACY AND NATIONAL SECURITY

The International Communication Agency is little known within the United States and often overlooked, yet its role is vital to our national interest and the conduct of our foreign policy. Public diplomacy is as indispensable to our national security as military preparedness, and the Commission strongly urges that it be treated with the same urgency and concern.

STRUCTURAL RELATIONSHIPS

The Commission recommends that USICA's role in the foreign affairs community be institutionalized to ensure the regular participation of the Agency in the formulation and execution of American foreign policy. It urges that a Presidential Directive be issued implementing Congressional intent that the Director of USICA serve as a statutory advisor to the National Security Council and as the principal advisor to the President on foreign public opinion and the conduct of public diplomacy.

VOICE OF AMERICA

The Commission recommends that USICA take greater care to avoid actions and policies that can be easily misinterpreted and cast doubt on VOA's commitment to accuracy and objectivity.

The Commission welcomes the high priority USICA is giving to the expansion of VOA's worldwide transmitter network and to the modernization of its Washington facilities. It recommends that these initiatives be given appropriate support.

The Commission supports USICA's efforts to examine the most effective means of communicating with successor generation audiences. It recommends that this examination consider the cost, potential audience levels, and technical difficulties involved in medium wave broadcasting to Western Europe as well as the relative advantages and disadvantages of other media.

EDUCATIONAL AND CULTURAL EXCHANGE PROGRAMS

The Commission regards USICA's educational exchange and international visitors programs as among the most effective tools of public diplomacy and recommends that they be materially strengthened.

In view of the size of the East-West Center's budget and its potential for creating better understanding among the nations of East and West, the Commission recommends that the Center be comprehensively evaluated by an experienced team of professionals selected from the fields of higher education and cross-cultural communication.

TELEVISION

The Commission welcomes increased cooperation between USICA and the private sector, but it opposes private funding of major programs, particularly those articulating U.S. foreign policy.

The Commission recommends that USICA undertake a major study, drawing on the expertise of government and non-government specialists, to ensure that the Agency realizes the full potential of television programming and remains completely abreast of technological advances.

PROJECT TRUTH

The Commission is pleased to note the extensive interagency cooperation and coordination supporting this project and recommends that such coordination become the rule rather than the exception for U.S. public diplomacy efforts.

The Commission is concerned about the connotations of the name "Project Truth" and recommends that the Agency not utilize terminology that gives rise to suspicions that USICA is engaging in "propaganda."

RESEARCH

The Commission recommends that the staff and budget of the Office of Research be increased to provide the research capability required for national security and foreign policy needs. It should also have the resources to carry out regular and methodical evaluation of Agency programs and products.

U.S. ADVISORY COMMISSION ON PUBLIC DIPLOMACY

The Commission recommends that the President and the Congress ensure that appointments to the U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy are made so as to protect the independence, continuity, genuine bipartisan character, and broad professional composition of the Commission.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, July 27, 1982, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

SENATE—Tuesday, July 27, 1982

(Legislative day of Monday, July 12, 1982)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

God of our fathers, we praise Thee for the faith, dedication, courage, and sacrifice of those who conceived this Nation and brought it to birth despite trouble, tragedy, and hostile resistance. We thank Thee for their vision and wisdom which provided a Constitution and political system that continues to work after 200 years and which has generated the strongest free Nation in history.

Help the people to comprehend that a government of the people, by the people, and for the people cannot work if the people do not work it. Deliver the people from the illusion that they can elect public servants, abdicate their citizenship responsibility, expect the government to work without them, and blame the elected officials when it does not.

As the election nears, awaken the people to a fresh understanding of the partnership between them and their representatives, and help us Father God to fulfill the dream of our forebears. We ask this in the name of Him who is Lord of the nations. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the time for the two leaders has expired or been yielded back, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business in the remaining time until the hour of 10 a.m. in which Senators may speak for not more than 3 minutes each.

Mr. President, yesterday, in an on-again, off-again arrangement, we first said that we would return to the consideration of the balanced budget resolution at 10 a.m. and then vitiated that, and to display my absolute flexibility, I intend now to reinstate it.

ORDER TO RESUME CONSIDERATION OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 58

So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 10 a.m. this morning the Senate resume consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 58.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAYAKAWA). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the reason for that is that while I had hoped to do House Joint Resolution 494, the El Salvador resolution, at 10 a.m., I am advised that certain principals involved in that debate cannot be available until 10:45 a.m. this morning and will not be in a position to vote on that measure if a rollcall is ordered until 2 p.m.

I understand that there is in process a unanimous-consent order in respect to that measure which has perhaps not been cleared all around but as soon as it is cleared, if it is cleared, I will make a further announcement.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. We are working on it right now.

Mr. BAKER. I am advised by the minority leader that that clearance is in process but not yet complete. So when and if that request is agreed to and consent is given, I will make the further statement on the schedule.

Mr. President, however, in general terms the schedule this week will be the debate on Senate Joint Resolution 58, the balanced budget amendment. It is my hope and intention to try to finish that measure this week. That will be a difficult task, but the Senate is on notice from the statements on yesterday of the possibility of late sessions any day this week and the possibility of a Saturday session.

The time has come, I think, to resolve the issue and to dispose of the debate on Senate Joint Resolution 58 and the resolution itself.

There may be exceptions to that program for the week because almost inevitably other matters will come up that require the immediate attention of the Senate on a priority basis, sometimes on a privileged basis, or a number of items that may be presented by unanimous consent after the agreement of the minority leader and majority leader to those measures. But absent those routine matters, it is my full intention to pursue the debate on the balanced budget amendment and complete it this week.

Mr. President, it would be my hope that we could finish the debate on that measure by Thursday evening and lay before the Senate the reconciliation bill on Friday. The reconciliation bill, I am advised, will be available from the Budget Committee on Thursday during the day and would be available then for action by the Senate, I believe, on Friday under certain circumstances. It is a privileged matter, one that requires the immediate attention of the Senate, and I hope that we could finish the balanced budget resolution in order to take that up on Friday or Monday.

After the conclusion of the reconciliation bill, according to the schedule previously announced, we will go to the next urgent supplemental if it is available and to the immigration bill as may be desirable and ultimately to the second debt limit bill.

I have talked to the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee about the second debt limit and requested that the committee consider that bill and report it to the Chamber in order to have it available for action during the month of August and prior to our recess for the Labor Day break.

Mr. President, do I understand that the request in respect to El Salvador has been cleared by the minority?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, it has been cleared.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

TIME LIMITATION AGREEMENT—HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 494

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 10:45 a.m. today, the Senate turn to the consideration of calendar No. 713, House Joint Resolution 494, a joint resolution with regard to Presidential certifications on conditions in El Salvador, under the following time agreement:

Fifteen minutes under the control of the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Illinois, (Mr. PERCY);

Thirty minutes under the control of the ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL);

Fifteen minutes under the control of the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS);

With the proviso that no amendments be in order and that following the conclusion or yielding back of time the Senate proceed to vote on the adoption of House Joint Resolution 494;

Provided, that in the event a rollcall vote is ordered on House Joint Resolution 494, that the rollcall vote occur at 2 p.m. today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, that concludes my statement of the program as we see it today.

We have a busy week before us, and I urge the cooperation of all Members, and I express my gratitude to the minority leader now for his help and assistance in reaching this place where we have some reasonable expectation of finishing the work of the Senate in order to get out on August 20 which is the date the House of Representatives recesses instead of August 27 which is the date previously announced.

DIGGES MORGAN

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, for those who called the Republican cloakroom today, and for those who will call the Republican cloakroom tomorrow, hear this: Digges Morgan has hung up the phone for good to become an assistant in the Office of Legislative Affairs in the Department of Commerce.

Throughout the years, Digges has excelled in his duties in the Senate. During those occasional late evening sessions of this body, his quick wit and dry sense of humor have provided each of us with a needed lift. Digges Morgan has tremendous respect for this institution, and his diligence, courtesy, and assistance to its Members are evidence of that affection. He has distinguished himself not only as an extraordinary employee, but as a confidant to the individuals he has served.

Digges has served in the Senate for over 5 years, and was employed by our late colleague, Senator Bartlett, as an intern. Following his duties as an intern, he was employed in the document room, and began working in the cloakroom in January of 1979.

In his duties at the Department of Commerce, Digges will work closely with the Senate and we will look forward to our continued association with him. On behalf of all the Republican Members, I wish him and his lovely wife, the best of luck.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader.

Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) and after that the remaining 5 minutes to the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES).

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I will not take 5 minutes. I shall be brief.

HOW DO YOU STOP A NUCLEAR WAR WHEN COMMUNICATIONS ARE GONE?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I continue to bring to the attention of the Senate nightmares that will develop for us in the event of nuclear war with the Soviet Union. The latest relates to how you turn off a nuclear war. Because of the immensely destructive power of nuclear weapons, a nation that might be down to its last few hundred—and within a few years 15 or 20 nations will have more than that each. But a nation down to its last few hundred nuclear bombs could inflict absolutely devastating damage killing many millions of people in another country. So even after years of devastating attacks, the war would go on and on.

On July 22, in an article in the Washington Post Michael Getler called attention to another terrible dilemma that would confront us in the event of a nuclear holocaust between the United States and the Soviet Union. How would an American President communicate with the top Russian leader if our weapons had destroyed the Russian communication system and headquarters.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article ws ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 22, 1982]

HOW DO YOU TURN OFF NUCLEAR WAR WHEN THE LINES ARE ALL DOWN?

(By Michael Getler)

If a nuclear war with the Soviet Union ever started and an American president were trying to stop it, how would he communicate with Soviet leaders whose headquarters and communications systems may have been destroyed by rapidly counter-attacking American missiles?

"There's a real dilemma here that we haven't sorted out," according to retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Brent Scowcroft, the former top national security assistant to President Ford.

The conflict is essentially between an emerging American military strategy that puts heavy emphasis upon knocking out what Reagan White House adviser Richard Pipes calls "the nerve system of the Soviet leadership" and what Scowcroft points out is a presidential need to "communicate with the enemy" after an attack has begun.

The dilemma, in Scowcroft's words, is that "the kinds of controlled nuclear options to which we are moving presume communications with the Soviet Union; and yet, from a military point of view, one of the most efficient kinds of attack is against leadership and command and control systems. It's much easier than trying to take out each and every bit of the enemy's offensive forces."

The remarks of Scowcroft, Pipes and many other top military and civilian officials are contained in a just-released record of a symposium on strategic nuclear policies, weapons and command and control held last October at Bedford, Mass. The meeting was sponsored by the U.S. Air Force Electronic Systems Division and the Mitre Corp., an Air Force think tank.

The proceedings contain some of the most candid discussions ever made public on the problems of trying to maintain control over nuclear forces in an actual wartime situation, including detailed explanations of how a president would communicate with submerged U.S. nuclear missile-firing submarines.

The symposium was held just two weeks after President Reagan announced a six-year, $180 billion program to modernize U.S. strategic forces with new missiles and bombers. That program includes an $18 billion investment to try to improve presidential control over those weapons, to help the president communicate with those forces and to give him the information he needs in the midst of the chaos of an atomic war.

The president was praised by participants for being the first chief executive to put substantial funds into this unglamorous sector of the defense budget. Defense officials have long held that an improved ability to survive an attack and maintain communications would contribute to deterring Soviet attack.

At the same time, the U.S. is moving toward a strategy aimed at convincing the Soviets that they could not win a war because this country would retaliate against the Soviet command structure.

"Our present deterrent is geared toward attacking military objectives, command and control, and the nerve system of the Soviet leadership—that whole system that confronts us." Pipes said. "In Soviet terms that is far more menacing and therefore it is a great inducement, first of all not to strike, and secondly to come to the negotiating table, than the previous [strategy] had been."

Pipes added that "I personally do not believe that the Soviet Union would launch a preemptive nuclear strike against the United States out of the blue, no matter what the balance of power is. I just don't think that is in the cards. The great danger is that, in a world crisis in which there is an escalation of hostility between our two countries and where both begin to alert the forces and so on—where indeed war between us becomes possible—at that particular point they might strike preemptively."

Scowcroft said that even if a nuclear attack were to come in the midst of a crisis, it would still come as a surprise because of the magnitude of such a step, and the president "may have less than 10 minutes in which to make a decision and seek shelter."

Scowcroft, who remains intimately involved in strategic matters as a member of special commissions looking into new American weaponry, said the Defense Department requires confirmation that an attack is under way by more than one means of detecting that missiles have been launched, such as ground-based radar and infrared sensors on satellites.

The president then has to convince himself that missiles are actually en route. "Unless the Soviets are a lot dumber than I think they are, they will take that into account in planning their attack . . . and do their best to make the first indications as ambiguous as possible and thus force the president to take as much time as possible and thus lessen the chances we would respond quickly," he said.

Getting the president the information he needs is a difficult task, Scowcroft said, and he will need to consult advisors who may not be available. If the President stays in Washington and would-be successors such as the vice president are dispersed to secret locations with their advisors, this would deplete the experts available to the president here and raises the question of whether military command centers would know who the president or top civilian authority is at any given time after an attack begins.

When the missiles actually have begun to land, Scowcroft said, the U.S. would be in what he calls "the automatic phase of the war . . . at which time the quick response (retaliatory) systems are discharged against predetermined targets and the battle plan unfolds more or less automatically." In other words, the initial presidential determination that the U.S. was under attack and his decision to respond would trigger a quick and automatic American response of some predetermined size.

The next phase would be trying to manage the conflict or end it, and for that the president would need to communicate with the remaining forces, the American people and the Soviets, Scowcroft said. That's where the new strategy of striking the Soviet leadership, as they might strike ours, bumps into the problem of ending the war.

Rear Adm. Paul D. Tomb, a member of the staff of the military Joint Chiefs of Staff, told the symposium that "unless all elements of our nuclear triad (land- and submarine-based missiles and bombers) receive the message prior to impact of Soviet reentry vehicles (missile warheads) we risk losing large segments of our retaliatory force."

One big question has always been whether messages would get to U.S. missile-firing submarines submerged in distant waters.

But Tomb describes several means to do this. Extremely low-frequency (ELF) transmitters based on land, he said, are not very good message carriers because the information moves slowly. But they are "very good bell ringers" to submarine commanders because they send out deep into the ocean a continuous signal that is part of the Joint Alerting Network. If that stops it means that the transmitter may have been destroyed and signals the commander to try another method to receive information.

The next most reliable system would be picking up very low frequency (VLF) transmissions from Navy airplanes or other transmitters using three different kinds of other antennas carried on submarines, including wire devices and special buoys.

If that doesn't work, Tombs said, a submarine could come close to the surface, pop another antenna just above the water and communicate via a Navy satellite that is part of the Submarine Systems Intelligence Exchange System. The commander could also come close to the surface and, with a radio antenna, monitor war messages being broadcast to surface ships on high frequency.

The symposium also was told by Navy officers that the extent of the Reagan administration's plan to put thousands of new cruise missiles on submarines, especially those to be aimed against land rather shipping targets, came as somewhat of a surprise.

One reason, according to a symposium commentator who was not identified in the published account, was that the cruise missiles—small torpedo-shaped flying bombs powered by jet engines—provided an opportunity for the U.S. quickly to add atomic punch "since we are seriously behind the Soviet Union."

"The second reason was that the missiles we will deploy in Europe," a reference to new ground-based cruise and Pershing II missiles, "are vulnerable to surprise attack. Indeed, their presence there, along with pre-positioned material, the nuclear storage and our dependence on runways and other attributes of mobilization, mean that to some degree we are making Europe into a gigantic Pearl Harbor."

The commentator said the U.S. would try to discourage the Soviets from striking at the land-based missiles and thus is adding the sea-based force as "a good way" to convince Moscow that the cruise missile threat cannot be easily removed.

WISCONSIN COMPANIES NO. 1 IN MANY FIELDS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suppose everyone knows that Wisconsin is America's dairyland. We are No. 1 in cheese and beer. But how many realize how far out in front we are in so many other areas. We happen to be the biggest producers of such things as fireplaces, pens, engines, automotive batteries, customized sailboats, and hotdogs.

Take Briggs and Stratton, a marvelously productive firm in Milwaukee. Briggs and Stratton is No. 1 in two fields: car locks and engines. It produces about half the four-cycle, air-cooled gas engines in the world, a solid 5 million every year. And who are its nearest competitors? The Kohler Co. located where? In Kohler, Wis., and also the Tecumseh Products Co., which makes engines in Shboygan and Grafton, Wis.

Mr. President, last Sunday the Milwaukee Journal carried a fascinating article by Helen Pauly on how and why and where my State of Wisconsin is No. 1.

I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BADGER BIGGIES—WISCONSIN COMPANIES ARE NO. 1 IN MANY FIELDS

(By Helen Pauly)

If companies were athletes, Wisconsin fans would chant: "We're No. 1."

In one short day, it's not unlikely that you might drive to work in your car fitted with a Johnson Controls' battery, use a Parker Pen to write a letter, eat an Oscar Mayer hotdog for lunch, dust the coffee table with Johnson Wax's Pledge furniture polish, stop at a bank that uses Brandt Inc. coin payers, cut the lawn with a mower equipped with a Briggs & Stratton engine and then relax by listening to music on your Koss Stereophones and eating some hors d'oeuvres topped with Merkt Cheese.

These everyday items have a great deal more in common than their Wisconsin heritage. All are No. 1 sellers in their respective fields.

Surprising?

It might seem so, considering all the badmouthing Wisconsin takes these days.

But there still are many Wisconsin firms that remain leaders in their fields. No accurate count is kept, so any list of market leaders based in the state is bound to be incomplete. But some available figures indicate that a number of Wisconsin companies traditionally leave competitors eating their dust.

BACKBONE BUSINESSES

Critics have accused Wisconsin of footdragging in the area of developing high-tech businesses. They sometimes forget or overlook the fact that Wisconsin's backbone businesses still are the best in many fields. Wisconsin companies outsell competitors in fireplaces, pens, engines, automotive batteries, customized sailboats and hotdogs—things that most people will need, computer revolution or not.

And many other people gave up on Wisconsin when Milwaukee let its long domination of the brewing business slip away.

But if you bought a Sears Die Hard battery for your car last winter—you had a lot of company—it was made by Johnson Controls' battery division, Sears' exclusive battery supplier. Johnson Controls is the largest seller of automotive and replacement batteries in US. It also sells to all domestic new car manufacturers except General Motors.

Borg Instrument Inc. of Delavan is also a supplier to all US automakers, selling more than 55% of all quartz and electronic clocks found in new US cars. It also sells clocks to European car manufacturers.

When the car needs a tuneup, it's likely that your mechanic will work with tools made by Snap-on Tools Corp., Kenosha, the biggest independent manufacturer of professional mechanic tools.

LOCKS AND ENGINES

Briggs & Stratton Corp. is No. 1 in two fields—car locks and engines. B&S has about half of the worldwide market for the four-cycle, air-cooled gas engine, with unit sales of about five million annually. The engines are used in lawnmowers and snowblowers.

In fact Wisconsin nearly has the gas engine market sewn up. B&S main domestic competitors are Kohler Co., Kohler, and Tecumseh Products Co., which makes engines in Sheboygan Falls and Grafton.

Everyone loves a picnic, and some of the necessary ingredients are likely to be Wisconsin-made products. If it's cheese spread, there's a good bet that Merkt's cheese will be selected. Made in Bristol, Wis., by Merkt Cheese Co. Inc., the cold-pack cheese spread is the biggest seller in the U.S.—acing out the No. 2 seller, Kraft's Cracker Barrel.

Merkt's market share varies from city to city, but a spokesman said that in Milwaukee alone, the company held a 94.2% share of all the cold-pack cheese spread business.

At such gatherings you'll probably find that Oscar Mayer hotdogs and cold cuts—both No. 1 sellers in their fields—will anchor the picnic blanket. Oscar Mayer, based in Madison, now is owned by General Foods Corp.

Pass out the paper napkins—they probably were made by Fort Howard Paper Co., Green Bay, which ranks as the largest manufacturer of paper napkins, towels and toilet tissue fashioned from recycled paper products.

L. D. Schreiber Cheese Co. Inc., Green Bay, also is a leader in the food market. According to Robert W. Baird & Co., it is the largest manufacturer of substitute cheese products.

SEVERAL LEADERS

Johnson Wax in Racine has several No. 1 household products. Pledge furniture polish, Off insect repellent, and Glade room freshener are all the market leaders in their respective fields.

Wisconsin firms also lead the way in a number of business-related products and services.

Parker Pen Co. of Janesville ranks tops in two areas: It is the No. 1 manufacturer of high-quality pens and pencils worldwide. And its Manpower subsidiary, located in Glendale, is the biggest temporary help service in the world, with 800 offices in 31 countries. Last year, Manpower placed 600,000 persons in temporary office and industrial jobs.

The paper on which many an annual corporate report is printed may have been produced at a mill owned by Consolidated Papers Inc., Wisconsin Rapids, the world's largest producer of enamel printing papers for national publications and commercial printing jobs.

B. C. Ziegler & Co., West Bend, is the largest U.S. broker and underwriter of institutional bonds—for hospitals, churches and non-profit organizations.

Master Lock Co., a Milwaukee-based affiliate of American Brands, has had the padlock business under lock and key for years. The No. 1 producer in field, Master Lock last year sold $87 million worth of key and combination padlocks.

BANKS SUPPLIES

The same goes for Brandt Inc., of Watertown, Wis., which makes coin paying machines and high-speed coin sorters and counters used by cashiers at banks, savings and loans, checkout counters and ticket lines.

Marquette Electronics, located here, is the major manufacturer of diagnostic electrocardiagraph machines. Michael Cudahy, Marquette president, said his company had about 60% of the total worldwide market.

General Electric's Medical Systems Operation in Waukesha is the major worldwide manufacturer of such medical diagnostic-imaging equipment as CT scanners, X-ray equipment, ultra-sound and nuclear medical devices. GE believes that it has about 20% of the total worldwide market, moving just slightly ahead of its major competitor, Siemens, a West German company.

When it comes to home and recreation, Wisconsin firms again top the list. Sturgeon Bay is the home of Palmer-Johnson Inc., the world's largest builder of customized sailing yachts.

(If you have to ask, prices start around $500,000.)

Harley-Davidson, where managers recently bought the company back from AMF, remains the No. 1 manufacturer of heavyweight motorcycles.

Koss Corp., which invented the stereophone more than 25 years ago, still holds its No. 1 market share in that expanding industry.

In a field of about 20 competitors, Preway Inc., Wisconsin Rapids, is the top manufacturer and seller of prefabricated and built-in fireplaces in the U.S.

Preway President William Thomas Jr. said Preway had about 18% of the total market—but dominates the sale of prefabricated fireplaces to mobile homes with 85% of that market.

And when it comes to insuring the mortgage on your home, MGIC Investment Corp's Mortgage Guaranty Insurance Corp. is the largest private insurer of conventional mortgages in the U.S. MGIC, based in Milwaukee, now is owned by Baldwin-United Corp.

LOOKING AT THE MILITARY BALANCE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, Newsday, the excellent and highly regarded newspaper on Long Island, N.Y., is publishing a series of articles analyzing and questioning comparisons of United States and Soviet military strength.

So often the public is bombarded with statistics and comparisons indicating that the United States has slipped into a posture of strategic inferiority. Our President, for example, has stated that the Russians have strategic superiority.

But what are the facts? Are we getting the whole story? Is there another side to the issue. That is the series of questions that Newsday is addressing and in so doing providing an excellent service to the reading public.

The issue of military spending comparisons; the question of simply counting units on both sides; looking at the conventional relationship including NATO and the Warsaw Pact members; measuring the strategic balance realistically; all of these critical arguments are discussed in depth.

While it is not possible to simplify the answers in a short paragraph, it can be said that the Newsday analysis casts doubt on the traditional way the military balance is presented to the public by the Pentagon and the administration.

There is a natural tendency in any military bureaucracy to inflate the threat and discount your own advantages. It is a worst case or conservative approach. Sometimes this is a proper and prudent method of analysis. Often it is not. And the Newsday article spells out just how it has been used and misused over the years. I recommend this article to all those interests in the U.S. defense posture.

I ask unanimous consent that the Newsweek article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPERTS QUESTION BASIC PREMISE OF REAGAN'S MILITARY BUILDUP

(By Jim Klurfeld)

(President Reagan has made the growth of Soviet military power an issue of national concern. Many of his critics have questioned not so much the need for a defense buildup as its size and scope. In the next few months, Newsday will explore some of the issues in the debate over defense spending. The first series of articles looks at the major justification for Reagan's defense program—the Soviet threat—and the credibility of that threat. It was reported by Roy Gutman, Jim Klurfeld and Earl Lane of Newsday's Washington Bureau.)

WASHINGTON.—It is the largest peacetime military buildup in the nation's history: $1.5 trillion to build new intercontinental ballistic missiles, aircraft carriers, strategic bombers, airplanes and tanks and even to refit old battleships. The United States, says Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, must be ready to fight a war in any part of the world.

Behind the Reagan administration's defense buildup is a basic premise: that the Soviet Union, after two decades of unstinting military growth, has become militarily superior to the United States. In a recent interview with Newsday, Weinberger said once again that the Soviets were ahead. He states his concerns this way:

"The Soviets have been doing it [building up their military power] a long time, on a much bigger scale than we have, and they've never stopped, and no matter if there was a bad harvest, or whether their dreadful economy was even worse than normal or whether there was detente or SALT negotiations . . . they have never stopped and have gone on adding very much more than we have on almost every measure, each year."

But there is another view of the arms race. There are knowledgeable officials and military experts inside and outside the government who say that the United States is not in an inferior position to the Soviets. There is little dispute that the Soviet Union has made a tremendous effort to build up its military strength and that the trends have been in its favor. But the question of military balance—of who is ahead—is not so easily resolved.

A Newsday study suggests that there is more than one legitimate way to look at the military balance. Among the major findings are these:

That the extent of the Soviet buildup has been overstated.

That the disparity between the NATO and Warsaw Pact forces is not as great as the administration has claimed. One recent study argued that, if NATO mobilized quickly, the Soviets would be far from certain of winning a conventional battle, even if the United States did not resort to nuclear weapons.

That in the area of nuclear weapons there remains essential equivalence—balance. The Soviets have developed the ability to target American land-based nuclear missiles but still could not prevent a devastating U.S. retaliatory blow.

That the most important issues may be different from those being pushed into the forefront of the public debate. Instead of the defense debate being dominated by arcane, almost philosophical differences over nuclear fighting strategy, analysts say more attention should be paid to less dramatic issues such as the readiness of equipment, the training of forces, the future of surface ships, the use of technology and the elimination of at least some of the duplication of military effort within the alliance.

That gross cost comparisons of military spending may be misleading and even irrelevant. Most military analysts say it is more revealing to examine how a nation defines its interests and how it can protect those interests in specific areas of potential conflict.

Even some conservatives who have spoken out vociferously about the dangers of the Soviet buildup now say there is a danger of exaggerating the threat. "In the 1970's it was necessary to speak almost continuously of the danger of underestimating Soviet power," said Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.), a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee and one of those who warned about the Soviet buildup. "In this decade it may prove equally urgent to warn against overestimating it. . . We would do well to cultivate a certain serenity about the limits of both our power and theirs."

GROSS SPENDING COMPARISONS

The most commonly used justification for the massive Reagan defense buildup has been a direct comparison of Soviet and American military spending. Citing CIA studies, the administration argues that the Soviets have been increasing their military spending by 3 to 5 per cent a year for 20 years. But, the officials say after Vietnam the United States began to cut back on its defense effort.

"We must now pay the bill for our collective failure to preserve an adequate balance of our military strength during the past decade or two," Weinberger said this year in his annual report. "While our principal adversaries engaged in the greatest buildup of military power seen in modern times, our own investment in forces and weapons continued to decline until very recently."

Central to the administration's argument is the much-quoted unclassified CIA study that claim that the Soviet Union is outspending the United States by 50 per cent on defense. But a closer look at the CIA figures demonstrates why such a comparison might be misleading.

One prominent expert on the Soviet economy questions the methodology of the CIA report and concludes that it seriously distorts Soviet defense spending. Franklyn Holzman, an economist at Tufts University, says the CIA figures could be exaggerating Soviet spending by at least 20 percent. Holzman says that by interpolating rubles into dollars and assigning values on the basis of U.S. costs, the CIA figures inflate Soviet spending.

Holzman also argues that the CIA comparison does not take into account the contributions of the allies—an area in which the West far outpaces the Warsaw Pact * * * .

There has also been a tendency to misinterpret the purposes of the Soviet naval buildup, according to government experts. The Russians have built hundreds of submarines and surface ships. It is a major military accomplishment. But it does not mean, as some have claimed, that the Soviets are about to challenge the U.S. for control of the seas.

The Soviet naval buildup has been primarily to protect its fleet of ballistic missile submarines and to harass U.S. ships in a war, according to U.S. government experts. The Soviet Navy does not have the ability to project Soviet power far and wide. The Soviets have a very limited marine force, about 12,000 troops (compared with 192,000 for the United States) and no large, nuclear-powered aircraft carriers. The United States has 13.

There are U.S. experts who believe the Soviets would someday like to achieve such a capability—but they say it seems to be a lower priority item.

"It is not a case of the Russians are coming," said one administration official who has special interest in power projection. "But it is a matter of realizing that they are beginning to get into this area."

STRATEGIC BALANCE

If there is one area where the experts agree that the Soviets are probably equal to the United States, it is their ability to launch a strategic attack against the U.S. mainland with long-range nuclear missiles. Reagan said at his March 31 press conference that he believed the Soviets were now superior in that area, but most analysts disagree. At most, they say, the Soviets have an edge in land-based strategic missiles.

When it comes to measuring the nuclear balance, the experts tend to become just as caught up in methodological issues as they do in trying to compare overall defense spending by the two superpowers.

Nuclear weapons have such overwhelming power, and the United States and Soviet Union have so many of them that many analysts argue that it is not practical to say that one side is ahead of the other. Each has the ability to destroy the other many times over Specialists have tried to measure the power of nuclear weapons in three ways: total number of warheads, throw-weight (the amount of material a missile carries) and the total megatonnage (the amount of destructive power in an arsenal). The United States retains a lead in warheads (about 9,000 nuclear bombs, counting weapons delivered by strategic bombers, to 7,500 for the Soviets). But the Soviets have leads in the other two categories.

Jan Lodal, a nuclear arms specialist for the National Security Council during the Nixon and Ford years, argues that the best measure of nuclear capability is the number of warheads each side deploys. He says the balance is relatively stable. "The point is that the difference of even a few thousand warheads is not significant," Lodal said. "At some point it might become significant, but that would be at a much higher number—maybe 5,000 or more difference."

Lodal says the significant question is whether each side is confident that it can absorb a surprise first attack and still have enough weapons left to retaliate. That is called having a second-strike ability. As long as one nation has a second-strike ability, the argument goes, there is no incentive for the other side to strike first. It is the basic principle of deterrence.

There are other experts, many now in the administration, who argue that throw-weight and megatonnage also make a difference, especially in perceptions of power.

But the most persistent point made by Reagan during the campaign was that the Soviets, because they have more accurate land-based missiles than the United States, can theoretically target all the U.S. land-based ICBMs. That is the "window of vulnerability." Reagan and many in his administration argue that the U.S. ability to launch a second strike is in some doubt because of the window of vulnerability.

Others say that the United States, even if it lost all its land-based missiles, still would have 80 per cent of its nuclear warheads available for retaliation. The sea-based nuclear missiles and bomber force could still deliver a second strike. It is also argued that while a Soviet attack on land-based missiles is theoretically possible, it would be very difficult to coordinate. "It is just not a likely scenario," Lodal said.

Administration officials say the United States should be taking steps to eliminate even the possibility that the Soviets might try to knock out all American land-based missiles. The U.S. deterrent is based on three different weapons systems—the land-based, sea-based and air-based missiles (called the triad)—being able to survive a first strike. If the Soviets know one system cannot survive, it allows them to concentrate on ways to counter the other two legs of the triad.

Though the administration's charges about nuclear vulnerability may be overstated, some analysts say, prudence requires the United States to address two issues associated with nuclear strategy.

The command and control problem. If the Soviets were to launch a first strike, there are serious doubts whether the President and his top advisers would be able to survive it and to order U.S. forces to launch a retaliatory strike. Experts say that a vulnerable communications system undercuts the assuredness of a retaliatory strike and therefore undercuts deterrence. That is an area in which the Reagan administration is making a major effort.

But one expert, Thomas Shelling, a political economy professor at Harvard, says the solution is not so much in electronics as in thinking through what would happen in a nuclear exchange and devising alternatives. Shelling argues that such thinking is not being done.

The hair-trigger problem. To maintain a stable nuclear balance, each superpower must have confidence that it would be able to retaliate against any strike by its opponent. But the deployment of very accurate Soviet land-based missiles and of the planned U.S. MX and Trident D-5 missiles, which will also be very accurate, theoretically places both sides' land-based missiles at risk and puts a premium on the side that launches first.

That places a hair trigger on a nuclear war, say military experts. It might mean that one side or the other would launch its missiles on the warning of a strike from the other side, fearful it would lose too many weapons if it waited. That greatly increases the possibility of starting a nuclear war through miscalculation.

Debates over defense have tended to center on whether to increase or decrease military spending. This time, with general agreement that the Soviet buildup requires a renewed U.S. defense effort, the issue becomes one of sorting out goals, setting priorities and identifying real needs.

Mearsheimer looks at the Reagan defense budget and its high spending for strategic weapons and warhsips and warns that such an emphasis will likely mean a reduction in funds for NATO. That, he says, could tip the balance of forces in Central Europe dangerously in favor of the Soviets.

Seymour J. Deitchman, an analyst at the Institute for Defense Analysis, private defense consultants, warns that it is becoming so expensive to build warplanes and their weapons systems that the cost of shooting down a target will soon be higher than the target is worth. He says the United States must produce less expensive airplanes and concentrate resources in its weapons systems.

"The issue isn't how much is in the budget—we are already going to be getting a lot of money," said Deitchman. "The issues now is what you do with the money you are getting."

LET US STOP THE $3.6 BILLION CLINCH RIVER BREEDER REACTOR TURKEY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a Congress that should be in the business of cutting unnecessary and wasteful spending should take a hard, long look at the Clinch River breeder reactor. As the New York Times reported in a recent editorial: It is uneconomic. It is dangerous. It is a "technological turkey."

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 24, 1982]

WHY PUSH PLUTONIUM?

The magic promise of breeder reactors has evaporated. People once expected that they would make plutonium out of inert uranium and that by the year 2000 such fuel would be needed for a thousand power reactors. But in the 40 months since the Three Mile Island accident, not a single new nuclear power reactor has been ordered in the United States. Work on 38 others has been abandoned. Uranium is in surplus, at a reasonable price.

The breeder reactor is uneconomic. It is also dangerous. It is "a technological turkey," as David Stockman said of the $3.6 billion Clinch River breeder when he was a Congressman.

Mr. Stockman was right then; he would be even more right now. Clinch River will produce energy that is 25 to 70 percent more costly than conventional reactors. Its technology will be obsolete long before 2025—the earliest date, in the view of the General Accounting Office, by which the nation might need a plutonium breeder. And building it requires sizable Federal subsidies.

Then why build Clinch River at all?

Why, 10 years and $1.2 billion after it was started, has the Administration begun a crash program to get it finished?

Why has a contract just been signed for manufacture of the breeder's steam generators—in the face of a G.A.O. report that warns of safety risks and calls for more testing?

Why, after two turndowns, has the Administration applied again to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to start site preparation before preliminary approval of the breeder's design?

Why is the Administration determined to speed the arrival of a plutonium era that the Ford and Carter Administrations worked so hard to delay? No effective international control of separated plutonium seems possible. The use of plutonium as reactor fuel would widely distribute the substance employed as a nuclear explosive—and which could be made into bombs in a few hours by governments or terrorists.

Why this rush? The battle for the project by the Tennessee Congressional delegation has gained much ground since Senator Howard Baker became majority leader. Reagan conservatives add a messianic zeal for any nuclear enterprise. And the nuclear industry stirs fears of competitive disadvantage by playing up the breeder plants in Britain, Germany, Japan and, particularly, France.

But so what? Britain and France also built the Concorde; what does the United States gain by racing to invent another turkey? In any case, popular movements have halted West Germany's civilian nuclear program and slowed others abroad.

By 2025, fusion or other energy sources may make plutonium unnecessary as a fuel. In the interim, American competitiveness and world safety would gain far more if the United States confined its breeder efforts to research and development.

Why won't the Administration make the case for rushing into operation? Because there is none.

A POSTCARD FROM DACHAU

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, my staff members and interns provide a great deal of support for my effort to remind the Senate each day of the horror of genocide and the need to ratify the International Genocide Convention. They have been with me all the way, offering their assistance, their engery and their dedication. And yet I am sure that, at times, each of them has wondered whether this effort is worthwhile, and whether anything will ever come of it.

One of my former interns has asked and answered those questions. While traveling in Europe, he recently visited the concentration camp at Dachau. He immediately sent a postcard to my office. This is what he writes:

I thought I had some sense of the gravity of genocide from hearing all those speeches. Wrong.

I just visited a concentration camp, and it made the Holocaust so much more real and frightening. Walking around the grounds made me sick to my stomach and I wept.

I know that now I'll take the genocide speeches much more seriously. They do have an important place in the Senate.

Mr. President, my former intern is right.

The memory of the killing at Dachau is indeed sickening, and it is indeed a reason to weep. So is the knowledge that similarly senseless, needless killing is taking place right now in several parts of the world. And so is the certainty that the pointless racial, religious and national hatreds of humanity will give rise to yet more death and destruction in of the future.

For it is certain that the killings, the maimings, the torture, the disappearances, the burnings and the bombings will continue as long as there are people whose hatred, greed and anger will not be tempered by mercy and compassion. And that means they will continue as long as there are people.

This certainty leads to another, one that is more hopeful. This is the point that my former intern expressed: The certainty that no effort toward the prevention of genocide can possibly be useless. If we are one day able to put into place an effective international mechanism for the accomplishment of this goal—if we are one day able to avert the wholesale slaughter of a group of innocent people—then those who died at Dachau will not have died in vain.

Mr. President, for the sake of those who have died, of those who are now facing death, and of those who are certain to die in the future, I call upon the Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention.

I thank the distinguished minority leader, and I yield the floor. I yield back whatever time I have remaining to the Senator from Florida.

THE CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1982, TITLE IV—HABEAS CORPUS REFORM

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I rise today as part of an ongoing effort to persuade the Senate to consider the issue of habeas corpus reform. For more than 2 months now, Senator NUNN and I have been coming here to the Senate floor to speak out on the abusive use of habeas corpus petitions, and the need for the Senate to pass legislation which will address this problem. We have undertaken this effort because we believe that the flood of unwarranted habeas petitions, which are filed by State prisoners to attack their State convictions, is having a damaging effect on our criminal justice system. The Senate has spent a considerable amount of time discussion ways to remedy breakdowns in the criminal justice system. We have addressed a number of issues, and we are making progress. This progress is evident in the time agreement which has been reached on S. 2572, the bipartisan crime bill. As one of the original sponsors of this legislation, I am, of course, absolutely delighted that we will be considering it. However, if we fail to take up the issue of habeas corpus reform, then we have left out an important element in the move to reinforce the criminal justice system.

The problem we have encountered with habeas corpus petitions is essentially threefold: First, a vast number of the prisoner petitions which are filed are frivolous. These petitions are either incomplete, ridiculous in their claims, or just a rehash of the same facts which the appellate court on the State level has already reviewed. Such frivolous petitions are the result of a prevalent view in our State prisons which holds that a habeas motion is a bonus opportunity to get off the hook. What makes that course especially appealing to the convict is that he does not even have to raise a point of innocence in a habeas petition; all he needs to do it to raise a legal technicality which he feels affected his State trial. The second part of the problem is that there is no time limit on when a prisoner can file a petition. Because of this fact many habeas petitions are filed years, or even decades, after the original trial. Allowing stale petitions can result in a situation in which the State is prejudiced. Oftentimes, valuable evidence has disappeared or key witnesses may no longer remember crucial details. Finally, the third part of the problem is that Federal courts have gone to unnecessary lengths in reviewing habeas petitions. The Federal courts are to examine petitions in order to decide whether a constitutional right was violated during a State court procedure. Federal courts should not, however, delve into every aspect of a State court trial. Such action constitutes a relitigation of the same facts and issues which were decided in the State courts.

The results of this unwarranted petitioning and unnecessary review are damaging to the effective functioning of the courts. This can also be viewed as a threefold problem. First, the delays which result from habeas petitioning serve to dilute the notion of finality. If we expect the decisions of our courts to carry any weight, then there must be an understanding that a case will come to a close. We cannot allow prisoners to continually relitigate a case. Second, the flood of petitions which we have witnessed in recent years has been partially responsible for the tremendous backlog in our State and Federal courts. Prosecutors cannot concentrate on new cases when they are defending previous convictions. Third, the fact that Federal courts so easily call into question the decision of State courts serves to undermine the integrity of our State court system. A felon will have little concern for State proceedings if he feels he can get a new trial by appealing to the Federal level.

Concern over the effect that the abusive and repetitive use of habeas corpus petitions is having on our court system was recently the subject of a speech by Florida State Supreme Court Justice Ben Overton. Justice Overton had some particularly insightful observations, and I wish to share these observations with my colleagues here in the Senate. Justice Overton stated:

> The most important problem to be resolved, and a problem is clearly apparent in the public's eye, is the problem of substantial delays of criminal cases caused by the review process and the extensive proceedings that occur after an initial trial. We now have both the State court system and the Federal court system involved in one trial of one man for one offense. It is a procedure that I do not believe our criminal justice system can tolerate much longer and still have any credibility with the public. You should know that there are at least ten different possible court proceedings that can be had in a criminal case before it is final, whether it is a capital case where the death penalty is imposed, or a noncapital felony * * * The reason the Federal courts are involved with this process is the statutory authority granted to the Federal courts by the Congress (the Habeas Corpus Statute of 1867).
